The Chief Clerk read the amendment as modified, which was at the end of line five to insert the word "and," and in line six to strike out the words "and Yellowstone," and after the word "rivers" to insert "south of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude;" so that the section will read:

That said commissioners are required to examine a district of country lying north of the State of Nebraska, west of the Missouri river, and east of the traveled route to Montana Territory, upon the waters of the White Earth, the Cheyenne, and the Little Missouri rivers, south of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, of sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I am decidedly of the opinion that that section had better be stricken out altogether. We have but about three hundred thousand Indians left in the United States. Of that number a good many—I have not the figures before me, and I am not prepared to say how many—are still taken care of in the eastern and the western States. A good many are in Nebraska—peaceable Indians. A good many are in Kansas. Some are in Wisconsin. Some are in States east of Wisconsin. Now there is already dedicated to the use of the Indians a territory, referred to in the third section of this bill, of about fifty million acres, admirably adapted to Indian occupation, precisely the territory, unless it is belied, that is needed to commence the work of civilizing the Indians and of educating them to take care of themselves. That territory is abundant for the occupation of all the Indian tribes, it seems to me, east of the mountains, and who are not permanently located on some of the reservations included within the several States. That is dedicated now to the use of the Indian tribes. Under treaty stipulations existing as I understand, they cannot be disturbed. Why not then provide for all these Indians in that territory? Why have two reservations, especially when you take into consideration the fact already stated by the Senator from Missouri, and the same fact is alluded to by the Senator from Maine, that it is very doubtful whether the character of the country included in the territory mentioned in the second section will permit Indians to subsist upon it, very doubtful whether they can get a living. They must live. The argument of the Senator from Missouri is entirely sound upon that point. If they cannot subsist by their own efforts, we must take care of them. The Government must support them, or they will plunder the surrounding population. If that region of country is of that character, why undertake by the obligations of a treaty to locate these people upon it? We shall have to support them, or else they will be hereafter, as heretofore, plundering the population living about them.

This territory alluded to in the third section is a territory upon which we know they can subsist. It is of no sort of consequence to the surrounding States and Territories whether there are a hundred thousand or two hundred thousand Indians in that territory. They are excluded from that territory and should be excluded. That is all that is necessary, I take it, to maintain peace, to keep the two populations apart, each to have its home, and each kept within its home. With a view of providing by a subsequent amendment for these Indians in this southern territory, I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to think of that; and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 16, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OHIO CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House evidence in the Ohio contested-election case of Delano vs. Morgan; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

PETITION FROM ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] pending at the adjournment on Saturday last, to reconsider the vote by which the House received the petition from the Legislature of Arkansas.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. As my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] who presented the petition is not present, I move that the matter be passed over for the present.

No objection being made, the resolution was passed over temporarily.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the military protection of the loyal inhabitants of the late rebel States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a bill to enable the inhabitants of said territories to form State governments; which was read a first time, referred to the same committee, and ordered to be printed.

COMMON SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I introduced a bill at the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to establish a system of common schools for the District of Columbia, which was referred to the select Committee on the subject of Education in the District. I ask now to have a bill on the same subject referred to the same committee when appointed.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and ordered to be referred to the select Committee on Education in the District of Columbia when appointed.

REVENUE SYSTEM.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offered yesterday a resolution calling for information from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the "Metropolitan Board of Revenue" in New York city. It was objected to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.] I understand he now withdraws his objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Would it be in order, Mr. Speaker, for me to move to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution that I offered yesterday?

The SPEAKER. Each resolution will have to stand independently if there is objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman will allow me to offer my resolution now and to move to suspend the rules first I will then withdraw my objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I feel a natural affection for my own resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. I love the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio almost as much as my own, for they both go together; they are friendly to each other.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to move to suspend the rules myself if the objection is not withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I hope the gentleman will allow me to say I trust he will introduce the whole subject under the suspension of the rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to interpose a general objection to the introduction of these resolutions.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. The Speaker, I believe, has held during the entire present session that it is in order at any time to move to suspend all the rules of this House. I can hardly suppose that the intention of the House when it adopted the resolution to suspend the rules for the balance of the March session was that that order should continue on indefinitely or for the whole time that this Congress should be in session. I apprehend it was not the general understanding that the rule prohibiting the suspension of the rules except on certain days, which is the only protection of the minority, for whose benefit I had always supposed the rules were made, was to be suspended so long. I will not say that the Speaker is incorrect in his ruling, but it does seem to me that at the time the resolution was passed it was not expected by the majority, arbitrary and exacting as they are, to continue the suspension indefinitely.

The SPEAKER. That line of argument is not pertinent—whether the majority are arbitrary. The gentleman may state his point of order, but not indulge in any such strictures on the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was simply making the remark, without reflecting on the other side, that the rules which the majority would enforce are always arbitrary, and that the rules are themselves made for the protection of the minority. I think it can hardly be disputed, even by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the suspension of the rules for the balance of the then session was not intended to continue many months, as it has done.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the order made in March last from page 61 of the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

"On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the rules having been suspended for that purpose, ordered that it shall be in order at any time during the remainder of the present session to suspend the rules by a two-thirds vote."

The SPEAKER. That order was made at the first session of the Fortieth Congress, and is still in operation. But it is in the power of the House of course to rescind that order and leave the matter subject to the ordinary rule of the House, allowing a suspension of the rules only on Mondays and during the last ten days of the session.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the resolution which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House whether he has established, or caused to be constituted, in the city of New York, an association or commission of officers or persons known as the "Metropolitan Board of Revenue," or a commission or organization in that city in any way connected with the revenue service by any other name or style; and if so, that he state under what authority or under what provision of law and with what object or for what purpose such a board has been created; what individuals compose it; when, by whom, and under what authority they were selected or appointed; what powers they exercise, what instructions have been given to them, and what have been up to this time their acts or proceedings, collectively or as members of such a board, in relation to revenue matters; and also that the said Secretary furnish, with his reply hereto, copies of all correspondence that the Treasury Department or Revenue Bureau have had with officer or person in relation to the establishing of said board or its proceedings, including all letters, orders, decisions, accounts, communications, or writings of any character on record or file in the Treasury Department or in any bureau thereof having relation to or connection with said so-called "Metropolitan Board of Revenue," or any other such commission in the said city of New York.

Mr. ROBINSON. Allow me to withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has renewed the objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to introduce a resolution calling for executive information at this time?

The SPEAKER. The resolution was introduced yesterday, and its immediate consideration was objected to, and it went over one day under the rules.

The question was taken on suspending the rules, and there were—ayes 56, noes 18; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. SCHENCK and HOLMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes eighty-two, noes not counted.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by this House, with power to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer to examine into the working of the detective system of the internal revenue department, into the seizure of spirits and tobacco made by persons other than those designated in the acts of Congress, and to examine into the disposal of spirits and other goods, wares, and merchandise seized or sold by order of the courts, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Though the other resolution was good, this is ten times as good. I believe that if this committee is appointed it will save before December next $10,000,000 to the United States. But if this committee shall be appointed I do not wish to take the position usually assigned to the mover of a resolution, that of chairman. All I ask is that a good committee shall be appointed, and I believe that it will save a vast amount of money during the next three months.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 30, noes 67.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for tellers; and if it be in order I would like to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON. One single remark, with the consent of the House. Gentlemen around me say that they would vote for the resolution if I could give any good reason for its adoption. I will give one reason in a single word. I believe the seizures coming before a single court alone amount to—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, debate is not in order. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] insist on the call for tellers.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. WASHBURN of Massachusetts were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-five.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will not insist upon a further count. I see the unwillingness of the House to adopt the resolution.

So the motion to suspend the rules to allow the introduction of the resolution was not agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave of absence after to-day for the gentleman from Maine, Mr. PETERS.

No objection was made, and the leave of absence was granted.

BRIDGE AT ROCK ISLAND, ILLINOIS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length.

The joint resolution, which was read in full, provides that the bridge at Rock Island, Illinois, named in an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, approved March 2, 1867, shall be construed to be the bridge from the city of Davenport via Rock Island to the city of Rock Island, as defined in section two of an act making further provisions for the establishment of an armory and arsenal of construction, deposit, and repair on Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, approved June 27, 1866.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Before the question is taken on allowing the introduction of the joint resolution, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it will be recollected that I yesterday offered a resolution reciting in the preamble certain facts, and instructing the Attorney General to proceed against the Rock Island bridge, to have the same declared a nuisance and abated. The reception of the resolution was objected to by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. COOK.]

I will say to the House (though it is a fact which is now pretty well known to the House and country) that the Rock Island bridge, which has been in existence some ten years, is regarded by the people who have occasion to navigate the Mississippi river as a great obstruction and a public nuisance. It is no exaggeration to say that property to the amount of $1,000,000 has been lost by reason of the obstruction of navigation since that bridge was erected. Still we have no disposition to declare that bridges may not be constructed across the Mississippi river. We know they are necessary. But we maintain that they should be constructed where they will be the least obstruction to navigation and in the most approved manner.

These complaints have frequently come before Congress, and in 1866 Congress determined that this obstruction to navigation should be removed; and accordingly passed an act, which is cited in the resolution I yesterday presented. It became necessary that there should be further legislation, which was adopted at the last Congress. I was informed that the railroad companies had wholly neglected to take notice of these enactments.

It was believed that they had no intention to cooperate with the Government in building a new bridge so long as they were quietly permitted to occupy the old one. It was for this reason that I offered the resolution bringing the matter before the House. After doing so I was called upon by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. COOK,] who it seems has been in communication with the managers of the railroad company, and he assured me that it was the disposition of the company to proceed to execute the laws so far as they were concerned, but that there was a misunderstanding as to the construction of the law. For this reason I this morning ask to introduce a joint resolution defining the existing law, so that there shall be no misunderstanding between the Secretary of War and the railroad company or the bridge company. This resolution has been submitted to the gentleman from Illinois, and is satisfactory to him, as I believe it will be satisfactory to the friends of the free navigation of the Mississippi. It will remove any obstacle to the Secretary of War proceeding and entering into a contract with this bridge company or these railroad companies for the construction of a new bridge in such manner as will be the least possible obstruction to the navigation of the river. I do not desire to press the resolution I presented yesterday; but I ask to introduce and have passed this joint resolution explanatory of the law. I will say, however, that if the railroad company does not, between this time and the next session of Congress, carry out in good faith the intention of Congress, then we shall insist upon the resolution I offered yesterday.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I will do so.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I regard this as very large legislation at this season of Congress. For two years past we have been called upon to legislate in regard to this very subject; and I believe that we have appropriated between two and three million dollars on this bridge.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. We have simply appropriated some two hundred thousand dollars. There was an understanding that the railroad company should pay one half the expenses of the bridge.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I speak of our appropriations to Rock Island.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. You have an arsenal, armory, and workshops there, all interested in this bridge; and it was for these works that the large appropriations spoken of were made.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. We had considerable trouble in regard to this bridge at the last session of Congress. There was a committee of conference of the two Houses on the subject, and there was much difficulty in arranging for the proper construction of the bridge. I hope the resolution will be again read, so that we may see what is its precise effect.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The resolution is simply explanatory of the law passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I know there were efforts made then to make the law as plain as possible. I suggest to the gentleman that the matter had better be allowed to go over for the present.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I sincerely trust that my friend from Pennsylvania will not object to the introduction of the resolution. It simply proposes to define the duties of the Secretary of War. There are two laws. The law of 1866 provided for a new bridge from Davenport to the city of Rock Island across the island of Rock Island. Now, by a subsequent act, he is in doubt whether he is allowed to construct the bridge over Rock Island to the Illinois shore. This is to relieve his mind so that the work may go on.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Would it be asking too much to wait first until we receive a communication from the Secretary of War, so that we may exactly understand this matter?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I do not object to calling on the Secretary of War; but it is important that the work on this bridge should go on. I say to this House that my constituents have, during this year, in consequence of the high water in the Mississippi, sustained a loss to the amount of $50,000 by the wrecks of rafts of lumber. And that loss was as nothing to the great losses of the steamboat interest.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] alluded to the large appropriations to Rock Island. That is true; but, sir, by means of these large appropriations you are establishing there an arsenal and armory and other extensive works, the most magnificent in the world; and, sir, it is the finest position in the world for such an establishment. It is because the Government needs this bridge and the railroad needs it that it has been provided that it should be built at the joint expense of both.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the time allotted for the gentleman's explanation has expired.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I ask for fifteen minutes more to hear the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. COOK.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I object to further discussion.

The resolution was objected to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, moved to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 44.

So the rules were not suspended.

INSPECTOR OF STREETS IN WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia a bill abolishing the office of inspector of streets and carriage-ways, &c., in Washington city.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. BENTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to remove the terms of the circuit and district courts from Exeter, in the district of New Hampshire, to Concord, in said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is there any information in the possession of the Chair as to when we may expect a communication from the Executive?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been informed, by what he supposes to be reliable authority, the best authority, he believes, that the President does not expect to be able to communicate on the supplementary reconstruction bill before Thursday next.

The House divided on Mr. ELDRIDGE's motion, and there were—ayes 52, noes 47.

Mr. WINDOM demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WINDOM and Mr. BURR were appointed.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 60.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

The question recurred on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I withdraw it to allow the gentleman from Michigan to offer a resolution.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas an association known as "The Washington Monument Association" has been in existence for some twenty years without having accomplished anything, so far as known to the public, beyond the partial erection of a square column on the public grounds of this city, now abandoned; and whereas it is believed that large sums of money have been collected by said association from the public, which collections are continued in the United States Patent Office and other public buildings: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform this House, so far as may be in his power, what becomes of the money collected for this object in the Patent Office, and whether he has any knowledge of the present condition of the association, who its officers are, and what they propose to do with the funds.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is required to define and limit the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and whether the final judgments of that court should be subject to any other method of revision than that now established by law, and that said committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise on any matter concerning the jurisdiction of said court.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at one o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:
By the SPEAKER: The petition of the Yorkville,

South Carolina, bar, for a session of United States court at that place.

By Mr. LOAN: The petition of citizens of Daviess county, Missouri, asking that the name of John D. Lay may be placed on the pension-rolls.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 17, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of Origen Vandenberg, praying for the passage of an act to incorporate the New York Bay Tunnel Company; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWARD presented the petition of Charlotte Posey, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin in favor of an appropriation to the city of Milwaukee to reimburse that city for expenses incurred in constructing the harbor at the "Straight Cut," which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition from a number of citizens of Kentucky, praying for an amendment to the judiciary acts so as to authorize an appeal to be taken from the court of appeals of Kentucky to the Supreme Court of the United States in a case involving the rights of the Presbyterian church of the United States. They say that the case comes within the meaning, they think, of the judiciary act, but not within its letter. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

It was so referred.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Anna B. Perkins, praying that out of the sums of money to be paid to the imperial Government of Russia under the terms of the recent treaty between that Government and the United States there shall be withheld a sum sufficient to pay the claim of the late B. W. Perkins against that Government, until that Government shall grant a full hearing and adjudication of said claim by some competent tribunal; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORGAN. On Saturday last I presented the petition of Nathaniel D. Carlile & Son, praying to be relieved from the payment of the increased duties upon certain wool. At that time it was the order of the Senate that all petitions should be laid upon the table, and I had that petition laid on the table accordingly. I now ask that that petition be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, no objection being made.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 59) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first time by its title, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senate to indulge me by taking up the bill that was laid aside yesterday that I might prepare an amendment to it. It is the bill from the House in regard to printing in the Departments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 130) supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask that the bill be reported as it stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill was yesterday amended, and now reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the concluding proviso of section ten of the act described in the title hereof shall not be held to prevent the necessary printing, as heretofore done, in the Executive Departments and the bureaus thereof by their own employes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer an amendment that I think will meet the objection that was made yesterday. It is to insert at the end of the bill, "but the number of persons employed in this service shall not be increased."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am told they have but a single compositor engaged in that service.

Mr. GRIMES. What service?

Mr. ANTHONY. That this bill authorizes; that is, for printing the transfers on the back of the bonds and for printing labels to go around the bonds and notes, which labels are printed upon the refuse paper of the bonds returned, the paper cut into narrow strips, and printed from stereotyped plates there.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, then, who are the compositors that set up the Secretary's report, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue's report, and the President's message in some cases—documents that bear the imprint of the Treasury Department of the United States?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not able to answer that; but those documents that I have seen have been very few indeed. I have seen nothing but the President's message, which I suppose has been set up there for more convenience on account of its confidential character, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It would take one compositor but a few days to do that.

Mr. GRIMES. I think one of the greatest nuisances about the Treasury Department—and I apprehend there is more than one—is the printing establishment. I understand from the superintending architect that the printing establishment there is destroying the building. That printing establishment has grown up without any authority of law whatever. We have printing capacity enough at the Government Printing Office to do all the printing, and it can be done just as safely, just as well, and much more economically there than it can be done at the Treasury Department. I believe we have also a printing establishment at the War Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. We have a printing establishment at the War Department which has grown up also without any authority of law, so far as I know. I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing if there was any authority for establishing a printing office in the War Department?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not aware of any.

Mr. GRIMES. I think there is no authority anywhere to establish any of them. Now, as they have engaged in it, this bill merely declares that they shall go on and be permitted to print as heretofore, provided they do not increase the amount of their clerical force. Who knows what amount of clerical force they have there now? Is the Senator able to tell us? For the specific work which General Spinner wants authority to print he only wants two compositors; but for how many other purposes they desire compositors nobody can tell. I know that there are a great many compositors employed in the Treasury Department by somebody, under some sort of guise.

Mr. ANTHONY. The printing to which the Senator from Iowa alludes as endangering the building, if at all, must be the printing of the bonds and notes. That must be done in the Treasury building. No one, I fancy, would recommend that the securities of the Government should be printed at the Public Printing Office. They must be printed in the Treasury building.

Mr. GRIMES. Why so?

Mr. ANTHONY. For security. I think it would be very unsafe that those should be where they could be for one moment out of the superintendence of the confidential Treasury officers.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know why there should be any more necessity to do that printing in the Treasury Department than to print the national currency there; and that is not printed there; it is all printed in New York.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is at the risk of the banks.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; at the risk of the United States until after it is delivered to the banks.

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill does not affect that printing at all. I do not think that the bill is at all necessary; I think that the Departments have all the authority that this bill confers upon them, and I believe all the Secretaries that have hitherto had printing done in their Departments continue to do it, except the Secretary of the Treasury. He has had so many hard knocks in both Houses of Congress, and has been so continually complained of here, that he puts a stricter construction on the law than either of the other Secretaries. I am perfectly willing that this bill should read, if it will suit the Senator from Iowa better:

Provided, That not more than two compositors shall be employed in such service.

They assure me at the Department that they have but one there. I will consent to that, instead of the other amendment, if it is preferred.

Mr. GRIMES. If they have only one now, why give them another?

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought we might give them a little lee-way. Sometimes they may want two perhaps. I have introduced this amendment and called up this bill at the request of General Spinner, the Treasurer, who informs me that he considers it very important indeed to the convenient and economical dispatch of business in his department. I think the practice of having general printing done in the Departments is entirely wrong. I think I mentioned yesterday that the subject had come to the attention of the joint Committee on Printing, and that we were preparing a bill to require all the printing to be done at the Government Printing Office; but before presenting that to the Senate we wished to confer with the heads of Departments and ascertain what necessity there was for any printing there, and to give them as much privilege of that kind as should be thought proper. I have no sort of desire about this bill except to accommodate the Treasury Department. I think it ought to pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. I interposed an objection to this bill yesterday; but I am entirely satisfied, so far as the object as stated to me is concerned, that the bill ought to pass. The Treasury Department are printing certain blanks and forms and indorsements on bonds. For instance, yesterday one bank exchanged four hundred securities, one security for another, to the amount of nearly half a million dollars. It would not have been very proper or safe to send those in charge of a messenger to the Public Printing Office, and have them transferred there. They have a printing press in the Treasury to do this work, and it is executed promptly in the presence of the Treasurer himself, or his authorized agent for that express purpose. To the extent of printing all the necessary blanks, forms, envelopes, &c., in the Treasury Department, the bill ought to pass. My fear was yesterday that under pretense of this law they would transfer other printing to the Treasury and other Departments, and print the documents that the Senator from Iowa refers to, that is, messages and documents that ought properly to be printed in the Public Printing Office; but on the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island, that they could not be effected under the operation of this bill, I am perfectly willing that it shall pass. The force now employed is very small. I am told by the Treasurer there are scarcely any. There are but one or two compositors, and with that force they certainly could not commit any very great abuse. I therefore have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. How does the bill read as it is now amended?

The Chief Clerk read the amended bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the concluding proviso of section ten of the act described in the title hereof shall not be held to prevent the necessary printing, as heretofore done, in the Executive Departments and the bureaus thereof by their own employes; but the number of persons employed in this service shall not be increased.

Mr. ANTHONY. There seems to be a good deal of jealousy on this subject, and I am willing that it should read "Treasury Department" instead of "Executive Departments," if that will make the bill more acceptable to Senators. I think that is the only Department that so construes the law. The question, however, will arise, if we pass a bill giving special permission to the Treasury Department, whether it will not be construed as prohibiting the other Departments, although no other Department puts this construction upon the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The War Department print their general orders, and that is proper. They must do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly, it is a very great convenience for them to print their general orders there.

Mr. SHERMAN. They must be printed there, because they are confidential orders to military commanders put in printed form, and it is better not to send them to the General Public Printing Office.

Mr. GRIMES. We are in the habit of printing in confidence treaties, nominations, and everything of that kind. They have a confidential bureau connected with the national Printing Office, and these War Department orders could be printed there with just exactly the same secrecy and with as great celerity as they are printed in the War Department. Such a thing was never thought of until within the last few years as allowing printing to be done either in the Treasury Department or the War Department. It is an abuse that sprang up during the war. It might have been a necessity at one time, but now it is proposed to continue it through all time, after the war has ceased.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think at the next session there can be a bill proposed that will meet the views of the Senate on this question. I think there is no difference of opinion upon it, but I am of the opinion from what the Treasurer has told me that this printing is very desirable for the convenience and for the economy of the Department. I see the Senator from Maine on his feet, and will say no more about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt, as a matter of time, that it is important, but I do not see the use of extending this privilege beyond the Treasury Department. I think it ought to be confined to the Treasury Department. I will ask how does it read now?

Mr. ANTHONY. It reads "the Executive Departments." I will amend it so as that it shall refer only to the Treasury Department; but no other Department construes the law in this way, and I think the Treasury Department does not construe it correctly. It is merely because the Secretary thinks Congress has been pretty hard on him, and he is afraid of being charged with disregarding the law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the other Departments do not construe it in this way, they will go on as heretofore, I suppose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Unless this bill, by specially excepting the Treasury Department, may make the other construction more imperative on the other Departments. However, I am willing that the bill shall be amended in the way suggested, and then if the other Departments want relief they can come and get it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will be better. I am not aware that there is any printing establishment in the other Departments at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. There has been in the War Department, and I am not sure but that there has been in the Interior Department. A great deal of printing has been done in the Departments that I think ought not to have been done there, but I do not think this comes under that class.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This grew up in consequence of the printing that was carried on there of our bills and notes and bonds and those things. It was found convenient and, at the same time, economical. It was found that divers sundry little things could be done there instantly when called for, at a saving of time and money. There is a printing establishment there, and we have made an appropriation of some one or two hundred thousand dollars to erect a building for the express purposes of this printing.

Mr. GRIMES. We have not done it yet.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know there is a difficulty between the architect and somebody else on the subject; but we have so far recognized it as to put up the building, because it will be absolutely necessary to continue for some length of time the printing of bonds and notes; and this printing can be as well done, and more economically, and better done at the Department; but I do not see the use of extending it to other Departments, and it ought not to be extended to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to amend the bill in lines seven and eight by striking out the words "Executive Departments" and inserting "Treasury Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS ON VENEZUELA.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the message of the President, communicating the copy of a convention with the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic, and inviting the action of Congress in order to carry out that convention, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report a bill. As there can be no question with regard to the bill, and as it is important that it should be acted upon promptly, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with it now. It is simply to carry the treaty into execution.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 138) to carry into effect the convention with the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic was read twice by its title and considered as in Committee of the Whole. For the purpose of carrying into effect the convention with the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic, signed at Caracas on the 25th of April, 1866, the commissioner (to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate,) is to be allowed a compensation in full for his services of $3,000, and $10 a day in commutation of traveling expenses for the time actually and necessarily occupied in going from the place of his residence to Caracas and returning to his home after the termination of his duties.

If the President of the United States shall elect to appoint the minister resident of the United States in Venezuela to perform the duties of commissioner under the convention, such minister is to receive a compensation for his services of fifty per cent. of the sum before mentioned, pursuant to the provisions of the ninth section of the act of August 18, 1856, "to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States."

The President is also authorized to make such provision for the contingent expenses of the commission under the convention, including the moiety of the United States for the compensation of the umpire and of the secretary who may be chosen by the commissioners pursuant to the provisions of the convention, as he shall deem just and proper; and such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act are appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the Senate to take up the little bill which I introduced yesterday, in regard to which I think there can be no question, to amend the charter of the city of Washington.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask to hear the bill read for information.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That in the District of Columbia no person shall be excluded from any office by reason of race or color, and all laws making any such discrimination are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill for consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON rose.

Mr. SUMNER. There will be no debate on that.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts says there will be no debate on that question.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course I will not debate it, but I know there are Senators here who will debate it. When the Senate adjourned yesterday evening we had under consideration a bill of very great importance, and we should settle it in some way. It is the pending question; it is the matter now in order; and I shall object to taking up anything until that bill is disposed of. It is a matter of vital importance, one that will save the Government an immense amount of money in the one way and will leave us subject to an immense amount of tax in the other way, in my judgment, accordingly as it shall be decided. It involves millions and millions of money. This other matter can be postponed until we dispose of it, and I therefore object to the consideration of anything until the bill to which I refer is disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no disposition to antagonize my bill against the bill of the Senator; but will the Senator bear in mind that his bill is in order at one o'clock? It is not yet one o'clock. This bill can be passed in a very few minutes. I have no idea anybody wishes to discuss it. I believe it would have been passed before now if the Senator had not interposed his objection. I ask him therefore to let it be proceeded with. He has the floor at one o'clock on his bill, and I am very desirous to speed the action of the Senate on his bill. As I have now made the motion with regard to my bill, I submit that it had better be finished. There can be no objection to it. I hope the Senator will withdraw his opposition and let it be considered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will inquire of the Chair whether, if the bill to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers shall be taken up, the Indian bill will be the business in order at one o'clock?

Mr. SUMNER. Of course it will. There is no doubt about that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill of the Senator from Missouri is the unfinished business of yesterday, and it will be in order at one o'clock; that is, it will be the duty of the Chair to call it up at that time. It will be under the control of the Senate, of course.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I withdraw any objection at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the bill being taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is under the control of the Senate, I suppose.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us hear the bill read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest before the words "all laws" to insert the words "so much of." You do not want to repeal the whole of the laws.

Mr. SUMNER. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator from Massachusetts was the author of the proposition that the colored people should vote. He made the commencement of that policy with the District of Columbia. He now claims—and I believe his party friends have come up to his position—that that is to be made universal throughout the States. I suppose he will be frank enough to inform us whether it is intended as the commencement of the policy that negroes shall be allowed to become office-holders, to hold both Federal and State offices throughout the country; whether he regards this as the inauguration of that policy? I suppose he does from the fact that he expressed with a great deal of warmth the other day the desire that he might see colored Senators here in a very short time. If we are to regard it as the inauguration of the policy it is well enough to know it.

Mr. SUMNER. Question.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in; the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I guess we had better have the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, and Johnson—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—23.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 180) supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon.

COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate providing for the addition of one member of the Senate and two members of the House to the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, and had appointed Messrs. T. A. JENCKES, of Rhode Island, and J. F. BENJAMIN, of Missouri, such additional members on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, the additional member of the joint select Committee on Retrenchment on the part of the Senate.

RELIEF OF DESERTERS.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. J. M. ASHLEY of Ohio, Mr. AMASA COBB of Wisconsin, and Mr. C. E. PHELPS of Maryland, managers on the part of the House.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate adhered to its amendment to House bill No. 108.

A subsequent message from the House of Representatives announced that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 108, and agreed to the same.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A subsequent message announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 180) supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867;

A bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon; and

A bill (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain soldiers and sailors therein designated.

PEACE WITH INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 136) to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes; the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. HOWE, to strike out the second second section of the bill, as amended, in these words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners are required to examine a district of country lying north of the State of Nebraska, west of the Missouri river, and east of the traveled routes to Montana Territory, upon the waters of the White Earth, the Cheyenne, and the Little Missouri rivers, south of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, of sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains and north of the Platte river and the State of Iowa; in which district there shall be a sufficient quantity of tillable land to enable the said tribes to support themselves by labor, and if suited to that purpose to select and describe the same. Said territory, when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain a permanent home for the Indians located thereon, secured to said Indians, subject only to the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not think this section ought to be stricken out, with the view I take of the subject. There are several points, however, suggested by the bill in relation to which I desire to submit a very few remarks, and I will be as brief as possible, and follow the order in which they arise in the bill.

The object of the bill, I suppose, is approved by every member of the Senate, it being its purpose, as I understand it, to remove the Indians from the Plains immediately west of the settlements in Kansas and Nebraska with a view of greater security of life and property on the great lines of travel between the States on the Missouri river and the Rocky mountains, and ultimately the Pacific coast. These Plains are now infested, it is said, by a few bands of Indians, numbering about sixteen hundred warriors, that are hostile to the United States and committing constant depredations on individuals and property. Some of them occupy a portion of this territory under treaty stipulations, but as they are now engaged in hostilities their rights under the treaties of course have been abandoned, and the Government would have the right to remove them. It is thought they can be removed by peaceful means more successfully than by a more vigorous prosecution of the war against them; and hence the committee propose the appointment of commissioners to see them and treat with them. I think, however, the committee have made a mistake in attempting to appoint the commissioners in the bill itself; and in connection with this suggestion I ask their attention to the provisions of the Constitution, and also to what has been the policy of the Government from the beginning. The Constitution of the United States says:

"He [the President] shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties."

I know of no instance in which Congress has attempted, through its own legislative machinery, or through the action of individuals appointed by Congress, to make a treaty, either with the Indian tribes or with foreign Powers; and I see no necessity, if it were not unconstitutional, in attempting now to depart from what has been heretofore the policy of the Government. "With a view of testing the judgment of the Senate on this subject, at the proper time, if no one else shall do so, I will move to amend that section so as to authorize the President to appoint commissioners to negotiate with these Indians.

That brings me to the second section of the bill, which proposes that these commissioners when appointed shall make a selection of territory north of the north line of Nebraska, on which to locate the Indians that are now residing north of the Platte river. The exact question now pending is the motion to strike out that section of the bill, under the belief on the part of the Senator from Wisconsin who made the motion, [Mr. HOWE,] that all these Indians might be removed to what is called the Indian Territory, south of the State of Kansas and west of the State of Arkansas. I think, perhaps, that Senator has not reflected that these Indians could not probably live in peace with the Indians now located in that Territory. The most of the Indians now engaged in hostilities are a wild, nomadic people, who live by the chase almost exclusively. I do not think they make any attempt to cultivate the soil, or to live by pastoral pursuits of any kind; and they would be as dangerous to the peace and quiet of the civilized Indians in the Indian Territory as they now are to the white settlers on the frontier. But, besides that, it would be exceedingly difficult to induce them to remove.

Mr. HOWE. Upon that point will the Senator allow me to suggest to him whether the second section of this very bill does not propose to send the Cheyennes down into this very country, and if they are not Indians for all the world cousins-german to the Sioux, who, the Senator says, cannot be sent there?

Mr. HARLAN. I will come to that presently, but for the time being will state that the Cheyennes are divided, and part of them have for a long time been inhabiting the southern part of the Plains, and part of them have been living north.

But, sir, this section seems to contemplate an arrangement with other tribes of Indians residing on the spurs of the mountains, and east of them, as well as those actually engaged in hostilities. There are the Crows and the Blackfeet, who have inhabited this region of country for centuries, and who are as much attached to the soil, doubtless, as the white people are attached to their homes, and they would be as difficult to remove as the people of Switzerland would be from the hills on which they have resided for centuries.

Mr. HOWE. I understand by the first section of the bill that these commissioners are only to treat with those Indians who are engaged in hostilities with the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator will pardon me for calling his attention to the fourth section of the bill, which seems to contemplate the negotiation of treaties with all those tribes.

Mr. HOWE. I am aware of that section. If that shall continue to be a part of the bill then the Senator's remarks will be in point.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not think, Mr. President, it would be wise at this time to attempt to remove all these tribes of Indians from the extreme north to the extreme southern portion of this territory. It would be difficult to do it by force, and I am quite sure they would not consent to go.

But there is an additional fact in connection with this feature of the subject, to which I should like to have the attention of the members of the committee; and that is, that they propose but one district of country or one reservation. Doubtless they know, and on my calling their attention to it will be aware of the fact that these Indians do not live in harmony with each other; that they are from time to time engaged in hostilities, and are at enmity with each other from age to age; and if an effort should be made to crowd them all on one reservation, it would be laying the foundation for their extermination by the hostilities of each with the other. Hence I think that section of the bill, if it should not be stricken out, ought to be modified so as to allow the commissioners to select "reservations" instead of "a reservation," with a view of locating those that are hostile to each other at remote points from each other, with a view to their living in peace and harmony, not only with the people of the United States, but with each other.

The third section proposes to select a similar district "south of the State of Kansas, and west of the State of Arkansas, including the present Indian Territory, or such part of it as may be necessary." I think that section ought not to be adopted in its present shape. As I before remarked, these Indians are civilized, at least a very large proportion of them. There are in the neighborhood of sixty thousand Indians now residing in this Indian Territory. Perhaps one-half of them, in point of general intelligence and civilization, will compare favorably with the white people of any of the States. They do not live by the chase, but by agricultural pursuits. They have a written language, and live under written laws enacted by legislatures regularly constituted. In addition to this, they own the land in fee-simple. The Government of the United States has no more legal right to oust them from their possessions than it would have to oust you, sir, from the homestead on which you live. These Indians, however, have, in treaties that were ratified about a year since, ceded to the United States as trustee for the use of other civilized Indians a part of this territory; but they were very careful to include in those treaties the provision that it was to be for the use of other civilized Indians; bringing me to the point before named, that they would be as much endangered by the location of hostile tribes of Indians in their immediate vicinity as white people would be; and if we now were to even take that portion of the territory that has been ceded to the United States for the purposes named and bestow it on wild, uncultivated savage tribes of Indians, and bring them into the immediate vicinity of these civilized tribes, and thus endanger their peace and quiet, in my opinion the United States would be breaking faith with these Indians in so gross a manner as not to justify itself to the approval of any member of this body. If that clause in the bill, therefore, should stand, it ought, in my opinion, to be amended so as to preserve to the Indians now residing in that Territory the rights that they can properly claim under the treaties that have been ratified between the United States and them since the termination of the war of the rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to amend the section before it is stricken out.

Mr. HARLAN. When the proper time comes, if the committee, or other members of the Senate, should not remove the objections that I have to the section as it now stands, I will make a motion to amend it in the manner suggested.

This brings me to the fourth section of the bill, by which these commissioners, when appointed—

With a view to the ultimate concentration of all the Indians named in sections two and three of this act on the reservations selected, are authorized to make such treaties with tribes now at peace with the United States as will tend to facilitate that object or remove obstructions from the lines of travel as aforesaid.

I do not doubt but that I approve the intention of the committee in drafting that section of the bill; but it seems to me that it is too broad, and it ought to be modified so as to exclude from its purview the Indians who are now residing in peace and quiet on reservations assigned to them under treaties between them and the United States. There are from thirty-five to forty thousand Indians residing on reservations in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, a large part of whom live by agricultural pursuits. They are living in peace and quiet. They have not engaged in any of the hostile raids made by the wild tribes of the Plains, either on the laborers on the railroads or on the settlements or on transportation trains. They are living in strict conformity with their treaty obligations with the United States; and I do not think we should authorize, and perhaps it was not the intention of the committee to authorize these commissioners to unsettle these tribes of Indians at this time. This bill, as I suppose, ought to be confined to the removal of the difficulties, the extraordinary condition of things now existing on the Plains; and the Indians living on these reservations in the States to which I have referred, living in peace and quiet, in strict conformity with their treaty stipulations, ought to be permitted to remain there, and these commissioners should be authorized only to make treaties with such peaceful Indians as are not residing on reservations in pursuance of treaties.

With such amendments as these, I can vote very cheerfully for the bill. I think the committee are on the right track, and perhaps, if they had had a little more time to mature it, the bill would have included the suggestions that I have made, or those that would have been wiser.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have made up my mind to vote for this bill, although it contains some provisions that I do not approve. As we are on the eve probably of serious Indian hostilities that will tend to prevent the construction of the Pacific railroad and the settlement of the western country, I should vote for almost any measure to bring about a cessation of hostilities with a view to some final settlement of the controversy.

I should have said nothing in regard to this measure but for some observations made by my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] in regard to General Pope and the management of military affairs on the western plains, which I think probably did some injustice to General Pope. My own opinion is that the only true settlement of our Indian difficulties is to absorb the Indians in our general population. Our settlements are now spread so much over the whole extent of our territory that there is no room for the Indian to pursue his nomadic mode of life. He must adopt, to some extent, the habits of civilization or starve, or else be fed by the bounty of the Government. Settlements have now reached every portion of the western country. Utah, Montana, Nevada, Colorado, all these Territories have settlements and organized governments. The Indian is driven from his home; he is driven from his hunting grounds; he cannot subsist in any portion of the western territory without the aid of the national Government. He has either, therefore, to make war upon us and rob and plunder the white people, or else he has got to give way to the march of civilization.

This may be inhuman, but it has been the whole course of Indian affairs since the first settlement of white men in this country. Even within my recollection, and that does not go very far back, many Indians lived in Ohio on reservations, on which they had churches, schools, and colleges, in which many of them were educated, Christianized; they had preachers of the Gospel and teachers of schools among them; and yet such was the state of natural hostility between our Indian population and the white people around them that they were driven from their homes. The white people, in violation of treaty, in violation of law, continually encroached upon the Indians, provoked quarrels which finally led to the interposition of military power, and the last vestige of the Indians were at last driven from their cultivated homes into Kansas; and the tribe which once probably owned nearly one fourth of our whole western country is now almost out of existence, the great Wyandotte tribe. I believe there are not five hundred of that tribe left to tell the tale of the disappearance of their race.

This must necessarily be so. As our white population progress westward over the Plains they will either absorb the Indian population or kill it off. It may be hard; but such is the fate of all barbarous communities, all wild tribes, when they come in contact with civilized tribes. If we attempt to absorb them by putting them on reservations the same hostility continues. The result is that tribe after tribe will gradually disappear, until finally the remnant of the tribe either go off and join some other tribes or become vagrants in our streets, and finally disappear entirely from the race of human beings. You cannot stop or change that law of nature.

There is, therefore, in my judgment, no solution of the Indian trouble except the gradual and humane absorption into our general population of all the Indian tribes, and all our legislation should be based upon that view. You may make all the treaties that can be written by lawyers or by officers, and those treaties will not be observed. Take the very case now before us. You made a treaty with the Cheyenne Indians, one of the hostile tribes, by which you set apart to them forever as a part of their hunting grounds the upper valley of the very river over which you are now building a railroad. By the stipulations of the treaty with the Sioux Indians you have no right to go upon any portion of their territory, except the right to pass over the main emigrant route by way of the South Pass to the Pacific. That was reserved. The very reservation of that route excluded all others. The Indians owned the country north of that line and south of that line. They roamed over it. That treaty was not violated until it was necessary for us to send out a force against Utah, when General Johnston selected a better route to Utah, and went then over the route that is now to be the route of the great Union Pacific railroad; that is, by the Catchpole creek. He went up then by what is called the Cheyenne Pass, and so across over into Laramie Plains, and on to Utah. Then for the first time this route was laid out in express violation of the treaty that had been made not long before. Now what would prevent the United States officers going there?

Not only that, my honored friend complained that General Pope established three military stations on the Powder river. How did that come about? This very Congress authorized the construction of a military road, appropriated money to build a military road on that very line. It was absolutely necessary to do so from our stand-point, from our view. Why? Because mines had been discovered in Montana, north of Utah. There was no way to get to Montana except to go through Salt Lake City and then go northward. It was a long way around. Our people would not go a long way around when they could go a more direct way, especially if there were nothing but Indians and wild beasts in the way. The result was they made a road themselves up by the Powder river, along the base of the mountain, and followed it two or three hundred miles. Shortly afterward the delegates from that region asked us for an appropriation to aid them in building a military road there. Congress granted it. It was an express violation of the treaty. It was a new road in the region of country and the best region of country that was lived upon by the Indians. It was authorized by Congress: money was appropriated; and your officers were sent out there, and bridges were constructed on this very route by the United States.

What was then to be done by the military authorities? Were General Pope and the soldiers under his command to stand there where that route diverged from the great Plain route to Fort Laramie? The white settlers went there on the road built by the national Government, and it became the duty of the military officers to protect them. The result was that an order was issued, not by General Pope, but an order was issued from the headquarters here of the Army of the United States, directing that protection should be given to the people traveling along the highway built by the United States Government. In order to give them protection these military forts were required. Three of them were ordered to be erected along the line of the route. Fort Phil. Kearney was erected as one of them. Remember, the whole of this country, every foot of it, was set apart for the occupation of these Indians; and yet we authorized a road to be constructed here, I think from Laramie to Montana. The whole of that country was Indian country, and reserved for the Indians. If, therefore, there was any violation of law it was Congress that did it, and all the military officers did was simply to protect our own people traveling over a route that had been laid out by the national Government. In the course of that three military forts were required. Fort Phil. Kearney was one of them, and it was at Fort Phil. Kearney that the massacre of Lieutenant Fetterman and his band took place, or very near there. As a matter of course there could be no fault found with General Pope.

But my friend from Missouri read an extract from General Pope's report which made an impression upon me rather unfavorable to General Pope. It seemed as if General Pope treated this subject with a degree of levity. On the contrary, after reading the dispatch I find that I can indorse every word that General Pope says, and I have no doubt Senators will make the same observation when they come to read it carefully. General Pope is giving simply a narration of his view of Indian affairs on the western plains. He had recently gone over the whole country, and toward the close of his letter he says:

"A reference to my communications on this subject for the past twelve months will exhibit the fact that I have repeatedly warned the Government that the Indian war now upon us was inevitable, and that no reliance whatever could be placed upon treaties of peace such as had been negotiated."

We know that now; so that he was a prophet:

"The peace commissioners promise the Indian, in the first place, that the whites shall not go into the Indian country, knowing well that it is impossible to fulfill such a promise."

And yet this bill as it is reported contains that very promise, which every one of us knows cannot and will not be complied with. General Pope here says that the peace commissioners—not the Army officers, for they do not make treaties, but agents sent out from the Interior Department—make stipulations that they know themselves never have been and never will be observed. That is so. The stipulations contained in all these treaties were violated, yea, they were violated before we ratified the treaties, and we never looked at the treaties when we authorized the opening of these roads and the construction of the Pacific railroad. Why, sir, the construction of the Pacific railroad, each and every branch of it, is an express violation of an Indian treaty. What right had we to authorize the Union Pacific Railroad Company to build a line of railroad up along the Catchpole creek and the Cheyenne Pass and over the Laramie Plains on the best road to Utah and California? We had expressly agreed that the route of travel over these Plains should be confined to two main lines, one down south through Texas and another by way of the South Pass. The South Pass is more than a hundred miles north of the very line we authorized a railroad to be constructed over, and the Union Pacific railroad now is being constructed, under our law, right over the region of country that we expressly reserved to these Indian tribes.

Why, sir, you read in this morning's paper the account of the attack by the Indians upon our party at Fort Wallace. What caused that attack? It was an engineering corps exploring a line for a railroad, running their levels, with the compass, the chain, and all the implements they use to lay out a railroad. The Indians saw this. They knew what was coming after them. They knew that was but the precursor of a railroad. They knew that a railroad was to be built there. They, therefore, made the attack to prevent the railroad from being built there.

Mr. HENDERSON. We attacked them.

Mr. SHERMAN. According to the newspaper account this morning we did not attack them; they attacked us.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have here General Wright's report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am speaking of the newspaper account.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have here General Wright's report. The Indians were not attacking the surveying party at all. They were attacking the fort, the military; but General Wright sent out his escort, who had charge of the surveying party, to help the soldiers at the fort, and immediately thereafter a detachment of the Indians came out and met our attacking party, and in that way the fight commenced.

Mr. SHERMAN. How came that fort to be located there? Simply to protect a route that had been marked out by an act of Congress. If we were talking about special demurrers we might say our laws did not authorize them to go over this particular route; but our laws, without exception or qualification or reference to any Indian treaty, authorized these companies to go on the most direct, feasible, and proper route for a railroad from such a point to such a point; and there was no reference to any exception or any Indian treaty. According to the treaty, we had no right to build a railroad except by way of the South Pass, and then we must keep along the traveled route, because that is the language of the treaty; but we authorized the opening of these wagon-roads and the building of railroads, and our military men established forts in order to protect the people building them and in order to protect the people who were going to Montana and to Utah.

If you ask me who is wrong about this matter, I say that the white people are wrong in one sense for invading the land of the Indians and for violating the treaty stipulations made with them; but, on the other hand, I say that it is the will of Providence that these races must give way to the march of civilization; and although always in these great movements cruelty may be the result, yet in the end great good comes to the human family. Although, in my judgment, the Indians are hardly dealt with, although we have violated our promises to them, yet, whatever promises we make, we cannot protect them from the inevitable destiny by which they must disappear from the face of the earth or be absorbed in the white population of this country. If that is a cruel idea, it is made cruel by the logic of events. It is a part of that higher law which will not be controlled by the simple agencies of your statutes or by any act of ordinary human beings.

I say, therefore, our military officers were not wrong in what they did here, because they simply carried into execution the laws of Congress. It would not do for General Pope to stop and inquire and say that the Indian treaty being anterior to and of superior force to the law of Congress, therefore the Indian treaty must be observed and not the law of Congress. We would not tolerate that for a moment. These military officers must not stop to inquire into the validity of a law. They must obey their orders. They must leave the law-making power to judge of the law and the courts to construe it. They must execute the orders that are given. Therefore when an order is given to a military officer to protect a particular line of travel, that includes the right to build forts for the protection of that line of travel and to use all the necessary aids and agencies and means. It seems to me, therefore, that there is no ground for criticising either the declarations or the acts of General Pope in laying out and locating these forts and in maintaining his authority there. What he says is literally true, that the peace commissioners have put in these treaties stipulations that never have been and never will be complied with. It is not the fault of the Army officers: the fault is in making stipulations or promises to the Indians when we have a moral certainty that those stipulations cannot and will not be performed. He goes on to say:

"The peace commissioners promise the Indian, in the first place, that the whites shall not go into the Indian country."

That is contained in all our treaty stipulations.

"This is the first and most persistent demand of the Indian, a demand readily conceded, but never executed. Other provisions are inserted in the treaty equally certain to remain unfulfilled. The Indian has lost all confidence in such promises, and only makes a treaty to secure the money and supplies which accompany it."

That is true.

"In this unscrupulous manner treaties are made and violated on both sides, and in this manner they will continue to be made unless some change in our Indian system is effected."

Is not that true? I appeal to every Senator who is familiar with the subject to know if it is not true that we have ourselves violated these treaties whenever they stood in our way. If a little settlement of one hundred white people on the top of the highest hills of the Rocky mountains should call on us for aid and protection against the Indians, or if they should discover gold in any valley of that vast region, and our settlers from all parts of the country should go there, I ask whether any Indian treaty would stop or stay the current of emigration thither? We know it would not. If the whole Army of the United States stood in the way, the wave of emigration would pass over it to seek the valley where gold was to be found. They never look at your Indian treaties and do not care anything about them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then why should we follow them up?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see the use of making these stipulations. What General Pope says is true, that we have in an unscrupulous manner made and violated our treaties, and put in those treaties stipulations that we knew could not and would not be observed. Why, sir, I have here, I sent to the Library and got the famous treaty of Grenville, made by General Wayne I think in 1805 or 1806, by which it was stipulated with certain Indian tribes that a large portion of the State of Ohio should forever belong to the Indians, that they should be divided by a geographical line from the white people. How long was that treaty observed? Not one year; and now the very region of country that was set aside for the Indian tribes in Ohio contains over a million white people. General Wayne, Mr. Jefferson who approved the treaty, and all who took part in it simply made a stipulation which they had no power to perform, and no human agency, no human power could have enabled them to carry out the stipulations of that treaty.

I believe that if you should gather these Indian tribes within the region of country described in this bill the white people would invade them. In the first place, I think you give them land that they cannot occupy. They cannot go upon the lands that are described in the second section of the bill and make a living. It is not a place where they could find either their food or their clothing. The buffalo would never enter upon any portion of that territory, because the buffalo always keeps where the grass is good and where he can find something to eat. The land that you propose to give to the northern reservation has been known as the bad land of that country since the French first crossed those Plains. When you leave the valleys of the Plains, you reach a high and arid region where there are no summer rains, where they cannot have irrigation, and where the grass withers and parches, and where neither an Indian nor a snail can live.

Therefore, I say, if you would carry literally into effect the terms of this bill, you would make a condition that it would be impossible to perform, and, therefore, you would come within the criticism of General Pope, every word of whose declarations on this subject is perfectly true.

My own opinion is that there is no solution of our Indian troubles until we regard the Indians as subjects of the United States, to be dealt with kindly and humanely, to be fed where necessary, to be clothed where necessary, to be treated as a great Government should treat the wards of the Government until they are educated and able to support themselves. The true way, in my judgment, would be to put them on small reservations as a means of tuition only; but the very moment the wave of settlement comes to these reservations, let them be absorbed in the general population, with the right to vote, to hold office, and do whatever a man can do. That is the only way in which you can civilize them. There are Indians from all the tribes that have lived in the United States that are now respectable citizens of the United States, and I can recall to mind men among them who would be worthy to adorn this Chamber, men of education and ability. The only way, however, that you can educate the Indians is first by inoculating them with all the vices as well as all the virtues of Christian civilization. In that process one half of them will disappear, and the other half may possibly make pretty good citizens of the United States. But this thing of keeping them apart, separated from the white population, as a caste to be governed by the whites without any authority here, without any political power, will always fail to succeed, and in the end will lead to war and the extirpation of the Indian tribes.

I have said all I desire to say on this subject. I shall vote for any measure that will put off an Indian war. It is an inglorious contest—one in which our Army certainly does not desire to take any part. They can gain no reputation by fighting with these Indians. Indeed, the only way to fight with them is by assuming their own weapons. It may seem hard for us to burn villages, as General Hancock did, to murder women and children; but how are you going to fight with savages? I wish that every Senator here could travel over the Plains and see the habits and character of these Indian tribes. I saw a part of the very band which committed these massacres; that is, the old men and the women and children. I noticed that there were no males among them between the ages of twenty and forty, or scarcely any. The old chiefs were there, and they would talk peace and smoke the pipe with you as often as you chose, and the women and children would beg of you, while their young men were on the war path two or three hundred miles away.

How are you going to fight the Sioux band of Indians; the band that destroyed Lieutenant Fetterman with ninety-four men, entrapped them in an ambuscade, and then killed every man of them, mutilating their bodies, scalping them, deforming them in the most odious and revolting manner, until not a single person was left to tell the tale? How are you to deal with those people? Would you follow them? Why, sir, you might as well follow the wind. On their light ponies, armed with their native weapon, the bow and arrow, with the expertness of the Arab, yea, with more than the expertness of any branch of the human family, they send over the Plains, and your infantry and cavalry might as well chase the wind. You cannot fight them in that way. The only way to fight the Indian is to go to his wigwam where his women and children are left, capture them if you choose and hold them as prisoners of war, or rather as I would do, I think, if I had the power, I would bring back the women and children into the settlements and keep them there, far beyond the reach of their husbands and fathers. I would not hang them nor slaughter them, but I would feed them. You never can defeat the Indian by attacking the Indian himself. You must go to his habitation, for, after all—you call him semi-civilized—he is an affectionate creature, who, sooner or later, will come back to the buffalo robe that covers his wife and his children; and if you have the control over their persons, you have the control over him, and only in that way.

Sir, it is impossible to pursue these Indians over the Plains with our troops unless you adopt the western mode of fighting, and our friends here would revolt at the old manner of fighting the Indians. Then men who had felt the wrongs of Indian warfare, who had suffered some grievous wrong from them, took up the tomahawk and the scalping knife in Indian fashion. Like Cooper's hero, they assumed the dress and fashion of the Indian, and then the prowess of the white man, even in barbaric virtues, was greater than that of the Indian. By that means alone can you fight the Indian warrior—by assuming his dress, by assuming his weapons, by following upon his track. You may fight him in that way; but who desires to see the United States fight the Indians in that way? That was the way by which the Indians were driven from the States of Pennsylvania, New York, and nearly all the middle States. That was the way by which the Indians were driven from Indiana, and Ohio, and the West. As a matter of course, no one proposes to fight them in this way; but there is no other way of fighting the Indians except either by arming our people in the West in a kind of uncivilized warfare to destroy the Indians, or else to seize their people, men, women, and children, wherever you can find them, and bring them within the reach of civilization, far within our lines. There you can control and manage them.

But, sir, as I said before, I did not intend to take up the time of the Senate, but only to make these remarks, especially in regard to General Pope and the course the military officers generally have seen fit to pursue. It is a very ungracious task I know, and Senators around me know, for some of them have told me, that our officers there are begging on the one hand the white people not to go to the Indians, fighting them off. The people out West want to offer a premium for scalps. They want to resume the old-fashioned way of fighting the Indians. The army stands there as a bulwark against the white as well as a bulwark against the Indians. It is a very unpleasant attitude. Now, if this bill does open a way by which a parley may be brought about, by which we may have some kind of conference with the Indians, which at least will postpone murder and robbery and massacre for a while, I am willing to vote the half a million dollars involved in it, with the hope that some good may result; at least that some delay may be caused in the operations now going on upon the Plains. From the advice we have, a desultory warfare now exists over a region of country nearly eight hundred miles long by three hundred miles wide. If we can stop this warfare by the spending of a considerable sum of money it will be a saving, not only of our funds, but I think of the character of our civilization and the character of our nation.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall vote for this bill as a sort of temporary measure, as the Senator from Ohio has said. I do not believe that any system of this kind will be a permanent settlement. I agree with what the Senator from Ohio has said very fully in regard to that point. The Senator's information, however, differs from mine in one respect. I never have known an Indian tribe go to war and leave their women and children exposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say they did.

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the Senator to say he met their old men, women, and children, and the old men would smoke with him, and the women and children would beg.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true; but at that time the warriors were off north. They professed to be at peace. There was no war then. That was in August of last year; but only three months afterward that particular band of Indians, no doubt the very men then away from their homes, committed the murder of Lieutenant Fetterman and his command.

Mr. POMEROY. They might have gone into war afterward; but my information about Indian warfare is, that when a tribe propose to go to war, the very first thing they do is to remove their lodges and their women and children, and they never leave them exposed. When General Hancock burned a village, the very fact that they had a village ought to have been evidence to him that they were not fighting, for their first business is to destroy their villages themselves. Their villages consist simply of buffalo-skin tents got up in an extemporized and temporary manner. The first business of the tribe when they go to war is to destroy their own villages, move their women and children, and then they select their warriors and make their attack, if an attack is to be made. It ought to have been evidence to General Hancock that that band particularly were not at war, or they would not have had any village for him to burn.

I agree with what the Senator from Iowa has said in regard to trying to get these Indians upon one reservation or two reservations. It cannot be done. If you amend this bill by striking out the second section, and undertake to remove them all into the Indian country, it is a thing preposterous. You might just as well remove them into Delaware; you might just as well remove them into my own State or any other State. These roving bands of hostile Indians who are at war cannot be put down among civilized Indians. If that was attempted they would only destroy each other, and it would only be a hasty effort at extermination. I believe that this commission, instead of being limited, as the bill prescribes, should have more latitude, and instead of selecting one or two reservations, should have discretion to recommend at least several; and then it will be for the action of Congress to approve or disapprove.

I believe, however, religiously, that the only ultimate solution of this whole question is, that the Indian shall take his place among other men and accept the march of civilization, as he must ultimately, or there is nothing except his destiny that awaits him, which is extinction. The fact is, there are battles with fate that can never be won. We may have as many theories on this subject as we please. I believe that these Indians should be concentrated, and let the different tribes take their choice. Those that prefer to go north, let them go north, and those that prefer to go south, let them go south. But they ought not to be put on reservations with other Indians; and it may not be prudent even to put them alongside of civilized Indians. They should be sufficiently removed, so that they will know definitely their limits; and those limits should not interfere with the prescribed limits of other tribes.

This is a most difficult and delicate question, but I can see nothing better than to commit it to a commission with large discretion. I would not limit them in this law to particular localities and defined boundaries. That is an immense country, and let this commission go out there, as there is nothing final in their action, with enlarged powers to find a suitable country for the Indians. If they are prescribed in this statute so that they cannot go where they ought to go, they will simply report that they have not been able under the provisions of this bill to locate them where they ought to be located, and that will be an embarrassment which we shall meet at the next session. Instead of striking out the second section, you ought to put in another section very much like it; that is, that they may examine both the southern and northern country and select one or more reservations, and I would give them enlarged powers, because, after all, they can only recommend. I shall vote for this bill. I like the amendments suggested by the Senator from Iowa, and I hope he will make them.

Mr. HOWE. I do not pretend to be skilled in Indian affairs; but I have taken something of an interest in this question ever since my recent trip to the West, and I think, if I have not a very correct idea, I have got a very fixed idea as to what ought to be done. I have this idea to begin with: that whatever is done, ought to be done at once. The fact is, you are expending from one to two millions a week to defend a widespread frontier population that you must defend, and to protect an already voluminous commerce which is pouring through that country between the Mississippi and the Pacific. You are expending, I say, from one to two millions a week. Hostilities, you are told, actually exist. It is a fact. Blood is running; and why? I think I know why. It is not because anybody wants to fight in the world. I am perfectly satisfied the Indians no more want to fight than we do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nor half as much.

Mr. HOWE. Nor half as much, the Senator from Maine says. Certainly the United States, whatever may be the disposition of individuals, does not want to fight this remnant of Indians. It is just as conclusive, in my mind, that this remnant of Indians do not want to fight the United States; and yet they are fighting, and they are fighting, as I believe, for all the world just for that reason that you have seen two drunken men fight: because in their staggering condition they happened to collide, and because they have not moral force enough to separate themselves. We are fighting just for those reasons. We have come together, these Indians with our frontiers; we have got by the ears; and we as yet have not discovered any way of getting apart. I do think, upon my soul, Mr. President, that this bill tends to a separation in some of its features; and I do think, if the Senate would attend rightly to it, it can be perfected so as to effect a separation, and a separation, I do believe, for all time.

I subscribe almost word by word, and letter by letter, to the gospel just proclaimed here by the Senator from Ohio. I want to make a qualification: it is true historically that the obligations of your treaties have not been attended to or observed at all by our Government or by our people; but it is not true that the American people or the American Government cannot be trusted. The obligations of a treaty will be observed when you find a treaty which ought to be preserved. A title is as secure and as safe in the United States as it is anywhere in the world. When a man claims under a title that ought to be respected, that title is respected here as much as anywhere else. But the trouble is that by your treaties heretofore you have turned out to barbarism immense tracts of country which were needed by civilization. Now, you ought not to do that, and you cannot do it. You must remember that already this population of ours has taken hold of both our coasts, the eastern and the western. You must remember that the emigration of the world is being poured in here, and it will have free course; it will run; and I believe it will be glorified. You cannot any more limit the swash of this population by treaty, than you can protect by treaty the Nahant beach against the surges of the ocean, and you should not try it. Humanity! That is no dictate of humanity which requires that civilization should stand back while barbarism has free scope to disport itself here or elsewhere.

But, Mr. President, while I hold that the highest humanity demands that barbarism and not civilization should give way, I do hold that there is a civilized and a barbarous way also of making barbarism give way. The Senator from Ohio I think has struck the very truth of this matter when he says that these populations must be absorbed. You cannot give them any of these great paths by treaty or otherwise and observe those obligations, for the very reasons he has stated. They have not been observed before; they will not be hereafter.

I had but two purposes in rising. One was, and I have already fulfilled that, to say amen to what the Senator from Ohio has said, and the other was, to add a little by way, as the preachers sometimes say, of practical application. [Laughter.] If it be true that the only way of solving this Indian problem is to civilize and absorb these populations—for certainly the Senator from Ohio would admit that it is idle to talk of absorption until some degree of civilization has preceded it—if it be true that this is the only way to solve this problem, what does that policy dictate to us now?

Remember, Mr. President, and the Senate will remember, that the pending question is upon striking out the second section. What is the second section? It is a proposition instructing this commission to select upon what have been known from the time our first voyagers went over the country between the Mississippi and the mountains as the bad lands, and set apart another large area within which all the Indians east of the Rocky mountains and above the Platte river are to be congregated, and you are to bind them by the stipulations of a treaty to stay there, and you are to bind our people by the stipulations of the same treaty to keep off.

In the first place, I have to say that I believe those Indians are too smart ever to make any such treaty, and it is useless to send any commission out there with any such instructions. In the next place, it would be absolutely impossible to maintain such a treaty, and for two reasons: that very territory selected there fronts Iowa and Minnesota. It is in the path of one column of western emigration that is constantly going toward the mountains. It is right in the path of what will soon be, I believe, the great route to Montana and the country west, and you cannot keep the white people out of it; but if you could, that is not the great difficulty; you could not keep the Indians upon it.

Why, Mr. President, we have already—that is, if you subscribe as heartily to the theory of the Senator from Ohio as I do—agreed that we must commence now to civilize all these Indians, and the Sioux and the Cheyennes among the others. What do you mean by civilization? Teach them gradually to abandon the pursuits of the chase as a means of living, and gradually to learn to obtain their living from the soil. So, then, it is gravely proposed here, with that policy in view, to take these wild Indians of the Plains, who perhaps never saw a hoe in their lives, and who certainly never handled one, and turn them out on the bad lands west of the Missouri as apprentices in the way of agriculture. That is a poor place for them. Take a New England neighborhood; take a neighborhood in Maine, where I was raised, and where they work twenty-six hours a day [laughter] to get a living; take such a population, so hardy, so resolute, so educated to effort, put them out there, and they might live. I would not insure them, but they might live. But it is proposed here to instruct this commission to make these stipulations with a band of savage Indians, to put them up there to learn the business of agriculture. No, sir; put them up there and you would educate them not in this branch of effort, but you would perfect their education in the great business of plundering and killing and starving. Yes, sir; you propose by this second section of the bill to instruct the commission to go out there to collect these hostile tribes, and to ask them, almost in so many words, what they will take to go up there north of Nebraska and the White Earth river, upon the bad lands, and starve to death. That is the proposition that by this second section this commission is instructed to go out there and make to them. I would not send any such proposition.

I said yesterday, when I moved this amendment, that I thought all these Indians should be collected down here in what is known to-day as the Indian Territory. The Senator from Kansas says it cannot be done.

Mr. POMEROY. It cannot.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Kansas repeats that it cannot be done. I have but one reply to make to that, and that is to say it can be done. Yes, I have another reply to make, and that is, it ought to be done. I have one more reply to make, and that is, it must be done, or you never will have permanent peace. Either they must be sent there or those who are there must be sent somewhere else. Mr. President, you have about fifty thousand or sixty thousand Indians down there in that Indian Territory. It is the most capable territory there is in the country. There is a section and a half of land to every man, woman, and child there. Do you suppose that the American people are going to stand back and leave that large quantity? There are not, probably, two acres to a section of it under cultivation, and those the easiest to cultivate, the most productive. I admit these estimates are rough, but there are not probably two acres to a section under cultivation. I know they own these lands by the stipulations of our treaties, just as these other Indians own their lands. You propose to induce them to sell. Why do you not induce these who are down there to sell also? You know that it is for the interest of those men to sell. You know the money we should pay them for the land, properly expended, is worth more to them than the land itself, unoccupied as it is. Why not put these Indians there?

But these are uncivilized, you say; these are barbarous; these are savage; and those down there are semi-civilized; there will be collisions. Are the Indians down there more civilized than our white population on the frontier are? You have got to put them somewhere; and there is danger of their being in contact with somebody. Are you more careful to preserve them from contact with those half-civilized Indians than you are with our own population? Will not your control over them be as ample; will not your means of protection be as adequate for these Indians already there as they will be for our populations, put them where you will?

What, then, is the advantage of putting them there? Why, there is land that hardly an Indian can help cultivating; and he cannot help producing from it if he does cultivate. Whatever you sow grows. There is the place to learn the business of agriculture. There is the place to commence the instruction of these populations. There are streams running through it, I am told, swarming with fish. There is some game left yet. This helps. Your annuities must eke out their support.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the very lessons taught us so forcibly by the Senator from Ohio this morning call upon us to concentrate our efforts at this time upon selecting one reservation, and not a dozen. I have thought this the best one, because I believed it to be the most capable. If there is any other anywhere else, I am just as willing to take that; but I think they had better all be got together. Why cannot these Indians be moved down there? Do you know how large that nation is that we are fighting with? The Indian Bureau, I believe, tell us that of the hostile Sioux bands there are about seven thousand; of the hostile Cheyennes among them there are about eighteen hundred; and of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, who now belong down in this very country under existing treaties, there are about four thousand—altogether thirteen thousand men, women, and children in these nations with which we are at war, and in which we are spending from one to two millions a week.

Some one asked me this morning if it was proposed to board these Indians at a first-class hotel. Well, I told him I had never heard that the proposition was made by any one, but whoever made it was a statesman. [Laughter.] You had better board them at the Fifth Avenue Hotel or anywhere else than undertake to control them by the agency of war; build houses of correction for them; do anything but fight. Now you must fight of course; but I do believe that, sent out with proper instructions, the commission proposed in the first section of this bill would effect an arrangement which would not only postpone this fight, but prevent it, remove the causes for it, make the Indians feel as though at last their good was looked after as well as our own. They can be made to understand that they have no business to lie in the way of the commerce that is already pouring through their country. They can understand that as well as we can. They can be made to understand how important it is to their interests as well as our own that they should get out of the way of it. Only let them see that while we ask them to get out of the way of it we are willing to make them compensation and take care of them elsewhere and I believe they will go quietly. I was assured while I was out in the West, by one of the most experienced agents I think we have in the service of the Government, that whatever fair treaty you made with these Indians would be obeyed implicitly by them; that an order enforcing any treaty that was proper to be made with the Indians, issuing from any of the departments at Washington, would be promptly obeyed. I believe it. Mr. President, I have occupied more time than I intended.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, this discussion thus far has surely, so far as I am concerned at least, thrown a good deal of light upon the subject, and I am very glad indeed that it has taken place. The subject is one of great gravity, great importance. Nobody denies that. We ought to treat it as of that character. There seems to be no doubt of the fact that Indian hostilities exist upon our frontier, and that they have eventuated in many cases in scenes which humanity must deplore, both in regard to the whites and in regard to the Indians themselves. Our first object, as men loving justice and anxious to maintain our own self-respect, is to ascertain what are the real causes of these hostilities and contentions; what are the real grounds of complaint, if there be any on the part of the Indian tribes, which have led them to take up arms, and what wrongs may have been committed by our own people toward the Indian tribes; and after having acquired this information it will then be our duty, an indispensable duty, for us to apply the remedy.

Now, sir, it appears from the statement of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and also from that of the honorable Senator from Ohio, that whatever may have been the conduct of the Indians, the United States had committed wrongs upon them. It appears that by our treaties with the Indian tribes who are now acting in hostility against us, we stipulated not to enter their territories except in a certain way; not to interfere with their hunting-grounds, but to leave them alone undisturbed, and that instead of obeying this obligation on our part, even the Congress itself has proceeded to enact laws for the construction of railroads through the Indian Territory and wagon-roads through the Indian Territory in direct contravention of the terms of those treaties.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator is laboring under an entire misapprehension. I know it has been asserted, and he is repeating what has been asserted, but there is not the slightest foundation for the assumption that Congress has done any such thing, either authorized the construction of railways through this country in violation of treaties, or authorized the construction of wagon-roads. It is an entire misapprehension of the whole thing. I was on my feet some time ago to correct it, but I did not get the opportunity. I will show the Senate that it is an entire misapprehension.

Mr. HOWARD. Congress has certainly authorized the construction of a wagon-road leading to Montana, has it not?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not within five hundred miles of the scene of the difficulty.

Mr. HOWARD. A road running through the Indian country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not through this Indian country, and not within five hundred miles of it.

Mr. HOWARD. Through an Indian country where we had no right to go?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. That is a question of fact about which I am not as well informed as the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is an entire misapprehension of the law and the stipulations of the treaty, as I will show by and by.

Mr. HOWARD. I was about to say that if it be the fact that Congress has authorized the construction of railroads and wagon-roads through the Indian country where we have no right to go it is very much to be regretted.

Mr. RAMSEY. Allow me to state to the Senator from Michigan that we certainly passed a law, I think two years ago, making an appropriation for a wagon-road up the Cheyenne river, through the very country we now propose to locate these Indians upon.

Mr. HOWARD. I would inquire of the honorable Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, whether that be not the fact. Did not Congress by a formal statute authorize the construction of a wagon-road through a portion of the Indian country where we had no right of passage by treaty?

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe so, but not over this route.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not care what route it was.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not where this difficulty has occurred; that is the point.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will read the act of March 3, 1865, the only act on that subject which I have been able to find:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to survey, locate, and construct the following wagon-roads"—

Note the fact that the authority is given to the Secretary of the Interior, not to the Secretary of War. The military authorities were not empowered to locate any road anywhere; but the authority was given to the Secretary of the Interior, who has charge of the Indian department—

"First. A road from Niobrara to the mouth of the Turtle Hill river, and thence, upon the most direct practicable route, to Virginia City, in Montana Territory, with a branch from the mouth of Turtle Hill river, or such other point as may be selected, to Omaha."

"Second. A road from a point at or near the mouth of the Big Sioux river, via Yancton, Dakota Territory, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Cheyenne river; thence up said river to its main forks; thence up the north fork to a point of intersection with the road from Niobrara."

"Third. For a road from a point on the western boundary of Minnesota, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, to a point at or near the mouth of the Big Cheyenne river."

"Fourth. A road from Virginia City, in Montana, upon the most practicable route, to Lewiston, in Idaho."

Then the law goes on to appropriate the money to enable the Secretary of the Interior to construct these roads.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very much obliged to the honorable Senator. Now, I will ask him whether these roads, or some of them, do not pass through or are not contemplated as passing through the Indian country. I think every one of these roads is in that category.

Mr. HENDERSON. I of course am not perfectly familiar with the geography of the country; but according to my understanding of the routes indicated here, neither one of them would have gone over the land of the Ogallallas and Brulés, belonging to the Sioux tribe. Neither of those routes would have passed over their lands at all, the lands admitted to belong to them by the treaty of 1851.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, Mr. President, the Indian tribes cannot very well draw a distinction between the authority of the Secretary of the Interior and that of the Secretary of War—

Mr. HENDERSON. That was not the point. My point was that the war officers undertook to do a duty for which they had no authority, and which had never been conferred on them at all. In fact, a route was opened where there was no authority even for the Secretary of the Interior to open it; and in consequence of this act the war came.

Mr. HOWARD. Then the ground of complaint on the part of the Indians is this, I suppose: that the authority of the United States has been used in establishing roads through Indian territory where the United States had no right to penetrate. That is one ground, is it not? And further, that the United States, through some of its officers, has been building forts within the Indian Territory where the United States had no right to establish forts. That I understand to be the great ground for complaint. Well, sir, I do not suppose the Indian tribes are very careful to look into the question whether the Secretary of War or the military authorities are authorized by act of Congress to do these various things of which they complain. It is not natural they should do so. It is sufficient for them to know that the Government of the United States, through some of its functionaries, is encroaching upon its possessions. That is the point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will reply to my friend from Michigan that the authority was exercised to a certain extent without the consent of the Indians. We attempted to open the road; that was the beginning of this trouble.

Mr. HOWARD. That was the causa belli. Well, sir, if our authorities have been guilty of any of these derelictions, and especially if the Congress of the United States have passed acts authorizing trespasses of this description to be committed upon the Indian Territory, it is high time that we correct the evil, and that we correct our own wrongs, before we make any particular complaints against the Indians.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, in order to shorten this matter, will my friend from Michigan permit me to state the facts?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly. I am anxious to get all the light I can upon the subject.

Mr. HENDERSON. There are various tribes on the road to Montana. The Sioux Indians consist of a large number of different tribes. It is a nation: there are a large number of them, some thirty or thirty-five thousand in all. There are different tribes. The Ogallalla and Brulé bands are the most numerous and the most warlike in this confederacy of tribes, and, as I understand, are the rulers, the controllers; perhaps they have as much influence as Austria and Prussia formerly had in the German Confederation over the other German States. Then there are the Minniconjongs, the Lower Brulés, the Two Kettles, the Black-foot Sioux, the Yanctonnais Sioux, and the Ogallallas of the Missouri river up about Fort Sully or Fort Rice. There are some twelve or thirteen different tribes; and we have treaty stipulations with some of those other tribes. Our treaty stipulations with the Ogallalla and Brulé tribes expired in 1866, as I explained yesterday, leaving, though, the treaty made in 1866, which the Senate has never confirmed. There was a treaty made, but they say not with their leading men, and they object to its ratification, and say it does not conform to their wishes. By that treaty we undertook to get a route across this country; but the leading members of the tribe objecting to it, it has never been ratified by the Senate; it has never been acted on, and has never become a law. Some of the other tribes I have named have treaty stipulations with the United States, and those treaty stipulations permit the Secretary of the Interior to build roads provided we pay the Indians just as we would pay any citizens of the United States for damages in crossing their lands. It requires a stipulation with them, and the Senator will by examining the treaties discover that this is the fact.

Mr. HOWARD. Have they been paid at all for those lands?

Mr. HENDERSON. The objection would have been made by these interior Indian tribes to the Secretary of War opening a road across their lands, because no payment was to be made under such an arrangement as that. The Brulé and Ogallalla bands object for two reasons: first, that neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the Secretary of War had a right to run any road there at all; and in the next place, if the Secretary of War did open it, there could be no payment made to them, and there was no proposition to pay them a dollar; hence it was that Congress had a right, as I conceive, to pass the law referred to by the Senator from Ohio; and therein he commits an error. He says that if we pass laws authorizing officers to commit trespasses we ought to stand by the officers. We never authorized the war officers to open any road at all; we authorized the Secretary of the Interior, but we had treaty stipulations with those tribes over whose lands we proposed to authorize the Secretary to open roads by which the Secretary was bound to pay them when he did open the roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not as perfect a knowledge as I like to have when I speak to the Senate about a matter of fact; but I know that the Secretary of the Interior to some extent did execute this law by marking out the route, defining its course; and the first difficulty with the Indians grew out of what is called the Niobrara route. The first controversy between the Sioux bands and our own people grew out of the attempt by the Secretary of the Interior under this law to open up that road. The military authorities, as a matter of course, had to protect the people. They did not open the road, but when our people were doing what the law authorized them to do, of course the military were called upon to suppress the trouble which grew out of the opening of the Niobrara road, which, I believe, is through the very line of country occupied by the Sioux.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not by those bands of Sioux.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, Mr. President, there appears to be a cloudy state of facts here; an embroglio, which I do not pretend to understand; a sort of Gordian knot, which some are anxious to cut with the sword and some are anxious to untie honorably and skillfully. For the present I am in favor of endeavoring to untie the knot without cutting it, and if the United States, through the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of War, or any other of its functionaries, has committed a wrong upon the Indians, it is our duty, and ought to be our pride, to hasten to its correction; and as a preliminary step to that correction, to make an inquiry of the Indians themselves and ascertain what are the real grounds of their complaints. Let us, therefore, send a commission and confer honestly and peaceably with the chiefs and head men of those tribes, with a view to ascertain the grounds of their complaints. I guaranty, if we will send a commission of honorable men among them and hear their complaints and listen to what they have to say and to confer with them as friends, hostilities will cease and we shall thereafter have an opportunity to settle this matter in the best possible way. For the present at least, let us, if possible, abstain from rushing into a general war with these tribes, which may possibly result in their utter extermination, and which may possibly leave us, after all, in the wrong; and I do not wish to occupy that position. Let us confer with them, let us meet them; let us have an Indian talk with them and ascertain what they have to say; and then if there are any real grievances of which they have ground to complain as against us let us hasten to remove that by legislation. I am, therefore, in favor of the enactment of the first section of the bill appointing a commission. I do not care whether it is appointed by Congress or whether it is turned over to the Executive to appoint the commission. My great object is to have a conference with the Indians, a friendly interview and a friendly understanding, so that both parties may know clearly what each one complains of. I think that would put an end to the war for the present.

We know very well, Mr. President, how it is with Indian tribes. When an insult or an injury is done to a single member of an Indian tribe, although it may be done by a humble private individual citizen of the United States, the tribe itself deems it a duty to take up the cause of the injured Indian and avenge it by a regular Indian movement. These difficulties sometimes, as we know perfectly well, result in the slaughter of men, women, and children. I desire to avoid all that. I prefer to confer with the Indians and ascertain if possible whether we can settle this thing peacefully.

I shall vote also for the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, to strike out the second section of the bill. That second section contemplates the ultimate establishment of a large portion of the tribes now subsisting between the Rocky mountains and the Missouri on a tract of country lying north of Nebraska. I do not think the people concerned in this project will be very well content with it. I do not believe that those portions of the United States which are immediately interested in the business of emigration and settlement in the far-off West will be well content that so large a tract of country north of Nebraska as is contemplated by this section shall be thus set apart for the permanent home of the Indians. About how much is it likely that this reservation will occupy? Let us look at it.

In 1833, when General Jackson established the Cherokees and the Chickasaws and the Seminoles west of the Mississippi upon what is known as the Indian country there, there was a grant made by the United States to those several tribes in fee-simple; the extent of that grant could not be much less, if at all less, than the superficial contents of the State of Arkansas, which lies on its east. It is about the size of the State of Kansas. If you look upon the map you will discover it. It is now proposed to establish Indian tribes upon the north of Nebraska very much in the same way, and the tract of country that will necessarily be occupied if this project shall be carried out will not be much less in extent than the present State of Kansas. It will necessarily extend far up northwardly toward the national boundary line. It may, and probably will, extend north of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude. If you will look on your maps you will discover this.

Now, sir, we have granted, as I observed yesterday, to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company the right of way through all the territory of the United States upon any route which the company may select north of the forty-fifth degree of north latitude, and it is by no means impossible that it will turn out that this immense reservation in favor of those Indian tribes who are to be huddled together upon it will actually embrace the route of that road. Our faith is already pledged to that road to pass at any point the company may select north of latitude forty-five; and I have no idea of encroaching upon the rights of the company. It is our duty, of course, as every Senator knows, to preserve the privileges of that company as of all other companies intact and inviolate. I do not suppose it is in the contemplation of the honorable Senator from Maine to disturb their rights and privileges. I take it not; I hope not; but he will see at once if he glances at the map that this may be one of the results of this immense reservation. If the section is not stricken out, I shall offer an amendment so drawn as to protect and preserve the rights of that company.

But, sir, I am opposed entirely to this attempt to establish the Indian tribes in that region of country. I do not believe in it at all. I do not believe in its practicability. The Indians are a roving race. You will find it utterly impossible, by any course of education or teaching or preaching, or by whatever means you may see fit to employ, to reconcile the wild Indians such as these tribes are to the business of agriculture or to the habits of civilized life. That experiment has been going on for the last two hundred years and more. It commenced with the very discovery of this country, and good men, philanthropists, Christians, missionaries of every denomination, have had the subject very much at heart, and have expended millions of dollars from the days that Elliot first commenced the attempt in Massachusetts down to the present time; and what is the present result of all these humane and philanthropic efforts to civilize and Christianize the Indian? Sir, the net result of the whole is hardly worth speaking about. From some fatality or other, no matter what, it is perfectly apparent that the North American Indian cannot be civilized, cannot be Christianized. The most effectual attempt in this line that ever was made was undoubtedly that of the Jesuits, who commenced and carried on the settlement of Canada. No enterprise of a philanthropic or religious character was ever prosecuted with as much zeal, perseverance, and self-sacrifice as was that of the Jesuits to Christianize the North American Indians, and what is the result to-day? You will find, if you go along the line of the lakes and visit the occasional Indian settlements in that vast region of country, here and there a small settlement of Indians who make a profession of the Roman Catholic religion; but they are few, they are still ignorant, very few of them depend at all upon agriculture or the habits of civilized life.

If, therefore, it be the purpose of the Senator from Maine or of any others to accomplish the civilization or Christianization of these Indian tribes by locating them on that region of country north of Nebraska, I have to say that in my humble opinion the attempt is entirely fruitless and will turn out so to be, whatever may be the amount of effort exerted in that direction.

Besides, sir, within the limits of this contemplated reservation will be, so to speak, herded together a great many thousands of Indians, composing a great many Indian tribes, many of them hostile to each other, having held hatreds, incompatible in their habits and tastes and in their feelings; and I guaranty if this project shall be carried out that there will be more destructive Indian wars within these limits than have ever taken place among the tribes who are running at large over the Plains, and those difficulties cannot fail to embroil the white population in the same wars and in the same contentions; so that, instead of having peace by the establishment of this reservation, you will have protracted wars, constantly occurring wars, and in the end you will be compelled, not only by the very necessities of the Indians themselves, but by the irresistible pressure of the white population from without, to remove them to some other locality, to take them away and lay hold of their lands you have thus reserved and sell them to the settler who is pressing onward into the West. That will be the result; and that will in a few years be the result in regard to the southern Indian reservation, known as the Indian district west of Arkansas.

It is in my judgment absolutely vain to make these attempts to reduce the Indian to civilization or to habits of agriculture. We may regret it, we may mourn over it; we may sorrow over the impracticability of the thing; but still there stands the everlasting fact proved to us by an experience of two and a half centuries that the North American Indian cannot be civilized, cannot be Christianized. We can then deal with him in such manner as shall best protect his rights and prolong his existence upon the face of the earth. He must yield before the advance of the white men. He cannot throw himself across the path of progress. It is in the very nature of things that barbarism, which is but another name for feebleness and dependence, must yield before the firm tread of the white man, carrying forward, as he always will, the flag and the institutions of civilization.

Let us, therefore, commence our reforms in our Indian affairs by endeavoring to ascertain the wrongs which exist, by hearing the complaint of the Indian, by doing justice to him, and not launching out upon any experiment which in the end may make a bad matter worse.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that one great difficulty in considering this question in the Senate arises from the fact that we assume an obligation which is not forced upon us at all, to settle the whole Indian problem, that has been a very vexatious one from the beginning of the Government, and is likely to continue as long as an Indian remains upon the continent. I think we had better defer the settlement of that great question until an occasion when we shall have more time for deliberation than we have now. At present an Indian war is on our hands; the construction of railroads to the Pacific is interrupted; the travel across the continent is interrupted on a particular line, but nowhere else. There is no trouble elsewhere among the fifty or sixty tribes of Indians on the continent. The war is confined to the Sioux Indians, the Cheyennes, and the Arapahoes, the warlike Indians, as has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin, probably not exceeding from seven to ten thousand. Why then thus hastily, within an hour or two of our adjournment, should we assume to settle this whole, great, vexed Indian question? There is no necessity for it. Confine your commissioners to treating with the Indians you are at war with; go no further than that. They are very few. Arrange with them if you can. Let the commissioners ascertain where a proper reservation can be had for them, and indicate to them that if the Senate approves of what may be done they may be located on it. That is all you need at present, and reserve the consideration of the great question for the regular session in the winter, when you will have more time to deliberate on it.

But, sir, if the Senate were disposed to go into the question so broadly, I doubt very much whether the best men have been selected for this commission. I recognize here the names of men who are familiar with the Indian character, men who are in every way fit to be on this commission. Among them is my own constituent, General John B. Sanborn. Long acquaintance with the Indians has made him eminently fit for such a position. So with Mr. Bent, Kit Carson, and others. But as to some of the generals named, able, patriotic, and gallant men as they are, I doubt whether they have that familiarity with Indian affairs which would justify us in putting in their charge the selection of reservations, for that is all that is wanted, on which to place the hostile Indians. I think we should confine ourselves to that at this time, and next winter take up and deliberately consider a bill having for its scope and purpose the settlement of the whole Indian problem. There are now only fifteen thousand Indians to be provided for, warriors, squaws and papooses. A comparatively small reservation will answer the purpose. Why should we now arrange about the Blackfeet and the Assiniboinés and the Crow Indians, and all the others that are not at war with us? Why should you want to find a reservation for them? Why provide for them in this bill? By the way, the bill is not consistent with itself.

The first section provides that the commissioners shall have power and authority to call together the chiefs and head men of such tribes and bands of Indians as are now waging war against the United States. That, I have no doubt, was the chief purpose of the committee in the introduction of the bill, and it is very proper; but the second section goes further than that, and it requires the commission to select a reservation upon the rivers named, west of the Missouri and north of the Platte, in which there shall be "a sufficient quantity of tillable land to enable the said tribes to support themselves by labor;" and the territory when selected and the selection approved by Congress, is to remain a permanent home for the Indians. This reservation is to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains. That is a larger business than presses upon us at this time. Why should we now trouble ourselves about the Indians that are peaceable? This section includes, as I said before, the Crows, the Assiniboinés, and the Blackfeet, who are not at war with us at all, who are at home and are provided for. We are by this bill assuming a task that is not imposed upon us, that is entirely gratuitous.

Then, although we contemplate in the first instance treating only with hostile Indians, you go on and provide a reservation for Indians who are not at all hostile and who are far away from where this trouble is. The fourth section goes still further and authorizes the commissioners—

With a view to the ultimate concentration of all the Indians named in sections two and three of this act on the reservations selected, are authorized to make such treaties with tribes now at peace with the United States as will tend to facilitate that object or remove obstructions from the lines of travel aforesaid.

It seems to me we ought to confine ourselves at this time to what is the object of the committee so far as it is portrayed in the first section, and there we ought to stop; confine our action to the appointment of a commission to make arrangements with the hostile Indians, and recommend to the Senate some proper reservation for the location of these hostile Indians; and whatever other action is required in regard to Indian affairs should be deferred until the next session.

Mr. HALLAN. Mr. President, I approve heartily of the suggestions made by the Senator from Minnesota, and before I had the pleasure of hearing his remarks I had prepared an amendment, which is in strict harmony with the views he has presented; and as it is now in order, I believe, I will offer it. The proposition being to strike out the second section, I propose to amend the matter before it is stricken out by striking out all after the word "that" in the second section and inserting:

Said commissioners are required to examine and select districts of country lying north of the State of Nebraska and west of the Missouri river, of sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains and north of that river and the State of Iowa, not now peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, in which district there shall be sufficient tillable and grazing land to enable said tribes respectively to support themselves by agriculture and pastoral pursuits in said districts. Said districts, when so selected and the selections approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for the said Indians to be located thereon, and no person, not members of said tribes, shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribe interested, except officers and employés of the United States: Provided, that said districts shall be so located as not to interfere with the traveled highways located by authority of the United States, and the probable route of the Northern Pacific railroad.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not rise to enter into the debate at any length, but to notice some few points which have been stated in the course of it, and to state the only object which I had in this bill and notice some of the objections which have been made to it.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the case before us, upon the statements and views presented by Senators, is one of first impression, as the lawyers say, and I will say in some respects of novel impression. The honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] sits down with the solemn asseveration that according to the history of the Indian tribes in this country it is a settled fact that they cannot be civilized; that they are not subject to civilization; that if they are members of the human family they are not susceptible to the influences to which the human race generally yield; and from his stand-point they are to be considered as inexorably, wholly intractable and subject to some supposed fatality; and he seems to contemplate it, I do not say with any degree of equanimity and satisfaction, but as a thing settled that they are to become extinct; and of course the American people are expected to act upon that solemn asseveration. That is to be the fundamental idea upon which we are to inaugurate a policy with regard to the Indians. He says two hundred years of American history verify that statement.

I hope that is not so, and I am the last man on earth to believe it is so. At any rate I hope I shall never come to that conclusion. Nor do I believe that American history discloses any such fact. Sir, there are civilized Indians in this country. Does the Senator know that? There are many civilized Indians. In spite of the merciless and faithless policy of this Government there are civilized Indians, and there are many of them, and there are enough to repel this assumption of the honorable Senator and to vindicate their race to a place in the scale of humanity, and show that they are the children of a common father; that they belong to human kind, that they are susceptible to its emotions, that they may be influenced by the considerations which influence other human beings. The history of American civilization shows no such thing as the honorable Senator supposes, and I am sorry that the utterance has come from him.

Sir, I have been accustomed to hear in the last twenty years this same assumption in regard to another race, that not only American history had taught that the negro was not capable of civilization, was inferior, was not a man, was not entitled to our consideration, and that three thousand years of the world's history had proved it. Who believes it? Has not the negro in the last six years shown that that was a libel on his race? Have we not stood here to verify it by our legislation, and have we not placed him now on the common scale of humanity by our laws? And that Senator has contributed as much perhaps as any other man in that direction, and now he turns upon the poor Indian, and tells you that the great American nation, which could put down gigantic rebellion and civil war, which could emancipate a race and enfranchise it and elevate it to the plane of a common humanity, and declare that it had absolute rights which should be respected and protected. He tells you that a nation which could do all that and defy the world in arms cannot protect three hundred thousand red men from the fate which he insists is inexorable and tends to their extinction! I deny it utterly.

I do not propose to legislate on any such theory, on any such assumption. The Indian is a man, and he is entitled to protection, and I never will consent to legislate on any other theory than that. He is susceptible of civilization I do not doubt. His history shows it. His race has vindicated itself amid perils and difficulties that have surrounded him ever since the dawn of civilization on this continent. We declare here now that we want an adequate portion of land on this continent, over which he roamed, and which, under God, in some sense belonged to him, and to which our fathers said he had at least the right of possession. In the bloody days of the Revolution, in the struggle for national independence they called him brother, and asked him to come to their side and vindicate our right to this continent as an inheritance to him and to us. Now, sir, when we have stripped him of his possessions, taken away his hunting grounds, and the graves of his fathers, and driven him on either side to the center of the continent to which our population is rapidly tending, the honorable Senator from Michigan says he will raise his "feeble voice" against any attempt to secure to him a foot of ground on which he shall stand and say it is his own. Well, sir, I meet him on that, and say that he is entitled to a portion of the continent, once his own, adequate to his necessities; and I take up the refrain of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, so often repeated here and elsewhere, that the only salvation for the negro whom you have enfranchised is land to stand on; and I say the only hope for the Indian is that he shall have a piece of land on which he shall stand, and the "border" shall not prevail against him; the nation shall stand behind him, and when population advances, shall guide it and guard it, and protect him against its invasion.

That is my doctrine, and that is the doctrine of the committee. Let this commission go anywhere within the limits of this continent, select a suitable patch of land anywhere for the Indian, where they shall say as a human being he can subsist by honest industry upon the supposition I agree that he is to turn his attention to the arts of civilization; and let it be his. That is all the committee propose.

Then, sir, we are met with other objections. This is only one of the difficulties which are supposed to be inherent in the subject. I need not say that this doctrine looks to the extinction of the Indian. The honorable Senator says he laments it. May we not be told that one of his humane views must lament such a conclusion as that. He laments it; but he sees no escape from it. It looks, and he does not disguise the fact, to the utter extinction of the entire race, and he thinks it is only a question of time. You move him to one reservation to-day, to be removed from that to-morrow at the point of the bayonet. Thus far in our career we have communicated to the Indian nothing but our vices, and the worst of them. That is the condition of the Indian to-day; and Senators rise here and excuse themselves from applying a radical remedy by the declaration that he is a barbarian and an outlaw; he is a vagabond on the earth; he hath no abiding place; it is fated that he is to be doomed to utter extinction!

My honorable friend from Ohio not now in his seat, [Mr. SHERMAN,] said a good many things with which I agree; but he said a good many other things to which I dissent. To the sentiments of this honorable Senator, I have very little to reply; I sympathize with very much that he said; but to the policy which he proposes, I am utterly opposed, as inadequate in the first place to meet the case; and in the second, utterly impracticable. What is it? He says the Indians must be absorbed. He did not explain what he meant by absorption; but the inferences from what he did say are clear enough; it means extinction. They are correlative terms on his argument. How are they to be absorbed? By what communities absorbed? Have they not been ejected from every civil and political community organized? From all the old States? Is not the great struggle here to-day, by every State that we have recently organized, to eject them? What is the voice of Kansas? They cannot live in Kansas. The Indians there are civilized, many of them; many of them own farms, cultivate lands; but they cannot live there.

Mr. POMEROY. We have no quarrel with the Indians who live in my State, no trouble with them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No quarrel at all! The records of the Senate show what the policy of Kansas is. It is to eject all these Indian tribes upon the idea that their existence is incompatible with that of the State, with that high civilization of which we boast. That is the fact. I am not complaining of it. The Senator ought not to feel that I am criticising his State offensively. I am only stating the fact.

Mr. POMEROY. I only wish to say that the reservations in my State are always peaceable and quiet. We have no fighting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Undoubtedly. Mr. POMEROY. The tribes themselves ask to be removed and to go elsewhere.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly they ask to be removed, and so they have been asking ever since the Pilgrim Fathers landed, to be removed out of our way to some inch of ground on this continent to which they could go and be secure in their mode of life. Does the Senator from Kansas mean to say that the civilization of Kansas has nothing to do with the making it so uncomfortable to live in Kansas that it is better for them to remove? He will not say that. There is the same state of things in Kansas, the same irrepressible conflict that has been enacted in all the States. The Indian has no absolute rights conceded to him. The high morality and civilization of this nation have not in the past guaranteed to him any rights of person or property, do not to-day, and I fear you will not get an expression of this Senate to-day or at any other time that it is possible for the savage to be protected in any absolute right whatever, either of person or property. He has no rights, the Senate has said over and over again by its policy, which the American nation can respect. By virtue of its necessities, by virtue of that great law of manifest destiny under which we are developing our institutions, he cannot have protection. We want his possessions; the presence of the Indian is incompatible with our civilization; he is a savage, he is a barbarian, which the honorable Senator from Michigan explains to be weakness, and therefore he is to be trodden under foot of men! Sir, I protest against all that sort of legislation.

Mr. President, this idea of absorption is a delusion and a snare. What community will absorb him? Will you leave him to those populations that are forming on the border? They will absorb him with a vengeance. They are absorbing him. They are communicating to him the worst vices that afflict the human race, and he is perishing from the fatal contact of our population. Everybody knows that. What community, then, will absorb him and take to its bosom the remnant of these tribes? Will New York take those whom she expelled? Not a bit of it. Will Indiana, will Illinois, will any State take them? Not one. They have gone from those communities toward the sunset, and gone forever.

So, Mr. President, I deprecate this idea of absorption as a delusion. I agree that it would have been beneficent, and eminently fit and wise in the beginning; but you have gone too far for that now. You have expelled them from every political and civil community, excepting those only on the extreme border; and you have measures now before the Senate, to which I am not permitted to allude in detail, which contemplate excluding them from the remainder of those communities. Then, sir, there is nothing left of this question of absorption. They cannot be taken back into these organized communities. Nobody expects to take them. How, then, are they to be absorbed? The honorable Senator from Ohio did not explain; but there is only one way possible, and that is, that the advancing current of population, as it reaches the Territories, is to harmonize with these Indians, indoctrinate them with the principles of our civilization, imbue them with the sentiments of Christianity, inculcate in them the loftiest conceptions of our institutions, a love of letters and the arts of civilized life, and so absorb and assimilate them. Is anybody childish enough to indulge in such speculations? Does the spirit of the border justify us in any such conclusion as that? Is the spirit of the border eminently Christian, eminently forbearing, eminently loving, and eminently kind to the Indian? Not a bit of it. The sentiment is, "he is a savage; he is a barbarian; a bounty on his head; is his presence compatible with our rights?" That is the spirit of the border. Nobody will deny that. And that spirit is to absorb him! I have already said what that means; it means extinction. Absorption is the Indian's scalp for a bounty. Now I ask Senators if they are willing to vote for that absorption? If so, the theory of the honorable Senator from Ohio is to be adopted.

But, mark you, how guarded he is. He goes for this thing as a temporary expedient. He absorbs them only for a temporary expedient. He evidently looks to that sunset to which they are being driven, and beyond which there is nothing left of the race. Then there is the theory of my honorable friend from Michigan, who believes that we must contemplate with as much serenity as it is practicable for an American Senator to observe, the utter extinction of the race, yielding to a fate which he assumes is theirs, contemplate their doom, though he does not say he would hasten it. I waited anxiously to see if I could not gather from something he did say that he would do anything to avert it.

These are the theories on which this bill is resisted; these are the theories on which now, as in the past, and I fear in the future, all legislation looking to establishing the Indian on any square foot of ground on this continent, and seeing that it is his, and shall be to him and his children, and he shall be protected in it and in his person, will be rendered abortive. I say so, Mr. President, because I look at this question in a practical way, in some sense. I have not shut my eyes to what I see around us.

The Senator from Michigan says one thing is clear; amid all this doubt and diversity of opinion and sentiment, speculation, and belief, one thing is clear: there is conflict on the border. Well, that is pretty clear; and I believe another honorable Senator from Minnesota has declared to us that there is war on the border. In some sense there is war, but in the sense which I look at it not war—conflict, not war. It does not come up to the dignity of war. It lacks the necessary parties to make it tolerable war even.

Now, sir, one thing that fills me with despair is the spirit in which the constituted authorities of this Government treat this question. It is undoubtedly true that our arms are turned against certain bands of the savages at this time on the frontier. Why? Because they have gone to war with us? Nobody pretends it. It would be mockery to say so. Has any Indian nation with which we have a treaty, or any band with which we have a treaty, proved faithless to that treaty and gone to war? Nobody asserts it and nobody believes it. Have they committed aggressions in the first place on us, either on our overland travel or on our railroad enterprises? Not a bit of it. The records of the Senate flatly contradict the idea of aggression on their part. If there is conflict we are the aggressors before the nation and before the civilized world. If there is conflict we induced it; if there is war we made it. That is the condition of things, and no man will gainsay it.

Well, sir, how did conflict come about? My honorable friend from Missouri yesterday told you better than I can how it happened; but I am dealing with the question of the method of conducting the affairs of the border by the military, and do not care to be diverted from it just at this moment. General Pope, in command of this region of country, took it upon himself to explain in January last to the General of the Army the difficulties under which he found himself; and what is his account of them? He says:

"A reference to my communications on this subject for the past twelve months will exhibit the fact that I repeatedly warned the Government that the Indian war now upon us was inevitable, and that no reliance whatever could be placed upon treaties of peace such as had been negotiated."

Here you have the subject-matter brought distinctly to the attention of the General and of the nation, that there were Indian hostilities, that there was conflict in this region of country, and that it was inevitable, as he says, from the manner in which our treaties had been negotiated. Who was at fault? He says:

"The peace commissioners promise the Indian, in the first place, that the whites shall not go into the Indian country, knowing well that it is impossible to fulfill such a promise."

Who knows that? Who is authorized to say that for the American people? Who is authorized to give us the bad eminence before the civilized nations of the earth that we send out commissioners to make treaties with the Indians, and the Senate ratifies the treaties, and before the American people we knowingly violate them, we know when we make the treaties we will violate them, and we do not intend to keep faith with the Indians; neither the peace commissioners nor Congress intend to keep faith with them? I should like to know who authorized General Pope to make that criticism either upon Congress, the peace commissioners, or the American people. If I were to characterize it, I should do so in language that General Pope might think offensive. I am sure I cannot brand it as I feel without making him sensible that he had committed a very great and grave offense against the American people and the constituted authorities when he uttered such an assumption.

We make treaties, and a major general of the Army of the United States tells his commanding general and the American people that we do not intend to keep them, for that is the upshot of it. We do not intend to keep them; we knew we would not keep them when we made them; and therefore he believes himself the instrument in the hands of a perfidious people to outrage the rights of these Indians, and this is his justification. Yes, he does not deny that he has outraged the rights of these people; he does not deny that he has made war upon them and violated the stipulations of a solemn treaty. He admits it; and what is his plea?

Why, the treaty was not made to be kept; everybody knows it was not made to be kept; the peace commissioners did not mean to keep it when they made it, and the Senate did not mean to keep it when they ratified it. That is the doctrine, and that is the language of a major general of the Army to his General-in-Chief, and he has not been cashiered; nay, sir, he has not been reprimanded in orders, that I have heard of. Why can you not keep it, General Pope? It was not made to be kept. Well why was it not made to be kept? He says everybody knows you cannot keep such a treaty. Why not? Such is the rapacity of the American people, such is the spirit of the border, such is the character of that course of empire which is making its way over the continent, that it crushes everything that stands in its way, irrespective of the laws of God and man. That is represented to be American civilization, the Christian civilization of the nineteenth century. We have concentrated an inexorable force on the border, growing out of our civilization, which has become our master; not only master of the savage, but the master of the Government as well; and your major general tells you so. He virtually says, "I am not obeying orders; I am obeying the manifest destiny; which I interpret to mean that there is no power, no authority in this nation to protect the Indian; nobody expects it." That is the way he interprets the American faith to the savage. Sir, need I stand here to say that that is a libel on this nation and a libel on the American people? If I were to say less than that and allude to it at all, I should not say what I think.

We make a treaty with the Indians in solemn faith; close these doors from the world, such is the solemn character of our work, and only open them when we have ratified and sealed our covenant vows with the Indian that he shall have certain rights in certain localities, in consideration of the fact that he is a man, in consideration of the fact that our forefathers recognized him as a brother, and in consideration of the fact that we hold the executive head of the nation out to him as his great father. In consideration, also, of the humanities of the age we say: "We will pledge our solemn vows that you shall have certain rights, shall be protected in them, and no white man's foot shall intrude without your consent; and if he does, refer your question to the national authorities and you shall have protection. Yet your major general says it cannot be done. You send him to the frontier, and he takes not the law, not the spirit of the nation, not its sense of justice, not the solemn treaty stipulation, for his guide and direction; but, in the spirit of the border, hunts the Indian, makes war on him, deprives him of his rights, and all in the name of a supposed inevitable destiny, manifest destiny, and seems neither to have respect for treaties, nor laws, nor the good faith of the nation, nor its honor, nor humanity. He seems to feel as if in the service of the border. That is what his words imply. We are going forward in the spirit of the border, and on this showing your treaties are a lie, a mockery, and a shame. I was sorry to hear the honorable Senator from Ohio make a solemn confession, not only that this was so now, but that it has been so in all the past, and must be so in the future. If, says the honorable Senator, you pass this bill, it is all as a rope of sand; it will be violated. Senators, I ask you to pronounce a word now which shall not be violated. I ask you to speak a word now and establish a right so definite, certain, and absolute, in regard to the Indian, that there is no power on earth, the right being on our side, which can violate it with impunity.

The savage is in extremity. Your population has driven him into the very fastnesses of the center of the continent where there is no escape, where he has not even the poor pitiful prospect of extinction in the western sea, the Pacific ocean, at no remote day. The peril is imminent on him this moment. You have placed him in an extremity. You are approaching him on both sides with resistless columns of population; civilization with a flaming sword advances on him from both oceans. You have driven him into the fastnesses, and you are asked to say that you will give him one foot of land on which he can stand and be safe; and the reply is, "absorb him;" "his inevitable doom is extinction;" "we may want to build a railroad"—God only knows where. The honorable Senator from Michigan says we have got large rights upon the northern border, railroad rights. What is humanity? Sir, I do not ask you to give up railroads; I do not ask you to appropriate any considerable portion of the continent; I do not ask you to strip any individual white man or anybody else of his rights; I only say, take a commission of your own choice; take a commission, not of the humanitarian, "sickly sentimentality" of the country, but take men of iron will, take men who will be governed by their judgment and intellect alone, and instruct them to find some place, however small, where these people can be gathered together and be safe from the invasions that are made upon them, be safe from that spirit which, while my honorable friend from Michigan does not invoke, he gives full play.

Nor, sir, is there the poor justification or apology even for General Pope in the idea that he supposed he was executing a law and was not called upon to be technical and lawyer-like as to whether the law or the treaty was supreme. He does not seem to make that plea. If he had had my honorable friend from Ohio for counsel at an early period he would have stood a great deal better before the nation. He puts in an ingenious and lawyer-like plea, that he was executing a law and blundered on the law, not remembering the treaty. He blundered on the Gospel: there is the trouble. He blundered on those instincts and intuitions which are common to men. He blundered on the great law of right reason, and of course he is confounded and the end is confusion, as it ever must be. It will go down to posterity as a blot and a stain on him, and on us, too, if we do not wash it out and rebuke it. General Pope does not put in the plea of my honorable friend that he blundered on the law. He puts it on the broad ground that he is faithless because the nation is faithless, and the nation is faithless on account of its creed; the nation is faithless on the ground that the Indian has no rights, that he is a doomed man, and we are not bound as statesmen to interpose to save him from destruction. That is his sin; that is his difficulty, that he mistakes these men for beasts of prey, and not as men entitled to be treated as human beings. That is his great mistake, a grievous mistake, a mistake gratuitously made. He traveled out of the way to make it. He made his own record, taking counsel not of the Government, not of his superior, not of the spirit of the age, but he takes it of the worst passions that gather always upon the advance guard in these great marches of population which go forward to subdue and populate the earth.

Now, Mr. President, there is not the slightest excuse or pretense for this war. We are not called upon to appropriate one dollar for war; and here a word of reply to the remark of the honorable Senator from Minnesota. There is no war in this country with the Indians in any proper sense or in any enlarged or just sense whatever. Who says there is war?

Mr. RAMSEY. In this very bill you say it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Have it stricken out then.

Mr. RAMSEY. The first section of the bill, the eleventh line, says it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wonder the honorable Senator has not had it stricken out; it is a misnomer; it does not apply to our situation or condition; it does not describe it at all. Who says there is war? Who ought to know? The President of the United States. Has he said anything about it? Not a word. The first thing we did when we met in session here was to send a committee to the President to know if he had any communication to make to us. Now, if war on the border had sprung up since we left, was it not his duty to make that communication? Certainly it was. As he did not make that, we have no right to presume it.

The Secretary of War has been called upon on this subject ten days ago to tell us whether there was war on the border. He is silent; he has sent no communication in reply. The General of the Army makes no communication, gives you no hint that there is war which requires the interference of Congress. General Sherman, on the other hand, in command, cognizant of the whole thing, it being all under his command, says the nation has not a decent excuse for war. Of course he is not making it then. General Sherman is not the man to do indecent things anyway; and in a very recent communication he tells the nation there is not a decent excuse for making war on the Indians, and of course he is not waging it, and of course he is not invoking it, and of course he does not want our aid on that subject. Is not that so? But still we have the cry of war; I know we have. I believe he says it is for us to choose whether we will have war. We are all in the wrong now. If we choose to prosecute the wrong we can have war. If you choose to return to your strict treaty stipulations, if you choose to do justice to the Indian, you can have peace. That is his language; that is his doctrine; that is my belief. Whence, then, this cry on the border? It is the spirit of the border. I do not mean to say that in any offensive sense at all. I do not mean to characterize the spirit of the border as infernal, reckless. I know every community has its reckless men and bad men, and I know that the bold and daring and reckless are very likely to crowd into the advance guard of population which makes its way. That is the way I account for it. The great bulk of the people on the border are as humane, I do not doubt, as most men, most communities; but the adventurers and the reckless from all the land and from all other lands crowd in and crowd on in this great march, eager to pursue it irrespective of the rights of the Indian; and so he is trampled in the dust, and so conflict comes; and that is all the war there is. It is in no sense a war; it is a conflict on the border, and our responsibility is about it; that instead of pursuing the Indian when he has not violated our treaties, we did not turn our arms to the rear and march back upon the border and command order and obedience, rebuke the spirit of the border and say, "Peace, be still;" and this nation can command it and ought to command it. That is the remedy for what afflicts the nation, disturbs its repose and exhausts its treasury.

Mr. President, I have been drawn into remarks to a much greater extent than I contemplated when I rose, and I conclude by saying that there is only one feature in this bill I care anything for. You may fix the limits as you please. This bill has been criticised in various directions. Some say it is broad. Some say that the second section of the bill contemplates the location of the Indians in an inhospitable, bad country, that it will be impossible for them to survive. I hardly need say after what I have said already that that is not my purpose, that is no part of the purpose of the committee. If there is danger of that I should hope the Senate would adopt the broader view of my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] which is that we should not limit the commission, but allow them to find a place for those Indians anywhere. I believe that is the view of the committee. These limitations in the bill were only directory: they should be called upon to examine those particular localities with the view of finding some locality outside of the immediate collision, because of the railway enterprises which are going forward, and to which, when they were removed, they should be entirely set aside from all those enterprises and not liable thereafter to come in contact with our people. On all that part of the bill I have not a word to say. Gentlemen may direct this commission wherever they please and to whatever section of the continent they please. The only interest I take in this bill is the brief amendment I submitted yesterday, and that is that when they do locate them, when they do find a locality which they say is suitable, which may be cultivated as a means of support, that it shall be to them a home; they shall not be disturbed by the settler; the lands shall be withdrawn from settlement; they shall not be open to the settler; they shall be open to no interference and no intrusion save and except only that general jurisdiction which the Government of the United States ought never to part with over all its people, both denizens and citizens. That is all I invoke for the Indian. All the rest I care nothing for. I make no issue with any Senator who thinks it is too narrow or too broad. Go where you please; let your commission locate where in their judgment it is practicable for these people to live and secure it to them, and I am content. My antagonism is with the doctrine which has been promulgated here that consigns them to utter extinction. Against that I have always protested, I protest now, and I trust in God I shall never live to see the day when I will not protest here or elsewhere.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, it is not my desire to be a participant to any great extent in the discussions of this body, at least so soon after entering it; but I hope I shall be indulged if I occupy a very brief portion of the time of the Senate in saying a few words on this occasion, especially as the border from which I come has been the subject of the kind remarks of my friend from Maine.

I think it must be apparent to every member of the Senate that there is a condition of things on the border which should arrest the attention of this Congress. I think the reports of our Government commissioners, the reports of our military officers, and the statements of newspaper reports, (though the latter may be somewhat exaggerated,) furnish sufficient evidence to justify this Congress in taking some action in reference to the subject. I had hoped that the Senate would approach it calmly, dispassionately, and without prejudice. I certainly feel conscious of having no prejudice in the matter, and I desire to consider it in that spirit.

Now, there is a war there, no matter if it may not come up to our ideas of civilized war. There is a kind of warfare existing there which should be arrested. The necessity of the case appeals to this Congress and to every member of it to adopt some legislation which shall bring it to a termination. It is with that purpose that I rise to ask the Senate to give this bill, or a bill similar to it, favorable consideration. I do not come here to advocate the extermination of the Indians; and if my friend from Maine would take a trip to the border and spend a year there, or even six months, I pledge him my word, if it is worth anything, that he would come back a new man in reference to this question, renewed in heart and spirit; he would come back with entirely different notions in regard to the border and to this Indian question. How can one understand the question clearly; how can one be thoroughly posted who has never seen that region of country and only judges by reports in the newspapers? I have seen dispatch after dispatch sent abroad over this country which gave an entirely erroneous view as to the condition of things and as to the causes of these difficulties. No matter who may be to blame, whether the white people or the Indians, the necessity comes home to us to act so as to arrest the existing state of things. We had better spend a million to-day in carrying out a system of policy that shall put an end to these difficulties than five hundred millions two years hence; for if this state of things continues it will come to that.

I grant you there has been no declaration of war on the part of Congress, and no proclamation has been issued by the President declaring the existence of a state of hostilities; but there is a hostile condition of things there, which the border appeals to Congress to arrest. If there is to be a war, the people of the border want a short, quick, sharp, incisive, and decisive campaign, and want the matter ended. I believe no instructions whatever have been given to General Sherman as to whether he shall carry on a war or not. He is ordered out with his forces to protect the settlers and prevent Indian hostilities; and yet nothing has been laid down by Congress as to what shall be done or what shall not be done. I do not believe General Sherman wants a war. I have in my hand a letter received from him a few days ago, in which he says:

"In the mean time I trust Congress will prescribe clearly by law what the military ought to do, and say who shall declare war against any and what Indians. This should not be left an open question."

He has only troops enough to guard the two lines of railroad, and is not even able to afford protection to them at all points. Yet he is doing his utmost to accomplish that object.

The impression has been generally circulated through the eastern States, and has been advanced here, that the people of the border are in favor of a war. I find in the New York Tribune of the 11th of June what purports to be a statement of the report of General Buford, one of the commissioners to investigate the Fort Phil. Kearney massacre, which I will read:

"General N. B. Buford, one of the special commissioners appointed to visit Dakota and investigate the Fort Phil. Kearney massacre, says there is no necessity for an Indian war, and there would be none if the Indians were protected from the rapacity and rascality of frontier settlers, whose interests are to bring on a war, and supply our armies with subsistence at exorbitant prices. In fact, the present war which is upon us is nothing but a raid upon the Treasury of the United States by the frontiersmen and Army contractors. These men band together and make false reports of alleged massacres by Indians, and then call upon the Government to send troops to protect them, when in fact they only ask for them that they may grow rich from the supplies furnished them. These men see that the Pacific railroad is fast driving them out of business, because it furnished supplies cheaper and with more dispatch to our military stations than the raucous traders could do; therefore they get up the war so that the Indians can be driven away from the lines of railroad, and our Army following them must be supplied as they were heretofore. To show you the enormous profits made by this class of people, it need only be stated that at Fort Laramie our Government pays four dollars per bushel for oats, five dollars for corn, and one hundred and twenty-five dollars per ton for hay. These prices are obtained by the sellers, creating the impression that they run hair-breadth escapes on the route to camp, when they are in fact the instigators of the hostilities. The employees of the Union Pacific railroad are also advocates of war, because the transportation of troops and passengers would put into the treasury of the company large sums of money."

Whereupon the Tribune says:

"Not long ago a military commission was appointed to investigate Indian affairs, taking the massacre at Fort Kearney for a text. Though this event was deemed at the time of its occurrence an exasperation of the first magnitude, the commissioners can only report that the Indians are not greatly to blame. We infer this from the remark of one of the most prominent of their number, General Buford, that there is no present need for an Indian war, and that there would be none at any time could the savages be protected from foes still more savage in effect than themselves—we mean the merciless and dishonest frontiersmen and the swindling Army contractor, who between them manage to sophisticate a war into existence, not more at the expense of the Indian, whom they rob, than at the expense of the Army, by which they profit enormously in the business of supplies."

I give that as one specimen of the kind of reports that are sent over the country. I observed also a few weeks ago the following statement in a dispatch from Washington to the New York Tribune:

"Senator HENDERSON, chairman of the Indian Committee, who has been out on the Plains with General Hancock, says half the reports concerning Indian depredations are false, gotten up to make money by putting the Government to cost. It cost the Government in 1855 $29,000,000 to carry on the Indian war, and $3,000,000 alone was paid one firm on the Kansas border for the transportation of parties whom the newspapers call escorts; and traders are engaged in provoking the Indians to hostilities."

I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether he was out with General Hancock on any expedition?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state that I met General Hancock at Fort Harker. I did not go any further than Fort Harker. I was not there with a view of looking into Indian matters. I was out on an excursion with a company. I suppose the statement to which the Senator refers comes from a conversation which I had at St. Louis with perhaps a newspaper reporter; I did not know at the time that he was a newspaper reporter. I do not recollect all the facts stated in the extract which has been read, but there are some statements there of which I have some remembrance. Does the Senator desire to know whether my opinion is in accordance with the statement?

Mr. THAYER. The idea is here given out that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs had been out on an Indian expedition with General Hancock.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was not.

Mr. THAYER. That impression went abroad, and I wished to call the Senator's attention to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state to the Senator that I made no investigation of Indian matters, but was on an excursion there, not with a view of looking into Indian affairs. I met General Hancock at Fort Leavenworth first. I had no conversation with him there. I met him again at Fort Harker, where I did have some conversation on Indian affairs. Many of the things stated in the extract which the Senator has read are, I think, true; some of them, perhaps, are not true. My impression is that a great many reports of Indian barbarities are wholly untrue, and they are gotten up for a purpose. For instance, the Senator will remember that it was stated a very short time ago that a steamboat had been seized by the Indians on the Missouri river, and that all the passengers and crew had been murdered and scalped, and the boat burned. It turned out in the course of a few days that it was all a lie, gotten up for a purpose, and that no steamboat had been seized by the Indians at all. It is also true that a firm at Leavenworth city last year or the year before, I believe last year, was paid some three millions for transportation. I could very well conceive how a firm of that sort, expecting to transport overland a large amount of matter for the Army, would be interested in sending these telegraphic reports abroad; not that to my knowledge they had done so. I will state further that my impressions then were and now are that a war was unnecessary, and that it could have been avoided, and that we can avoid it now and save a great deal of expense, and that many of these reports ought to have no attention paid to them.

Mr. THAYER. The Senator does not deny, for I know he has too much evidence in his possession not to be convinced that there is a state of hostilities on these lines of travel.

Mr. HENDERSON. No doubt about that.

Mr. THAYER. You have most complete testimony bearing on that. I hold in my hand an official statement from the engineer of the Union Pacific railroad giving a list of killed and wounded within a short time:

CAMP No. 13, FORT WALLACE, June 29, 1867.

DEAR SIR: As a matter of record, I send you the following statement of persons killed and wounded by the Indians at and in the vicinity of this post during the month of June, and the month is not yet ended:

Soldiers—William H. Dummel, sergeant, company G, seventh cavalry, killed; Frederick Wyllyams, sergeant, company G, seventh cavalry, killed; James Douglass, corporal, company G, seventh cavalry, killed; James K. Ludlow, corporal, company G, seventh cavalry, badly wounded; Charles Clarke, bugler, company G, seventh cavalry, killed; Frederick A. Bacon, private, company I, seventh cavalry, killed; Peter Britton, private, company G, seventh cavalry, badly wounded; John Heaney, private, company L, seventh cavalry, badly wounded; John G. Hammond, private, company G, seventh cavalry, badly wounded; Jacob S. Miller, private, company E, third infantry, killed; Edward McNally, private, company E, third infantry, killed; Frank Rheamer, private, company G, seventh cavalry, killed; Hugh Riley, private, company I, seventh cavalry, badly wounded; Nathan Wail, private, company G, seventh cavalry, killed; Thomas Townley, private, company I, seventh cavalry, wounded; Joseph Woldroff, private, company E, third infantry, killed; Welsh, private, company G, seventh cavalry, killed; George Gaffney, private, company L, seventh cavalry, wounded; — Morehouse, private, company E, third infantry, wounded; John Rivers, corporal, company L, seventh cavalry, wounded.

Citizens—Warren Facer, killed; — Thompson, killed; two men unknown traveling east from Denver, killed; — McCarthy, mortally wounded; Mr. Brownell (passenger in coach bound west) killed; Mr. Blake, wounded; unknown, (another passenger,) wounded.

Making a total of fifteen killed and twelve wounded—pretty well for one locality in less than a month in time of peace. Most of the soldiers were killed in the two fights that have occurred here at the fort. The first occurred on the 21st, and the last on the 25th instant.

We are actually in a state of siege here, and cannot send out a man or team two miles from the fort without an escort. We have no communication with the outside world and do not know what is going on around us. The fort was considered in great and constant danger before our arrival, and even now it is not considered safe.

The last stage from the East arrived on the 25th; the one previous to that on the 13th ultimo. The last stage from the West arrived on the 23d, and the one before that on the 17th ultimo. The stage station east of here, Henshaw Springs, was attacked on the 21st, and the one west of here, Pond Creek, on the 26th.

Over one hundred thousand dollars worth of property belonging to the stage company has been taken or destroyed during the month of June between Chalk Bluff and Lake stations—a distance of one hundred and eighty miles. All this will have to be paid for by the United States.

Without being tedious and presenting all the facts in the case, I think I have shown enough to convince any one that if this route is to be kept open it must be furnished with additional military protection; that it was very detrimental to our interests to take the troops from the Smoky Hill route to protect the Platte route, and that the interests of our road and the country contiguous to our line require that these troops should be returned here at once and even an additional force sent here.

Very respectfully, W. W. WRIGHT,
Chief Engineer.

JOHN D. PERRY, Esq., President.

A true copy:

JOHN D. PERRY, President.

The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has abundant documentary evidence in his possession showing that every day men are killed on the line of these two roads. It cannot be denied. Then there is a State of warfare there; I care not whether it is civilized warfare or barbarous warfare, a state of hostilities exist. It is true that it is desirable to know who is responsible for it; but that is not the question now to be settled. I ask Congress, shall this state of things continue or not? That is what interests us on the border.

I alluded to a statement attributed to the Senator from Missouri, as to a contractor who is alleged to have received $3,000,000. I presume it is so, for the transportation of freight over these routes last year was immense. I alluded to it for the reason that the person referred to is a citizen of Philadelphia, and not a citizen of the border.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the contractors are all broke. They have taken contracts at $1 60 per hundred pounds, and are paying $2 60 themselves. Wells, Fargo & Co. would give $1,000,000 to-day to get out of their contract. Instead of making money, they are being broke. There is not a man there who wants the contract at the prices they took it.

Mr. THAYER. I was coming to that very point. The quartermaster of the Department of the Platte told me, before I left my home at Omaha, that Wells, Fargo & Co., then in the early part of June, were in to the tune of over five hundred thousand dollars dead loss. And yet my friend from Maine says that the contractors want an Indian war.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. THAYER. I beg the Senator's pardon. He did not make that declaration; but that statement is being circulated all over the East, and is the foundation for these homilies in regard to the people of the border.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I beg the Senator to understand that on that question there is not the slightest testimony before the committee, and our people do not know anything about it.

Mr. THAYER. I read that statement from one of the leading papers of New York city—the New York Tribune; and I could refer to a similar article in the Boston Journal, which certainly does circulate in the State of Maine. That article was founded on this alleged report of General Buford. And then it appealed to the country somewhat in this style: "Here, you see, it is the people of the border who get up these Indian wars." This brings to my mind another incident. At the council between General Hancock and the Indian chief by the name of Satanter, Colonel Leavenworth, the agent for his tribe, was present. The Indian came in, and in the presence of Colonel Leavenworth charged him with cheating them out of their money. That went abroad and was the subject of remark. It was pointed to as evidence of how these wars are gotten up. Now, sir, General Sherman told me a short time ago that he indorsed exactly what Colonel Leavenworth did in that particular instance; that he withheld the money with General Sherman's approval, because these Indians had captured the Box family in Texas, had killed the father, and had kept the daughters captive, who had endured barbarities which cannot be named here; and the agent withheld their annuities, and General Sherman approved of his action. And yet the charge went abroad over the country that Colonel Leavenworth had defrauded the Indians. I refer to Colonel Leavenworth only in connection with that one transaction. I know nothing in regard to him in reference to other matters.

But to come back to the question as to the origin of this war and the allegation that it is gotten up by the people on the border, by the frontiersmen, I stand here to say to the Senate, speaking in behalf of every class of the community on the border, speaking in behalf of every industrial pursuit, that nothing can be more abhorrent, nothing more dreaded by them than an Indian war. Why, sir, until these hostilities upon the frontier everything was prosperous there; the commerce on the Plains had risen to an immense magnitude; we could talk about the commerce of the Plains as well as you could talk of the commerce of the seas and the lakes. There were men who went out upon the Plains and did business in the mountains. You could go in no direction across these wide Plains that you did not see long caravans of trains bearing merchandise from all the points of the Missouri to all the Territories in the mountains and away to the Northwest. It is the main source of our income; it is the market for our productive industry; and to send it forth to this nation that we frontiersmen are in for a war to make money is the most atrocious calumny of the nineteenth century. Why, sir, the very gamblers and thieves whom Chicago, and St. Louis and New York and Cincinnati and Boston and Philadelphia have failed to hang dread an Indian war. We have some of that class of people there. I am sorry for it, but it is because you in the East have not done your duty and hung them. They fled out there to escape, but they do not represent the border. My friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] suggests that they do not come from New York. If so, it is because they treat them so kindly there that they do not have to run away; they vote the right way in New York city. [Laughter.]

Let me say to my friend from Maine that if he would visit the border he would change his views somewhat. And there is no one whom I would welcome there more cordially than I would him; for there is no man who is actuated more by high and honorable impulses than he is. I tell him as a friend, frankly, without prejudice, that he would come back with different ideas as to that section of country. He talks about Christianity and about civilization. Why, sir, from whence did the people of the border come? They came from New England. Men have settled there, whom I have the honor now in part to represent, whom he has heretofore represented on this floor. The people of the border are bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh. They have carried the same civilization which has marked your progress in Maine, in Massachusetts, in New York, and Ohio, on to the border. Sir, I have seen a Christian people there coming from their humble cabins, meeting at cross-roads, or by-roads, in an improvised school-house; and I have seen them there raise the voice of thanksgiving and the song of praise to Almighty God, and worship Him with as much feeling and as much sincerity as is manifested by those who worship in the gorgeous tabernacles of your eastern cities. You will find there an humble Christianity; but it is as pure as that which dwells in the East. You will find there as enlightened, as intelligent, as honest a people as you find in any State of the Union. I assert this in behalf of the people of the border, of Kansas and Nebraska, and the Territories beyond, because I have a personal knowledge which leads me to the conviction that it is true. In the name of every class of people out there, good and bad, I tell the Senate and I tell the country that they dread an Indian war, because it is like an incubus upon them and their prosperity.

Sir, now, all along the valley of the Platte and the Smoky Hill route, the lines are marked with ruin, desolation, and death. The reports are borne to you by every mail from the West. You may tell me they are exaggerated. I will strike off one half and then appeal to Congress, and appeal to the country, and ask if there is not a necessity for legislation in this matter. Not long ago the surveyor-in-chief of the party on the line of the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha, while surveying the line of the route, while carrying out the provisions of the very act of Congress for which my friend from Maine voted, was waylaid by a party of Indians and stealthily murdered. He was engaged in carrying forward that great enterprise which this Congress, which this Government, which this nation demands, ay, which the world demands, for it is continental; it is the world's highway. You have ordered it to be built. If there is a wrong in its being carried out, let the wrong come home to those who voted for it, and my friend from Maine among others.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend will examine the law he will find that the company were not to exercise their rights under the law, to run their railroad through a country belonging to Indians, unless upon the express condition of payment. Not the first step was to be taken until the Indians had their rights.

Mr. POMEROY. Does the Senator say we authorized payment to the Indians?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I say the treaty stipulations contemplated payment to the Indians.

Mr. POMEROY. But we are speaking of the act of Congress authorizing the construction of the road.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the Senator from Nebraska argues that Congress chartered a company with the right to build a railroad to the Pacific, and that therefore we gave power to that company to override a treaty stipulation.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Nebraska was only arguing what the act of Congress did; not the treaty. He said that by law of Congress the company were authorized to build the road.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. And I was explaining that the law of Congress gave no such authority, because there was an antecedent and superior treaty stipulation. That is the answer.

Mr. THAYER. I will say to my friend from Maine that that railroad company can have no transactions with the Indians. If there has been any failure it has been on the part of the Government. They were obliged to commence within a certain time and to build the road within ten years, or forfeit their franchise and the benefits which the Government granted. If any wrong has been done it is not the fault of the company, but it was done by Congress. If the Government has not carried out the provisions of the treaty which required payment to the Indians, why has not the Senator from Maine called attention to that very point, and why has he not demanded that the provisions of the treaty should be complied with, and justice done to the Indians? Why has he remained quiet through four long years and taken no step?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will answer the honorable Senator. The company was authorized to build a road from the one hundredth degree of longitude, which I believe was the point of departure westward, running in any direction they chose to go, specifying nothing, not limiting them to any particular point, but to go in a general direction to the Pacific ocean by the most feasible route. Congress knew that it had granted certain rights to the Indians by treaty, and who could presume that this company would undertake to set the rights under that treaty at defiance without coming to Congress?

Mr. THAYER. I will say in answer to my friend from Maine that the company have nothing to do with the Indians, and nothing to do with the treaty. They do not know, and are presumed not to know, whether the Government has done its duty or not. The Government has required the company to go on and construct that road. It required them to commence it within a certain period, and to complete it within ten years. I say the company is not at fault, and no one connected with it is at fault. Let me add further that the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha has been built over lands which have been ceded, over which the Indian title has ceased. They may have got now a little beyond the ceded territory. I do not know how that fact is; but for three hundred miles through the State of Nebraska, the lands have been ceded I know; and so it is in Kansas, as my friend from Kansas [Mr. ROSS] informs me. In both States the Indian title has been extinguished to the line of these roads; and yet the Indians come down from this territory on the North, hundreds of miles, to the line of these roads, and commit these depredations and outrages which the Senator from Maine says are not war. It is immaterial to me what you call them; murder, devastation, death is there. You may call it by what name you please.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the Senator's permission, before he leaves this point I desire to suggest that if I understand the complaint of the Indian tribes now waging war against the United States, if it be war, they do not allege that they object to the building of these roads. I have never heard any complaint on the part of the Cheyennes or the Arapahoes or the Sioux Indians in reference to the building of these roads. They do not object to the building of the Pacific railroads so far as I am aware; and until the burning of the Cheyenne village I never heard of any attack upon the railroad parties. I have never heard of a stage-coach being attacked on either of these lines until after the burning of the Cheyenne village.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Why was that burned? Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know.

Mr. THAYER. It was burned by General Hancock in his operations. The reason given by him, I believe, was that they had been guilty of bad faith and treachery in some operations with him. No attacks have been made on the Union Pacific railroad from Omaha until this spring.

Mr. HENDERSON. And I am satisfied there were none on the other roads before that time.

Mr. THAYER. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs is mistaken in one respect. The Indians are opposed to the building of these roads. There is no mistake about it. I have heard it from them myself. The reason they object is that it cuts in two their buffalo range. The buffalo range in certain seasons of the year from away north of Nebraska down toward Red river, and they think the roads will interfere with that. One Indian chief expressed his objection in this way: "We do not object to the horse going through our country that goes so," imitating in his manner the galloping of a horse; "but," he added, "we do object to the horse that goes so," imitating the noise of a steam-engine. That was his expressive way of giving utterance to his objection.

The difficulty is that the Indians do not like these roads; and hence I have favored this bill which proposes to open these two lines of road by taking the Indians away and putting them on reservations to the north and to the south; not that I want to put them so far north that my friend from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] will be in any danger. I would do nothing and favor nothing that would interfere with the Northern Pacific railroad. I am willing to put any restrictions in the bill which will prevent interference with that line. I am willing to put in a clause declaring that in the treaty to be made the right of way shall be granted to any railroad north of a certain parallel. The proposed reservation for the northern Indians, the Sioux nation, lies north of Nebraska. I do not object to their being on the border of our State, and our people do not object to it. I have come to the conclusion that there must be a final disposition of the Indian question, and you may as well meet it to-day as to put it off for one year or two years. You cannot evade it much longer.

Why, sir, the policy has been to move the tribes westward from reservation to reservation in order to give way to the march of empire to which my friend from Maine has so beautifully alluded with a little vein of sarcasm. After the settlers advance and surround a reservation, then the Indians have to go further off. Now we have arrived at that condition of things wherein you can move them no further. You have got to find a permanent settlement for them.

I am not for their extermination; but I might answer the honorable Senator from Maine, when he alluded to the argument of the Senator from Michigan, what has been the result of two hundred years experience? Has it not led almost to their extinction? You may take the fact as you please; whether you like it or not, whether the white race has done wrong or not, the fact stands out that the Indian race has dwindled from millions to about three hundred thousand. Reasoning from that, what will be their fate? It is clear what will be the result.

I repeat, I am not in favor of extermination, but I am in favor of a policy which shall bring to a close, and forever, our Indian difficulties. If you mean a war, say so, and provide the means for a quick, short, incisive and decisive campaign, and end it. That is the sentiment of the people of the border. If the Government means to accomplish this thing by war then call out the men who have been bred and raised upon the frontier, who are familiar with Indian habits, and mount them on Indian ponies, and they can accomplish the purpose. Give a few regiments of that character to General Sherman and he will end it. Your American horses will wilt down in one day's pursuit over those Plains after Indians. You must have the grass-fed horses of the prairie or Indian ponies in order to accomplish anything.

The Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, said the other day that General Sherman had been teased into recommending the raising of four regiments of volunteers. That was a mistake. General Sherman is not in the habit of being teased into doing anything against his judgment. He is a man who can say yes or no; and I know these are his views. His report of September, 1866, is quoted here as authority to-day. That report does not apply to the present state of things. He did travel over that region in September, 1866, with a small escort and without danger. At that particular time there was comparative quiet. But that report does not represent the condition of things to-day. There is the difference. It is hardly ingenuous to quote that report of September, 1866, as representing the condition of the border and of the Plains at the present time. I deny the fact, and I say General Sherman has different views on that question to-day.

I desire to say a word in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. He proposes to strike out the second section, and send all these Indians from that region north down into the southern Indian Territory. That is the purport of it. Now let me say to him that we do not propose to put an additional Indian into that territory north. We merely provide for those who are already there. That is their home. It is said that the bad lands are up there. If that is going to be an objection it has been an objection all the time, for the Indians have lived in that very country. They have been there all the time. We do not propose to put any additional tribes of Indians into that region; but to enact what shall result in their complete separation from the white race. That is what I want. That is what we want on the border. We want a final disposition made of the question. Let them remain there, and enact such laws or frame such treaties as shall keep them on that reservation and keep the white people from going among them. Non-intercourse is what is needed; complete and perpetual separation.

I can illustrate this subject to you by the condition of the Indian tribes in Nebraska. When Nebraska was first settled there were difficulties with the Indians; and by the way let me tell the Senate that I know from my own personal knowledge that the Indians commenced at once depredating upon the property and taking the lives of the white settlers. Not a provocation was given them, for I was there, and I know it, and it became my duty to go as a commissioner and hold a council with them. They commenced, within six weeks after the settlers had crossed the Missouri river and settled on lands which had been ceded to the United States, to steal their cattle, and in the second raid they made they killed two or three settlers. But those days have passed. Since those Indians have been placed upon reservations there has been entire peace and quiet. There is good feeling between the Omahas, the Pawnees, the Winnebagoes, and even the Sans Arcs Sioux, a band engaged in the Minnesota massacre, who are now located in the northeastern corner of Nebraska. They are on entirely friendly terms with the whites; no collision, no clashing whatever. We do not ask to have those Indians removed. I tell the Senator from Maine that there is a condition of peace and quiet between the people of the border and the peaceable Indians, and you may go among those tribes to-day and they will point to the white people, the settlers on the border, as their friends. Why, sir, but a few weeks ago some of them, fearing an incursion or a raid of the Sioux, came into Omaha for our protection. They came to us as their friends.

So much for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. I hope it will not prevail. I desire that all those Indians shall be left within that territory where they now are. We simply propose by sending this commission there to make a treaty with them by which they shall be satisfied; and we shall get the right of the road up to Montana, for that we must have; get it peaceably, as I believe you can, and then I think the way will be open for a permanent settlement of these Indian difficulties.

I will not trouble the Senate further on this subject.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope not. I trust the Senate will not adjourn until we dispose of this question.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 17, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ACTIVE LIST OF THE NAVY.

The Speaker laid before the House the following executive communication:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, July 15, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 13th instant, directing the Secretary of the Navy to report to the House "whether any officer of the Navy has been retained on the active list after having been fifty years or longer in the service, or after he should have been retired by law, and if so, by whose order or authority."

In compliance with the resolution I have the honor to state that the only officers of the Navy on the active list who appear by the Register to have been fifty-five years or longer in the service are Admiral D. G. Farragut and Rear Admiral L. M. Goldsborough.

Rear Admiral Goldsborough's original entry into the service was, according to the Navy Register, on the 18th of June, 1812.

By that record, which is the governing rule of the Department, he had been an officer of the Navy fifty-five years on the 18th of June, 1867. Rear Admiral Goldsborough claims, however, that though his appointment is registered of that date, he did not receive orders or pay until July 1, 1816, and that his record of service should not commence until the date mentioned. This claim conflicts with the usage of the Department, and consequently was not sanctioned by it. A correspondence of some length took place between Rear Admiral Goldsborough and the Department on the subject, which eventuated in a submission of the question, by request, to the President and Cabinet, when the opinion of the Department was overruled, and Rear Admiral Goldsborough is therefore still registered as on the active list.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

GIDEON WELLES,

Secretary of the Navy.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. In connection with this subject I now offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House all correspondence between his Department and Rear Admiral Goldsborough, of the United States Navy, relating to the question of the length of service of said Goldsborough; and whether he is subject by law to be placed on the retired list; and also any former official communications of that officer relative to the length of time he has been in the service; or any other facts showing how long he has been or has claimed to be borne on the list of officers of the Navy.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed a concurrent resolution for the appointment of one member of the Senate and two members of the House to be added to the joint Committee on Retrenchment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

It also announced that the Senate had passed

House bill No. 108, for the relief of certain soldiers and sailors therein designated, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

It further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House additional papers in the case of the contested election of Delano vs. Morgan; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NORTHERN OHIO.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill that affects my own district and the northern district of Ohio. The delegation from the State are unanimous in its favor. It is a bill to provide that alternate sessions of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio shall be held annually, one session in the city of Cleveland on the second Tuesday of July, and one in Toledo on the second Tuesday in November, under such rules and regulations as the district judge for said district may prescribe; and it authorizes the holding of adjourned courts when the business before the court shall in the opinion of the court require it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object, on the ground that we have adopted a rule that no other business but on the question of reconstruction shall be done.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not object.

Mr. JENCKES. I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to the fact that the law now authorizes the judges of the United States courts to hold adjourned sessions, and there is, therefore, no reason for the last provision of his bill.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I do not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House, being objected to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If we pass a bill of this character we may pass a bill of any character. It is not in its nature at all pressing. I have a similar bill for my section of Pennsylvania. I have not presented it here because it would be a violation of the rule which the House has adopted, and we know from the remarks of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] that if this bill had been referred to a committee that is familiar with such questions they certainly would have reported, if the statement of the gentleman from Rhode Island is correct, that such a bill ought not to pass at all.

Yesterday we passed a bill which went over to the Senate, and they learn from the Secretary of War that no such bill is needed. We ought not to pass bills when we have no proper committees to examine them, and I insist on my objection on that ground.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Court of Claims be directed to furnish this House with a list of the judgments that have been rendered in said court since March 3, 1863, the amount of said judgments, the residence of claimants, the nature of claims, by whom said claims were prosecuted; also a list of the claims now before said court, in whose favor, and the amount of the same.

No objection was made to the reception of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish the gentleman would add to the resolution the words "and also a list of the judgments from which appeals have been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. That is a good suggestion, and I accept it as an addition to my resolution.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS IN REBEL STATES.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to introduce a bill to provide for the election of electors for President and Vice President of the United States in the States to be formed out of the territory included within the late confederate States, except Tennessee, and defining their qualifications.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Must not any bill or resolution either go upon the table or be referred to a committee without debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman desires to have the bill referred.

Mr. COBURN. Yes, sir; I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, requested, if not inconsistent with the public welfare, to communicate to this House all information which has been received at the several Departments of the Government touching the organization within or near the territory of the United States of America of men for the real or pretended purpose of avenging the death of the Archduke Maximilian, or of intervening in Mexican affairs; and also to inform this House whether and what measures have been taken to prevent such organization or the sailing of such organized bodies for the purpose of carrying out such object.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted: and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask leave to make a personal explanation with reference to a matter which appears in one of the public journals.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. In the Intelligencer published in this city on the 16th instant there appeared the following:

"In the discussion Mr. ELDRIDGE made the surprising statement that in a conversation which he had had with General Ould, who had charge of the exchange of prisoners on the part of the confederate government, he had been informed that an offer was made by General Ould to the Union officers having the matter in charge that he would give them twenty thousand Union prisoners, sick and wounded, (making up the number of deficient with able-bodied men,) without any equivalent, as the confederate government was unable to feed and take care of them properly, and that the offer was refused. It is probable that the important fact thus set forth would have been disputed by the partisan press if it had not been verified on the spot by General BUTLER himself, who was in charge of the exchange of prisoners on the part of the United States at the time.

"The fact that the offer was made to give up, 'without equivalent,' twenty thousand Federal troops, for the reason that their captors could not properly provide for them, and that this offer was not accepted at the time, but a proposition instead was submitted which would necessarily have caused indefinite delay, is here unequivocally admitted by General BUTLER, he distinctly admitting, as we understand the Chronicle's report, that upon receiving the offer he proposed 'to the rebels to let them send cotton to New York, sell it through their own agents, and with the proceeds procure what was necessary for their prisoners.' Now, it would seem that these astonishing disclosures would almost render superfluous the raising of a committee for the purpose of inquiring as to where lay the fault for the 'starving condition' of Federal prisoners in southern Andersonvilles! But it produced no perceptible effect upon the House, and we suppose the committee will peg away in the further solution of the vexed problem.

"A grave point, however, the committee may very fittingly investigate. General BUTLER fills a dismal void in this painful history by the convenient phrase, 'There has been some unavoidable delay in it, consequent on the operations of the Army.' This 'unavoidable delay' is all that appears to account for the failure, even if the offer of the rebels was promptly accepted, of the delivery of the thirteen thousand prisoners in addition to the alleged seven thousand prisoners whom the rebels had offered to restore to their homes; and who is to judge of 'delay consequent on the operations of the Army?' Who knows it was unavoidable? Who knows it was in consequence of Army operations? Who puts off the mourning kindred of these perishing thirteen thousand with the assurance of 'Army necessity?' The answer is, this exploded and inglorious muddler in warfare on the floor of the House. Let it be investigated."

Now, sir, I have made it a rule of my life never to reply to any newspaper or scandal slanders upon myself when I alone am affected. But when, through me, it is sought to charge the Government of the country, and the loyal men of the country, with what would be a gross act of cruelty, as well as a violation of all laws of humanity and the laws of war, I think it is my duty to myself and to the country to set the matter right, as in this instance I know I can.

This charge takes three distinct forms or branches: First, that the confederate commissioner of exchange made an offer to give up to our Government twenty thousand sick and wounded or able-bodied prisoners without any equivalent, and that this offer was refused; second, that this fact was distinctly admitted by General BUTLER in this House; third, that instead of accepting the offer, General BUTLER submitted a counter-proposition, which would necessarily have caused indefinite delay. The writer then asks, "Who gave General BUTLER the right to put off thirteen thousand men from exchange?"

Now, I have to say that each and all of these allegations are untrue in fact, in statement, and in inference. But words of characterization are useless. They will not add to the infamy of the charge; and epithets can by no means describe the author. Therefore I content myself with dealing with the simple fact and showing the proof. And the first proof I offer is that the supposed fact of the offer of exchange of twenty thousand sick and wounded prisoners without equivalent has no foundation in truth. No such offer was ever made. On the contrary, the offer to exchange sick and wounded prisoners came from myself, and was addressed to the rebel commissioner, Judge Ould, as will be seen by a letter which I ask the Clerk to read from page 155 of House Document No. 32, second session, Thirty-Eighth Congress, being the correspondence on the subject of exchange of prisoners published by order of Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS
DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA,
IN THE FIELD, September 9, 1864.

SIR: I propose that the belligerent parties, waiving all other questions, shall from time to time exchange all sick and invalid officers and men who from wounds or sickness shall, in the judgment of the party holding them, be unfit for duty, and likely to remain so for sixty days.

I make this proposition in order to alleviate the sufferings of those unable to bear the confinement incident to a prisoner of war, and whose condition might be benefited by the comforts of home and medical treatment by their friends.

I trust and believe that this measure of obvious humanity will meet your agreement, as I am satisfied no advantage can accrue to either party by retaining such men in confinement. As a further evidence of the strong desire on the part of this Government to expose their soldiers to as little hardship as possible, consistently with such action as they feel called upon to take to observe their good faith, pledged alike to all soldiers, although it will involve the Government in a very considerable expense, yet, to save the sick and suffering a long and tedious transportation by rail, I will receive such invalid officers and soldiers of the United States as may be confined in the States of North and South Carolina and Georgia at Fort Pulaski, near Savannah, and will transport thither any such invalids of the confederate forces as may be in our possession who can be more easily carried thither. Other invalid prisoners in the western department I will deliver at such points on the Mississippi river as may hereafter be agreed upon; the invalid soldiers of the United States to be received in exchange therefore who are convenient to the points. Full rolls of the invalids so exchanged to be kept, so that the equivalents may be adjusted hereafter.

Asking as early as possible attention to this proposition, I have the honor to be your obedient servant, &c.

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Hon. ROBERT OULD.

Mr. BUTLER. I received to that proposition an informal answer, which was communicated to the Secretary of War by letter dated September 30, 1864, which I beg to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS
DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA,
IN THE FIELD, VIRGINIA, September 13, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith five propositions as to matters relating to the exchange of prisoners made by me to Mr. Ould, together with a printed copy of my note of August 27, also forwarded to him.

I have as yet received no formal answer to either of my propositions, but I am informed, unofficially, that the proposition to exchange invalid prisoners will be accepted, and that I may prepare and send down to Fort Pulaski transportation for at least five thousand invalid men forthwith. This I shall at once proceed to do to make all possible provision for the comfort of our sick soldiers. If my action is approved, please direct the commissary general of prisoners to inform me at what points, and how many of the confederate invalids not fit for service within sixty days, will be ready, that my boat may take them for delivery. As soon as they can be got ready I propose to take them down by the same transportation that brings our men up.

Perhaps it may not be out of place to say that all these propositions received the sanction of the lieutenant general commanding.

If my action is approved, I pray early attention on the part of the commissary general of prisoners, as I will endeavor to be ready to move the confederate sick as soon as they are ready for me.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Mr. BUTLER. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition by the confederates was to give us the sick and wounded in answer to my proposition, the 10th of October, and it will be seen also there was no delay, when we come to read the telegrams and letters which passed between the commissary general of prisoners and the rebel commissioner and myself, which I ask that they be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES,
September 25, 1864—11 a. m.

Major Mulford leaves City Point this morning with six hundred officers and soldiers, mostly disabled, except in case of special exchange. There are at least six hundred more in and about Richmond for another load.

Please get ready six hundred of disabled confederates either at Point Lookout or Fort Delaware, preferably the latter, for return trip.

Nearly thirty died out of five hundred in the last load. Instruct the surgeons to send none who are in that condition. The occurrence does not speak well either for the Government or its officials.

The rebel commissioner of exchange agrees to deliver us at Fort Pulaski all the sick in Georgia by the 10th of next month, to the number of at least five thousand. I am preparing transportation for five thousand disabled confederates, to be carried down by the same transports that bring ours up. Please assemble them from the various camps and hospitals to points where they can be reached by the boats, and notify me.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Colonel HOFFMAN, Commissary General of Prisoners,
Washington, District of Columbia.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES,
September 25, 1864—8.30 p. m.

I have made arrangements with Mr. Ould to give me at least five thousand of our sick men in Georgia and South Carolina, and take what equivalent we may have. I have offered to take them at Fort Pulaski as an act of humanity, because I think that railroading through the confederacy, with such accommodations as they could get, would bring many of them to their death. He will receive on the Mississippi or its tributaries, at such points as may be agreed upon, all the sick we may have at the western camps, and will be glad to do it for the same reason. After the boat load up the river, we may as well send our balance down with the same transportation to Fort Pulaski.

Please advise me, looking on the matter in the light of this dispatch.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Colonel HOFFMAN, Commissary General of Prisoners,
Washington, District of Columbia.

HEADQUARTERS
DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA,
IN THE FIELD, September 27, 1864.

GENERAL: Dispatch received. Please understand that Ould will give us the five thousand, whether we send down so many sick or not, if we send those that we have on this coast, and afterward those in the interior, as many as we can.

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.

HEADQUARTERS
DEPARTMENT OF VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA,
September 28, 1864—8.15 p. m.

The one thousand invalid prisoners of which you spoke better be sent to Point Lookout. I will see that they are furnished with transportation to Fort Pulaski. On the going up of the flag-of-truce boat I will arrange with Mr. Ould as to where he will receive the invalid prisoners on the Mississippi.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Colonel HOFFMAN, Commissary General of Prisoners,
Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Clerk to read the telegraphic order given to Major Mulford, assistant commissioner of exchange on the part of the United States, in reference to getting the prisoners together.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

HEADQUARTERS
DEPARTMENT VIRGINIA AND NORTH CAROLINA,
IN THE FIELD, September 27, 1864.
Get a full load of prisoners either at Fort Delaware, Point Lookout, or Fort McHenry.

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
MAJOR MULFORD, Fort Monroe.

Mr. BUTLER. I now desire to put before the House a letter to Judge Ould accompanying these sick prisoners.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE FIELD, HEADQUARTERS
JUNCTION OF VIRGINIA AND NEW MARKET ROADS,
October 4, 1864.

SIR: Major Mulford, my assistant agent of exchange, has at Varina about seven hundred invalid prisoners for delivery.

For obvious reasons they cannot be received by you there, and in the present state of the roads it would be cruel to transport them far by wagons.

I would suggest that they be delivered at Port Walthall, at the same point where it is proposed to deliver the naval prisoners.

If so, the prisoners will be delivered there at any hour you may name.

We will also receive yours at the same point. Or, if you prefer, we will deliver at the point on the New Market roads between the pickets.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
ROBERT OULD, Esq., Commissioner for Exchange.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES,
October 5, 1864—5.30 p. m.

Rev. Isaac Wholly will be forwarded.

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Colonel HOFFMAN, Commissary of Prisoners, Washington, District of Columbia.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES,
October 8, 1864.

Lieutenant Colonel Mulford leaves Varina to-morrow morning with thirteen hundred prisoners, officers and men. He will beat Annapolis on the 10th. I desire all the sick and disabled up to six hundred to be got ready at once, so as not to detain his boat.

Please inform Colonel Mulford, at Annapolis, at what point he will get them. I further desire that the sick and wounded of the confederate prisoners this side of the mountains be gathered at once at Baltimore, Fort Delaware, and Point Lookout, so that they may be taken to Savannah and exchanged for our men. Please notify me at what time they will be ready, and I will provide transportation.

The special exchanges, so far as possible, have been effected.

BENJ. F. BUTLER,
Major General and Commissioner for Exchange.
Colonel HOFFMAN, Commissary General of Prisoners.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am ready to submit to this House and to the country, first, whether there was any proposition to send twenty thousand prisoners to us without equivalent; and second, whether this Government did not make the first offer to send down the sick and wounded we had and to take from the confederates all the sick and wounded they had.

We offered to send the prisoners to Georgia for exchange, when the cartel required they should be exchanged at Richmond, rather than cause these disabled sick men to be carried in the condition they were over the poor railroads of the South. Sir, does not this record evidence dispose of the calumny that the United States Government was not in favor of receiving from the confederates and actually taking from the confederacy all the sick and wounded prisoners which they had?

The next statement of this article is that I made a counter proposition to this offer of the rebels relating to their selling cotton to support their prisoners, which would cause indefinite delay. On the contrary that proposition was sent to the rebel commissioner by Major Mulford with the first steamers having on board five thousand sick rebel prisoners for Savannah; and it is a proposition so eminently just, humane, and generous, that I beg leave to submit it to the House and to the country. I ask therefore to have read a letter of instruction to the assistant commissioner of exchange on the part of the United States, dated October 26, only sixteen days after the first day on which we were notified by the rebels that it was possible for them to have prisoners ready.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES,
IN THE FIELD, October 26, 1864.

Having, in obedience to orders by telegraph, received on board the fleet of vessels which Colonel Webster, chief quartermaster, has been ordered to place at your disposal, all invalid confederate prisoners of war as certified to me by Colonel Hoffman in the eastern camps held by us, you will proceed to Fort Pulaski with your prisoners and there tender them for exchange, according to the agreement made between the Commissioner of Exchange on the part of the United States and the agent of exchange for the confederate authorities, and there receive on board all the prisoners belonging to the United States which shall be given you by the confederate authorities.

You will also inform the confederate authorities that there are from two thousand five hundred to three thousand invalid prisoners within the agreement ready for delivery on the Mississippi river as soon as the point shall be designated. They are in the western camps. As this matter of the exchange of prisoners is managed in behalf of the military authorities of the United States through the agent of exchange, you will take no direction upon the subject except from the Commissioner of Exchange or the Secretary of War. This direction is given you because your business at Fort Pulaski will be within the department of General Foster; and to save all possible conflict of authority you will report your arrival and business to the commander of the department, so that your operations may not interfere with any military movements within his lines.

You will doubtless be obliged to go into Port Royal with your large ships and load them with your smaller vessels from the inside passage, which will be more conducive to the comfort of the men and safety of your fleet. As soon as you get one of the larger vessels loaded you will send it forward to Annapolis; and if you can receive more prisoners than your fleet can accommodate, order her to return. You will allow one agent of either the Christian or Sanitary Commission on each vessel. You will take competent pilots and see that your vessels are well watered. You will draw from the quartermaster such extra clothing, blankets, and other articles as may be necessary for the comfort of the prisoners. The United States Government will by no means stint these men who have suffered so much in anything for their comfort as soon as they come within our jurisdiction. For other details I must depend upon your judgment, zeal, and activity in the service.

In the matter which has been discussed between the United States Government and the confederate authorities providing for their respective prisoners, you are authorized to offer the confederate military authorities the following terms:

It is understood that prisoners of both sides complain of their treatment by those having them in charge, in shelter, food, clothing, and hospital stores. You will then offer on the part of the United States—

First. That the United States will furnish food according to its discretion to the prisoners held by the confederate authorities, delivering it at the nearest seaport to the place where the prisoners are held, the confederate authorities to furnish transportation from the point of delivery. The United States will furnish its prisoners in the hands of the confederate authorities, delivered in like manner, with such articles of clothing and other necessary articles, including tea, coffee, tobacco, and stationery, as they may judge expedient, delivered in like manner. The United States will furnish such hospital stores as they deem expedient to their prisoners, delivered and to be transported in like manner. The United States will furnish such shelter to their prisoners as they deem expedient, delivered in like manner. The United States, on the other hand, will permit the confederate authorities to furnish, at such points as they may choose, confederates held as prisoners of war with shelter, food, clothing, including blankets and hospital stores, at the discretion of the confederate authorities; or if preferred by the confederate authorities, the United States will permit the confederate authorities to purchase from the quartermaster, commissary, and medical departments of the United States such food and clothing, including blankets, as the confederate authorities may choose for their prisoners, at such prices paid by the United States for such articles, except the uniform of the soldiers of the United States, which will not be permitted to be worn by the confederate prisoners; and the United States will permit to be purchased in the markets of the United States such clothing as the confederate authorities may choose, including blankets, to furnish to the confederate prisoners of war, all to be paid for in the legal currency of the United States, or the United States will receive in payment for such goods so sold by them, cotton, upon the terms and conditions upon which cotton is pledged for the confederate loan in Europe, and will permit such cotton to be sent from any port in the United States, whether such ports are in the possession of the confederate authorities or otherwise, or we will receive such cotton in payment at any port to be designated by the confederate authorities in the United States, or whether said port is in the possession of the confederate authorities or otherwise, for all articles. The United States will also permit the purchase of tents, at the price paid by the United States, for shelter to the confederate prisoners held by them upon the same terms and conditions as the purchase of provisions and supplies. Hospital stores may be furnished upon the same condition by the confederate authorities.

All these to be receipted for and distributed and expended by a board of three officers from the prisoners of war held by either side above the rank of company officers at each prison, who shall be paroled for that purpose, and shall have full liberty to communicate with the commissioner of exchange of the confederate authorities and the United States in open letters. It being understood and agreed that no article permitted by either Government for the use of its prisoners shall be upon any pretext or for any cause whatever diverted from the use for which they are dedicated; and any surplus of articles furnished by the United States or by the confederate authorities is to be returned to the place where received by either party and put at the disposal of the party owning the same.

Any other minor details not provided for in these instructions will be the subject of further just and equitable arrangement.

It is further understood and agreed that either party shall have the privilege of putting a surgeon on each board of officers herein provided for.

All these terms are believed to be equitable and just, and will so relieve either party from complaints of the other party that it is hoped they will be accepted. If any minor points, any objections are made on the part of the confederate authorities you will report the objections and they will be carefully considered, and, unless vital, will be yielded to. These terms you will write out separately from your letters of instruction or propositions for agreement and certify them officially so that there may be no mistake in the terms offered.

If, as may be the case, it is objected by the confederate authorities that the United States had a larger number of prisoners taken from the confederate army than the confederate authorities hold taken from the Army of the United States, and that, therefore, accepting these terms will impose a burden upon the confederate authorities greater than that assumed by the United States, although such claims would not apparently be well founded, yet the Government of the United States being very anxious to relieve in so far as they may their prisoners of war from what they are instructed and believe to be great want and distress, you are authorized to offer, rather than the negotiations shall be broken off upon this point, that the United States will, after supplying an equal number of the prisoners held by the United States according to the equivalent established by the cartel, using that as a measure of reference, supply only the surplus of prisoners held by us with precisely the same and not other and different shelter, clothing, food, and medicine with which the confederate authorities supply an equal number of their prisoners held by the United States; but this proposition is not made except for the purpose of closing the negotiation on the point, as it is not deemed just that, from motives of humanity, the United States should bear any portion of the burden which properly belongs to the confederate authorities because of the superiority of the United States in capturing prisoners of war.

All propositions received upon this subject from the confederate authorities will be received by you in writing, but they will not prevent oral discussion of the several points involved in order to their true and just settlement, but such discussion shall not be taken or deemed to be propositions on the one side or the other.

You will see how much is confided to your discretion, care, and judgment, and it is hoped that you may succeed in having established some just and equitable arrangement upon the basis of these instructions for the care and treatment of prisoners of war, which seem very likely not to be exchanged.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER.

Major General and Commissioner for Exchange, Colonel M'LEOD.

Mr. BUTLER. Thus you see, Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States not only offered to take care of all the confederate prisoners it had, but also offered to take charge of, shelter, warm, clothe, and feed all our prisoners in the hands of the confederacy; and that offer was continued open so long as I had anything to do with the matter of exchange. I think that these documents will satisfy the country that there is no truth whatever in the charge made by those who say our Government only is always wrong and the rebels only were always right, that any officer having charge of the exchange of prisoners failed in any respect in our duty to our sick and wounded soldiers.

Therefore let me say to the Intelligencer, which the sworn testimony in a court of justice has lately shown to be the chosen and accredited organ of John Wilkes Booth, that if it is not satisfied with this explanation, I propose to go a little further and show how its rebel friends treated American soldiers when captured by them.

In the first place, sir, there is the irrefragable proof that they took our gallant soldiers captured in war as prisoners and with their uniforms on turned them over to their supposed masters as slaves. Lest I fail to speak by the book, I will ask the Clerk to read an official notice of that fact published in the Richmond Examiner on the 11th of October, 1864, and the letter from me giving notice of retaliation for such treatment of our soldiers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Notice.

HEADQUARTERS CAMP OF INSTRUCTION, RICHMOND, October 8, 1864.

In accordance with the provisions of General Orders No. 25, adjutant and inspector general's office, last series, the owners of the following negroes will call at this camp and prove their claims, as required by act of Congress:

Junius, slave of Thad's Dillard, Surrey county, Virginia.

Philip, slave of John Fisher, Essex county, Virginia.

Elijah, slave of Luther Bryan, company F, fifth South Carolina regiment.

James Bush, slave of Griffin Bush, Montgomery county, Virginia.

Revel Garrison, slave of Ed. Garrison, Accomac county, Virginia.

Richard Saunders, slave of George Strother, Stafford county, Virginia.

George Washington, slave of Calvin Goodlow, Franklin county, Virginia.

George and William, slaves of Dr. Charles Weisger, Chesterfield county, Virginia.

Jim, slave of William Graham, Fort Monroe, Virginia.

Gray, slave of B. Barnes, Wayne county, North Carolina.

George, slave of Mrs. Morrison, Alleghany county, Virginia.

Charles, slave of Mr. Ashton, Portsmouth, Virginia.

By order of Major T. G. PEYTON.

Official: L. O. PETTUS, Lieutenant and Adjutant.

Official: W. H. TAYLOR, Lieutenant Colonel, A. A. G.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES, October 12, 1864.

SIR: I inclose a copy of an advertisement cut from a Richmond paper, where a military officer commanding a camp near Richmond calls upon their masters to come forward and make claim to the services and labor of certain colored men therein described. Some of these are believed to be soldiers of the United States Army, captured in arms.

If I am mistaken in this belief, I desire to be promptly corrected. I have ordered to such manual labor as I deem most fitting to meet the exigency an equal number of prisoners of war held by us, and I shall continue to order to labor captives in war to an equal number of all the soldiers of the United States I have reason to believe are held to labor and service by the forces you represent, until I am notified that this practice on your part has ceased. Much as I regret the necessity imposed upon me to do this, yet I am compelled by the sternest convictions of duty thus to inaugurate a system of retaliation which will be firmly carried out.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER.

Major General Commanding.

Hon. ROBERT OULD,

Commissioner for Exchange, Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Not only that; but when on the 29th of September, 1864, the rebels captured one hundred and ten of our colored soldiers from regiments, one of which was raised and organized in this District, after they had made one of the most gallant charges of the war on Fort Gilmer, a very strong work, but failed to capture it, how do you suppose the rebel friends of the Intelligencer treated them? Marched them over to the trenches in front of our guns, and set them at work digging fortifications for the enemy. And not only that, but they starved them while they were so at work under fire. Showing I am not wrong in this, I beg to submit to the House and the country the affidavits of three men from among others taken at the time.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES, October 12, 1864.

James F. Knight, company F, fifty-ninth Virginia regiment, put into the first regiment Virginia reserves, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that on Thursday, the 6th, and on Friday, the 7th instant, he was on duty with his regiment, (first Virginia reserves,) and that on one of the above-mentioned days, which he does not now definitely remember, he, with his company, (company A, first regiment Virginia reserves,) went from their camp, which was then on the intermediate line near the Darbytown road, to Richmond, Virginia, and took from Libby prison about eighty-two colored men who were there as captured prisoners of war, and brought them to the intermediate lines between the Newmarket and Darbytown roads, where they were put to work throwing up intrenchments; and where, to the best of his knowledge and belief, they now remained, doing work in the manner described above, he having left them on the morning of this day. Deponent further says that they were clad in uniform.

JAMES F. KNIGHT.

Sworn to and subscribed to before me, this 12th day of October, 1864.

JOHN J. DAVENPORT.

Aid-de-Camp and Assistant Provost Marshal.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES, October 12, 1864.

Chapman Dinking, of Yadkin county, North Carolina, member of the thirty-eighth North Carolina regiment, put into the Virginia local reserves, lately stationed at Fort Gilmer, on oath deposes and says, that coming to Fort Gilmer on the night of Thursday, the 6th of October, he found one hundred and ten colored soldiers in the uniform of the United States, captured in the recent engagements, at work in the trenches at Fort Gilmer, without sufficient food, so that they were exchanging their clothes for food with the confederate soldiers. Deponent further says that he left the confederate lines on the night of the 11th instant, and that when he left the trenches they were still at work.

CHAPMAN DINKING.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 12th day of October, 1864.

JOHN J. DAVENPORT.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES, October 12, 1864.

Samuel Miller, of battery C, eighteenth Virginia battalion of artillery, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that he, with his company, has been for some weeks past stationed at battery No. 8, situated on the intermediate lines between the Charles City and Darbytown roads, and that to his personal knowledge he knows of some twenty-five to eighty colored prisoners of war, clad in the uniform of the United States, to have been kept at work on fortifications and intrenchments in that vicinity and upon that line since Thursday, the 6th instant. Deponent also further says that he knows of numbers of them having been obliged to trade their clothes and shoes with the confederate soldiers for food, owing to an insufficiency being furnished them.

SAMUEL MILLER.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 12th day of October, 1864.

JOHN J. DAVENPORT.

Lieutenant and Aid-de-Camp, Assistant Provost Marshal.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, this proof having come to me that our colored soldiers, prisoners of war, were being worked in the trenches in their uniforms, it became my duty to provide a remedy, and that remedy you will find set forth in this letter.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE JAMES, IN THE FIELD, October 12, 1864.

SIR: I inclose herewith affidavits showing the employment of one hundred and ten United States colored soldiers by the military officers of the confederate forces in the trenches near Fort Gilmer, a practice justified by no rule of war or claim heretofore made by the confederate authorities. I have ordered a like number of the officers and soldiers captured by us (preferring as many of the Virginia reserve forces, by whom this outrage is being done, as I have captured) into the canal at Dutch Gap, and put them at hard labor, and shall continue to add to their number until this practice is stopped.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER.

Major General Commanding.

Hon. ROBERT OULD, Commissioner for Exchange, Richmond, Virginia.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me say that the medicine was potent. In twenty-four hours from that time I was informed from Robert E. Lee, commanding the confederate forces, that all the colored men had been withdrawn from the trenches, and I withdrew the Virginia reserve from Dutch Gap, much to their relief. It was a stern measure of retaliation, but justified, it seemed to me, by the fact that there was an attempt to put our soldiers who were prisoners under our own fire and make their comrades murder them.

Now, sir, I have brought this question before the House in order that these facts which are buried up in the mass of the correspondence may become known to the country. All the correspondence upon this subject now exists on the records of the House. There will be found no word to controvert any portion of that which I have brought before you. I have not felt it to be my duty, nor indeed within the scope of the liberty given me here of explanation to advert to the question as to upon whom the blame rests, if any there be, as to the general exchange of prisoners, whether upon the one side or upon the other. Whenever that question comes up I shall be quite prepared to discuss it. It is not now before the House or the country. The question is as to the treatment of prisoners while they were held.

It is due, however, to myself and to the General commanding the Army of the United States that I should say here that in all these measures which I have brought to the attention of the House, I had his full and hearty cooperation. I will not by my silence on that subject seem to countenance the idea that I had not his fullest support.

It only remains for me now to thank the House for the patience with which they have listened to what were it not for the interest in the subject might seem somewhat dry details; but I think that when this correspondence is carefully and coolly read it will put the authorities—not speaking of the individual, but the authorities who had this matter of the rights of our soldiers in prison in charge—firmer and deeper in the affections of the country, and will by no means tend to relieve the great burden which now bears heavily on the rebel authorities because they violated the rules of war in the treatment of captured, helpless prisoners.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a remark upon this subject, as my name has been somewhat connected with it.

No objection was made.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the gentleman proceeds, let me say that it was no part of my desire to intimate one word against him.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not understand the gentleman to make any personal reflection on me, neither shall I make any personal reflection on him or upon any of the officers who had this matter of exchange in charge. I did not, in bringing before the House the statements which came to me from General Ould, the rebel commissioner of exchange, make any such reflections. I spoke only in vindication of history, and it is for that purpose that I now rise. I do not say that the rebels were right, or that they were willing at all times to make exchanges upon proper terms. I do not deny any of the propositions which the gentleman may have made. But General Ould occupied a position in the confederate army, and occupies a position to-day as a man which entitles his statement to much credit upon this subject of exchange, and the people of this country have felt very great anxiety about it.

Many doubts have existed as to the propriety of the conduct of our officers having that subject in charge. These may relate alone, as the gentleman in his concluding remarks seemed to indicate, to the general subject of exchange. Upon that I cannot speak. But General Ould made the statement to me in the presence of other gentlemen who are members of this House. If gentlemen are capable of vindicating themselves to the full extent which the gentleman from Massachusetts says they can, what was the objection, I ask, to the investigation which was desired by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCGEE?] Why should gentlemen not be willing to have the matter investigated before a committee of this House, a committee of the political friends of the gentleman from Massachusetts? Why was it that we found the majority of this House voting in solido against any investigation on this subject; against referring this subject to the committee?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to say that I did not vote against that investigation; and my reason was, that I felt that it pointed to me, and that I had no right to vote on the question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman certainly did not help me to get the yeas and nays. I tried to ascertain precisely who would vote against it. I sought to obtain the yeas and nays on that question, but we were too few and feeble to do it. By a very decided majority the ruling party in this House refused to give the gentleman from Ohio, one of the committee raised to investigate this subject of the treatment of Union prisoners, the additional power to inquire into this very question.

Now, I propose to gentlemen on that side of the House to give us a committee a majority of which shall be members of that side of the House; and let us investigate that subject and see whether there is any wrong and where the responsibility for that wrong should rest. It is not in the interest of the confederates or of any rebel that I ask this committee. I ask it in vindication of history. A grave charge has gone out to the world from the man who had principal connection with this subject in the confederate States. Other nations may not look so charitably on this subject and upon those engaged in exchanges upon our side as we are inclined to do. Let us have this matter investigated, and then truth of history shall be vindicated.

I know not whether the statement made by General Ould is true or not. But I know he made the statement, and also that he stated he was subpoenaed here as a witness in the Wirz trial, and after he had been here in the neighborhood of ten days a messenger was sent to him from the court announcing that his subpoena was revoked. What that means I leave to Congress to determine. He declined to surrender his subpoena. He had been subpoenaed on behalf of the defense. He compromised with the messenger by promising to appear in court next morning and submit himself to its order or authority. The Judge Advocate General then compromised with him by revoking his subpoena in writing upon the back of it, and redelivering it to him. And General Ould, at the time that he spoke of this matter, claimed, if I recollect rightly, that he then had the subpoena in his possession. He supposed that the reason for that proceeding, and that he was not allowed to testify in that case, was because it had transpired in some way that he would testify to the facts substantially which I have stated as having been related to me by him. Now, I ask, I entreat, gentlemen having the power to determine it, to give us a committee to investigate this subject, to ascertain whether there is wrong with reference to these exchanges, and to fix the responsibility for that wrong where it should properly rest.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Certainly I will.

Mr. BALDWIN. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he desires or expects this House to take the assertion of the rebel General Ould against the documentary evidence and the statements of our own military officers?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not ask this House or the country or the world to take the statement of General Ould. I ask only this House to raise a committee composed of the political friends of the majority of this House, if they dare do so, for the purpose of investigating the fact and ascertaining if it be true or false.

Mr. BALDWIN. On the ground that the statement of Ould is to prevail against the documents and against the statements of our own generals?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Only in case upon the investigation it shall prove to be true. I insist that General Ould occupied during the war and now occupies a position which entitles his statement to sufficient consideration to justify us in investigating this subject and ascertaining whether or not he tells the truth; and whether or not any of the consequences of those long and fatal imprisonments of Union soldiers properly ought to rest upon Union authorities.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that I will be allowed one word.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. In a moment I will. Our generals were in constant intercourse with General Ould during a greater part of the war, and know him better than I do; and I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and believe he will not hesitate here to state that General Ould, although he may have committed the crime of treason and gone into the rebel army, was not in other respects a highly honorable and conscientious man.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JULIAN. I yield for a short while further.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the war, sir, I believe General Ould was a highly conscientious and honorable man; but I hold that when a man commits treason he is like a woman who loses her virtue, ready for any crime, and from that moment no one knows where to find him.

Now, sir, I say further that if the gentleman from Wisconsin will take this volume of correspondence and read it carefully, and then come into the House, and upon his honor as a member of the House, as he will state if he states at all, say he finds any reason to believe any wrong has been done, I for one will vote, and ask our friends in the House to vote, for any investigation he may desire.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes a sweeping charge when he alleges that any one who goes into rebellion loses all character for truth and honesty. I think the gentleman cannot have forgotten that eminent men from his own State once went into rebellion. He cannot have forgotten John Hancock and John Adams, General Washington, and a host of others, and that every one of them was called a rebel. Every one of them, sir, was a rebel. [Hissing upon the floor and in the galleries.] Every one of them was guilty of treason until their rebellion was crowned with success. The crime of rebellion, I insist, does not destroy every other virtue—

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen upon the floor cannot manifest approbation or disapprobation without violating the rules which they have themselves established.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is not strange that these eminent names are hissed in these days—

Mr. JULIAN. I think that this has gone far enough.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish simply to make this further remark in response to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. His statements have included but little more than records made by himself, and they are but one side of the case. He has not pretended or attempted to put in any evidence before the House to meet the point involved in the statement made to me by General Ould.

Mr. SCHENCK rose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. In one moment. That statement of General Ould may be true, and the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts may also be true. The charge contained in the statement remains unanswered and should certainly be investigated by a committee.

REBEL STATE DEBTS.

Mr. JULIAN. I now insist on resuming the floor, and ask unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the doctrines avowed by the President of the United States in his message to Congress on the 15th instant, to the effect that the abrogation of the governments of the rebel States binds the nation to pay their debts incurred prior to the late rebellion is at war with the principles of international law, a deliberate stab at the national credit, abhorrent to every sentiment of loyalty, and well-pleasing only to the vanquished traitors by whose agency alone the governments of said States were overthrown and destroyed.

Mr. BURR. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object to the resolution.

Mr. JULIAN moved to suspend the rules. Mr. ROBINSON withdrew his objection. The resolution was received.

Mr. JULIAN. I demand the previous question on its adoption.

Mr. BROOKS. You cannot vote down Vattel and Phillimore and Wheaton and Bynkershock and other writers on the law of nations. This House, sir, can pass this resolution, but it does not change the law of nations.

Mr. JULIAN. I do not propose to discuss Vattel now. We on this side are ready to vote on the resolution, having examined the gentleman's authorities some time ago.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to inquire of my colleague whether Governor MORRIS, of Indiana, and now Senator from that State, did not while Governor avow the same doctrine, and argue it very ably in a carefully prepared speech in 1865, at Richmond, Indiana, in the gentleman's own district?

Mr. JULIAN. If I recollect the facts, I think the Governor of our State did avow and argue it at the time and place mentioned. I am very sure, however, that he regrets the avowal deeply, in common with all his Republican friends. I now desire to amend the resolution by inserting the words "their allies and sympathizers" at the end of the word "traitors."

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the gentleman mean by that phrase the gentleman who is the father of the doctrine in this country from his own State?

Mr. JULIAN. In reply to the gentleman, I will state that I think the gentlemen on the opposite side understand as perfectly as I do whom I mean by the phrase "allies and sympathizers."

Mr. BURR. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he avers that the President of the United States has expressly avowed or affirmed any such doctrine as is stated in the resolution?

Mr. JULIAN. I mean to say he has avowed it in effect in the message to which the resolution refers.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. JULIAN. I will hear it read for information.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by adding the following:

And that the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire whether the intention of said message was to impair the financial credit of this Government.

Mr. JULIAN. I prefer the resolution as I offered it. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—yeas 78, noes 18, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, is the resolution divisible? If so, I want to settle the law of nations in the House first.

The SPEAKER. It is not divisible.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 18, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchin, Kountz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Price, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Brooks, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Holman, Hotchkiss, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Pruyn, Robinson, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stone, and Van Trump—18.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Blaine, Boyer, Burr, Cake, Chanler, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Kerr, Ladin, Lynch, Malloy, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Noell, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Randall, Ross, Selye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Taber, Thomas, Upson, Van Aiken, Burt Van Horn, James F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—52.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the resolution of the Senate appointing one additional member of the Senate and two members of the House upon the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. JENCKES. I move that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed the following gentlemen as additional members of the committee on the part of the House: THOMAS A. JENCKES, of Rhode Island, JOHN F. BENJAMIN, of Missouri.

RELIEF OF DESERTERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the various bills and resolutions received from the Senate; the first of which was House bill No. 108, for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated, with amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

That no soldier or sailor shall be taken or held to be a deserter from the Army or Navy who faithfully served according to his enlistment until the 19th day of April, 1865, and who, without proper authority or leave first obtained, did quit his command or refuse to serve after said date; but nothing herein contained shall operate as a remission of any forfeiture incurred by any such soldier or sailor of his pay, bounty, pension, or other allowances; but this act shall be construed solely as a removal of any disability such soldier or sailor may have incurred by the loss of his citizenship in consequence of his desertion.

Also to strike out from the title of the bill the word "volunteer."

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will move a non-concurrence. If these men were not deserters they ought not to be fined.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. My State is, perhaps, more directly interested in this matter than any other, and I should dislike very much to have this amendment concurred in.

After the surrender of the armies of Lee and Johnston a majority of the volunteer soldiers of the United States believed that they had legally fulfilled their contract with the Government. Many of the regiments from my own State and from my own district were retained in the service months after that event happened. From ten to fifty persons, perhaps, in each regiment, and in one or two regiments with whose history I am peculiarly acquainted, a larger number left their regiments and went home, refusing to serve longer. Those men had gone through the whole war, many of them having served four years, and been faithful in the discharge of every duty. They left, not because they were deserters, but because they believed that they had fulfilled their contract with the Government, and were determined to go home even though they forfeited their pay. In one instance a gentleman, whom I know very well, and who owned a farm in Ohio, left his regiment on account of the state of his health, and died a few days after he reached his home. His name is borne on the rolls as a deserter, and his family have applied in vain for his pay. This bill as it passed the Senate affords no relief in such cases. It is simply a pardon to those who thus deserted. I hope the House will not concur in the amendment, but that we shall have a conference with the Senate. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. These soldiers, most of them, were enlisted for a special period or during the war. After the surrender of the rebel armies the Government commenced to muster out regiments all over the country. In all the different military departments officers were mustered out and granted their three months' extra pay; and yet other officers who resigned subsequently to that time were refused their three months' extra pay. It was a breach of faith against those men who had enlisted for the war against the rebellion to keep them in the service after the war against the rebellion was over. Many regiments were kept in service for months after the rebellion was over. Some of them who had enlisted to fight the rebels were sent out to the Plains to fight the Indians.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. And some of them were sent to Texas to make railroads.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As the gentleman suggests, some of them were sent to Texas. I know that some regiments from my own State that I raised myself were sent out to the western part of Kansas to take care of the Indians long after the war was over. It was an injustice and a breach of faith to these men. This bill of the Senate says that they shall not be considered guilty of desertion, and yet that they shall not be entitled to their pay and bounty. If they were not guilty of desertion how was there any forfeiture of pay? For Congress to say that these men were not guilty of desertion, and yet refuse to pay them after they had served the term for which they enlisted, is simply rank injustice, and I hope the House will not concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now ask the previous question.

The previous question seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate and ask a conference, was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia, and also a bill to carry into effect the convention with the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed bill of the House supplementary to an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which he was requested to ask the concurrence of the House.

MELINDA HARMON.

Senate bill No. 127, entitled "An act for the relief of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon," was read a first and second time.

Mr. PERHAM. This bill is simply designed to correct an error in a bill passed at the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. In the act for the relief of this lady her name was written "Matilda Harmon," instead of "Melinda Harmon." I hope the bill will be put on its passage.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section for the repeal of the act of January 31, 1867, for the relief of Matilda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon.

The second section provides that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to place the name of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon, on the pension-roll at eight dollars per month, to commence on the 17th of December, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

PRINTING FOR THE DEPARTMENTS.

Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 130) entitled "An act supplementary to an act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "in" in line four, down to and including "department" in line eight, and insert in lieu thereof "the Treasury Department and bureaus thereof;" and at the end of the bill add the words, "but the number of persons employed in this service shall not be increased," so that the clause will read:

That the concluding proviso of section ten of the act described in the title hereof shall not be held to prevent the necessary printing as heretofore done in the Treasury Department and bureaus thereof by their own employees; but the number of persons employed in this service shall not be increased.

The amendment was concurred in.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Senate bill No. 137, entitled "An act for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia," was read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope that bill will be put upon its passage at once.

The bill, which was read, provides that in the District of Columbia no person shall be excluded from any office by reason of race or color, and that so much of any law as makes any such discrimination shall be repealed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield to my colleague, [Mr. JUDD,] who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. JUDD. I move to amend by inserting after the word "office" the words "or from serving on juries."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suggest to my colleague that he had better modify his amendment so that it will read, "or from being selected as a juror."

Mr. JUDD. I am not particular as to the form, so that it accomplishes my object, which is that all the citizens of the District of Columbia shall be allowed to serve upon juries. I modify my amendment so as to read, "or from being selected and serving as a juror."

Mr. INGERSOLL. If no other gentleman desires to say anything, I will now call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are defeating the very thing that we profess to have established in the progress toward freedom and equality, by passing continually acts declaring there shall be no discrimination "on account of race or color." I would suggest to the gentleman that the language of the bill would be much better if it provided that all citizens of the District of Columbia shall be eligible to any of these positions. Some phraseology of this sort appears to me decidedly preferable.

We have by our bill securing civil rights, I mean to citizens otherwise qualified—we have by our bill securing civil rights, we have by amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery, we have in various ways, as far as the statute-book can make it so, abolished this distinction in reference to all these things, but we seem continually in our bills by inserting the words "without distinction of race or color" to keep up and attract attention to a distinction which otherwise would not and could not, as it ought not, to exist. I trust therefore, sir, that the gentleman who was chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia will amend it in some way so as to leave out that eternal iteration and reiteration of an old phrase, "without distinction of race or color." I think we might as well put into our statute-book that men shall have certain privileges without distinction of being tall or short, without distinction of being red-haired or black-haired, thin or stout. Yet we are continually in our statute-book making such distinctions when we cling to such a phrase as is introduced into this bill.

I merely make this suggestion. I think that the bill ought to be amended so as to read "citizens who are electors." Put in that language and then let any man disregard the law at his peril.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield now to my colleague.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion of the honorable gentleman from Ohio meets my views exactly on this question. I offered the amendment in the form it was given, because I saw that my colleague desired to pass the bill at the present time, and I desired to restrict that right so far as the serving on juries was concerned. If the bill had originated with the Committee for the District of Columbia in this House, I have no doubt the language of the gentleman from Ohio would have been adopted. I concede, sir, the force of the objection that the gentleman from Ohio makes, and I think that this is as good a time and this is as good a place to declare that all who are entitled to citizenship shall have all the rights and privileges of citizenship; that all citizens in the District of Columbia shall serve as jurors.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Only a word. I am not quite sure that the use of the word "citizens" in the present bill will not be going too far. It ought to read, all qualified electors.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not care about offering any amendment of that kind myself, because I believe the object sought to be accomplished by the gentleman from Ohio is really accomplished by the language of the bill already. But I will submit this to the House, that it shall read thus: "that in the District of Columbia no citizen, being an elector, shall be excluded," &c.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. That will do.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I offer that amendment, and demand the previous question.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to say a word.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield for a moment.

Mr. PRUYN. In reference to what has fallen from the gentlemen from Ohio, I beg to say that the current of things in the Senate seems to be taking quite a different direction. In the bill just reported to the Senate, offered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, he not only speaks of the distinction of race or color, but of the distinction of the so-called white race. We can hardly, in this condition of things in the Senate, expect to carry out the views of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. PILE. I suggest that the gentleman insert the word "qualified" before "electors."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suppose all electors are required to have certain qualifications in order to become electors, consequently there is no necessity for such an amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. JUDD and the amendment of Mr. INGERSOLL were agreed to.

The bill as amended was then read a third time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, in order to reach the subject which has been so fully discussed, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was read a third time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now move to strike out the words "by reason of race or color."

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. It had better be referred to a committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will let it be referred to any committee, provided the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report at any time.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The latter part of the motion giving leave to the committee to report at any time requires a two-thirds vote.

The motion was agreed to without objection.

TREATY WITH VENEZUELA.

The SPEAKER next laid before the House Senate bill No. 138, to carry into effect the convention with the republic of Venezuela, and for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic; which was read a first and second time, and, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION IN THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER announced the following select Committee on Education in the District of Columbia:

THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, HENRY VAN AERNAM of New York, WILLIAM WILLIAMS of Indiana, WILLIAM LOUGHRIDGE of Iowa, and STEVENSON ARCHER of Maryland.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] resumes the floor, which he had before the messages from the Senate were taken up.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have been desired to yield by several gentlemen. If there be no objection I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

COMMITTEE ON SOUTHERN RAILROADS

Mr. McCLURG. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Southern Railroads have power to divide itself into sub-committees, and to sit at different points for the purpose of taking testimony, and that they be authorized to appoint a clerk, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized to advance to the chairman of said committee, taking his receipt therefor, a sufficient sum of money to defray the necessary expenses of said investigation.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

Mr. McCLURG. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] will have to yield the floor for that motion.

INVASION OF MEXICO.

Mr. SELYE. I ask leave to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is currently reported in the public press and otherwise that bodies of armed men are being organized in different parts of the country for the purpose of invading the territory of our neighboring republic of Mexico, in direct violation of the neutrality laws; and whereas all such attempts and purposes are also at variance with the wishes and feelings of all good citizens of the United States, and contrary to established public policy: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States, in case he shall be satisfied that such organizations exist, or are being formed, be respectfully requested to issue a proclamation requiring all proper officers of the United States to prevent such unlawful organizations being formed within the United States, warning all persons that whosoever shall depart from the United States, either individually or collectively, for the purpose of invading the republic of Mexico or any other country, or creating any disturbance therein, shall forfeit all rights to protection under the laws of the United States.

Mr. ROSS objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection for the purpose of allowing the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and it was accordingly so referred.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill authorizing the payment of mileage to members of the Fortieth Congress. It is a bill of justice rather than of popularity. I should like to say a word upon it before the vote is taken if the House will allow me.

A MEMBER. Let the bill be read first.

The bill was read. It provides that Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Fortieth Congress who were in attendance at the first session of this Congress, prior to the recess before the 13th day of March, 1867, and who after that date and before the reassembling of Congress on the 3d day of July, 1867, actually went to their respective homes and returned to take their seats in Congress after said recess, shall be allowed and paid the usual mileage for going and returning from their respective residences, provided that they shall have remained in attendance until Congress shall again at this present session adjourn or take a recess, unless prevented from so remaining by sickness of themselves or death or sickness in their families.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object to the introduction of that bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I merely want to say a word or two.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have no objection to any explanation, but I object to the bill.

Mr. BOYER. I object to explanation.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce the bill.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] surrendering the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I surrender the floor unconditionally.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Then I move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a word?

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 45, nays 65, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Butler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cullom, Daves, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Finney, Gravely, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Loan, Logan, Marshall, McClurg, Miller, Moorhead, Myers, Newcomb, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Pile, Poland, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, William Williams, and Windom—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Archer, Baker, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cornburn, Cook, Covode, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hamilton, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Kounts, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lousbridge, Mercier, Moore, Morrill, Niblack, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pruyn, Robertson, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Thomas Williams—65.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Blaine, Burr, Calk, Chandler, Cornell, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Elna, Eldridge, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Korr, Ladin, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Mungen, Peters, Phelps, Polesley, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Raum, Selye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Taber, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—60.

So the two thirds not voting in favor thereof the rules were not suspended.

IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. COVODE. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did upon the 4th day of July, 1867, at the request of the counsel of John H. Surratt, cause to be issued to Stephen F. Cameron, of the rebel army, and one of the most notorious violators of the laws of war, a full pardon for all his crimes, in order that his credibility might be increased as a witness to aid in the exculpation of said Surratt from his participation in the murder of Mr. Lincoln, thus showing his sympathy with the men that murdered the President: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the foregoing charge, and report the evidence to the House in the first week of its next session, together with all the testimony already taken in the impeachment case.

I hope that this resolution will be adopted. If any gentleman desires to ask any question I will try to answer it. If not, I call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the gentleman desires an immediate vote on the resolution I ask him to modify it in one particular. It asserts that the person named in the resolution has been "notoriously" guilty of a violation of the laws of war. I do not know that such is the fact. Perhaps the gentleman has some information on this subject. If so, I trust he will submit it to the House. I cannot vote that a man is "notoriously guilty of a violation of the laws of war" without first having satisfactory evidence of the fact.

Mr. COVODE. I will state—

Mr. BOYER. I rise to a point of order. I submit to the Chair whether this resolution presents a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It does unquestionably, in the opinion of the Chair, present a question of the very highest privilege.

Mr. COVODE. I will state that I have put this resolution in the mildest form in which I was able to frame it. I could have made it much stronger. It will be seen, by examining the testimony of this witness taken in court yesterday, that this pardon was antedated on the 16th of June. I could go further and refer to the pardon of Toombs, after he had written a letter which many gentlemen here have read, showing that he is ready again to inaugurate treason. But I have confined the resolution to one single fact.

In connection with this matter I desire also to settle the question in regard to printing and reporting during the first week of the next session the testimony already taken by the Judiciary Committee on the subject of impeachment. I call the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, that I may make a statement in regard to the last portion of the resolution.

Mr. COVODE. I will do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to state that it was the intention of the Committee on the Judiciary to ask authority to have this testimony printed in time to be presented at the commencement of the next session. Although the question was not finally acted on in committee, yet the expression of the committee was in favor of that course. I presume, therefore, that no member of the committee will have any objection to that part of the resolution which authorizes the printing of the testimony in time to be presented during the first week of the next session. I am not authorized, of course, to express the views or wishes of any other members of the committee than myself; but I understand that to be the case. Therefore I have no objection to giving to the committee such authority as the resolution proposes.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague [Mr. Covode] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COVODE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the powers of the committee are ample, under the resolution under which they are now acting, for the full examination of the case to which the first part of the resolution refers; and I would say that while there has been discovered in the conduct of the President of the United States much which I regard as highly culpable, I do not know that the granting of a pardon (which I suppose may probably amount only to a safe-conduct, or may have been intended as such,) might not possibly be proper, if the defendant now on his trial for a very high crime insisted that the testimony of this witness was essential to his defense. I understand that in like cases pardons have been issued in order to enable witnesses to appear on the part of the prosecution. I merely throw out this suggestion.

Mr. COVODE. I now insist on the previous question.

Mr. GETZ. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. COVODE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GETZ. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman knows that John H. Surratt is, as charged in the resolution, guilty of being an accomplice in the murder of President Lincoln?

Mr. COVODE. I think the testimony will settle that. We are not to settle it.

Mr. GETZ. I was only going to remark that if my colleague knows the fact he would be a very valuable witness for the prosecution, and I am only surprised that he is not subpoenaed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask that the vote be taken separately on the preamble and resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was first upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BURR. The resolution instructs the committee to examine into "the foregoing charge"—language which without the preamble is unintelligible.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. Can the resolution be separated from the preamble when the resolution standing alone does not make complete sense?

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that whenever any member desires it a preamble and resolution must be voted on separately.

The resolution was adopted.

The question then recurred on the preamble.

Mr. COVODE demanded the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. Is it in order to move to refer this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. The preamble is not covered by the previous question ordered on the resolution, but requires a separate demand for the previous question.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDonald, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body adhered to its amendments to House bill No. 108, for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors.

IMPEACHMENT—AGAIN.

Mr. COVODE. I will modify the preamble by inserting the word "alleged," so it will read "alleged participation;" and then demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 40, noes 65.

So the preamble was rejected.

Mr. COVODE. I will strike out the latter clause of the preamble.

Mr. DAWES. What will be the purport of the resolution we have adopted as it now stands?

The SPEAKER. It will not make good sense.

Mr. DAWES. It refers to "the foregoing charge," and that has been rejected.

Mr. MORRELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the preamble was rejected.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 54, noes 39.

So the motion was agreed to.

The question again recurred on the adoption of the preamble.

Mr. COVODE. I move to strike out the latter clause.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move as a substitute the following:

Whereas it is reported that the President has pardoned S. F. Cameron: Therefore, &c.

Mr. ROSS. Is not the previous question pending?

The SPEAKER. It has been exhausted.

Mr. COVODE. I accept the modification, and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and then the preamble, as amended, was adopted.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 16th instant, making certain inquiries touching the Washington Monument Association; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bill No. 180, supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867, when the Speaker signed the same.

CONTROL OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SCHENCK asked leave to introduce, for reference, a bill to restore the Bureau for Indian Affairs to the War Department.

Mr. ROSS objected.

RICHARD CHENERY.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, in the absence of the Representatives from California, to make a motion in reference to a private bill for the relief of Richard Chenery. I can state the circumstances in a few moments. It is an old claim for beef furnished in the State of California. The last Congress passed an act to examine and settle the claim, but failed to make the necessary appropriation of $8,000 in case the Secretary should find the claim to be just. The claim has been found, after examination, to be just, but there is no money to pay it. The Senate passed a resolution on the 21st of last March to supply the appropriation, and that resolution is now before this House. The resolution has been referred to the Committee of the Whole, and I desire to move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be taken up for consideration now. It is Senate joint resolution No. 40, to provide for the payment of Richard Chenery.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

SELECTION OF OFFICERS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. INGERSOLL resumed the floor, and asked leave to introduce a bill to regulate the selection of officers in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It provides that it shall be the duty of the mayor of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, the Board of Aldermen, and the Board of Common Council thereof, to assemble in joint convention, at the City Hall, in said city, on the first Monday in August in each year, and select by ballot all officers whose appointments are now authorized by the charter, or by any law of the United States, or act or ordinance of said city, or which may hereafter be authorized thereby; provided that when so assembled they may abolish any of the offices now established, or change the duties connected therewith, or the compensation thereof, as they may deem proper or necessary for the interests of said city; and provided further that no person shall be regarded as incompetent to hold any of said offices, or be disqualified therefor, on account of his race or color.

It further provides that in all the meetings of the mayor of the city of Washington and of the Boards of Aldermen and Common Council, for the purposes mentioned in the first section of this act, the mayor or the president of either of said boards shall preside, and the secretaries of said boards shall act as tellers and keep a record of the proceedings, and the mayor or any member of either of said boards may nominate one or more persons for the offices required to be filled, and the person having the highest number of votes shall be publicly declared selected, and a certificate of his selection shall within five days be made out, and signed by the presiding officer and secretaries, and be transmitted to the person selected, who shall, within ten days thereafter, enter on the discharge of the duties of his office.

The third section provides that all questions arising in the joint convention authorized by this act shall be determined by a majority of the votes of the members thereof present at any of its meetings, and it shall have power to adjourn from time to time until all the duties imposed upon it shall be completed, and to require of the persons selected for any office such security as may be deemed necessary.

Section four repeals all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith.

Mr. BOYER. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to suspend the rules in order to consider the bill at the present time.

On suspending the rules there were—ayes 54, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. INGERSOLL and BOYER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 14.

So the rules were suspended.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to make a motion to refer this bill to the Judiciary Committee? It is somewhat imperfect in phraseology. They can report it back to-morrow morning.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not know that we have anything of more importance to consider at this time than this bill. If it is imperfect we can take it up and amend it section by section. I will allow any amendment to be offered. I do not think it needs to be sent to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the words, at the end of the first section, "on account of his race or color," and insert in lieu thereof the words "who is a qualified elector in said district."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will accept that amendment, and will modify the bill accordingly.

Mr. WELKER. I move to amend by inserting after the words "may abolish any of the offices now established," the words "not elective by the voters of the city."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I accept that modification. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 127) for the relief of Melinda Harmon, of the county of Greene and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon; and

An act (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain soldiers and sailors therein designated.

RELIEF OF VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in accordance with the rule of the House, lays before the House the following message from the Senate of the United States:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.
July 17, 1867.

Resolved, That the Senate adhere to its amendment to the bill No. 108 of the House for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers therein designated, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the House recede from its disagreement. In making this motion I wish to state that under the rule adopted by the Senate one objection carries a bill over, and it will be impossible to have any bill passed at this session unless the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

The question was taken on Mr. ASHLEY's motion that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, then, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers and sailors therein designated; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed, and ordered to be printed.

KENTUCKY ELECTION.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of privilege. I hold in my hand a memorial from a colored gentleman in the State of Kentucky in the matter of the Kentucky election, which I hope, if for no other reason, will attract the attention of this House. On the 3d of July there was presented to the House a memorial of Willis Hockaday in behalf of Captain McKee, who is a contestant of the seat of John D. Young, of the ninth Kentucky district, who holds the certificate from the Governor of that State. This Willis Hockaday, whose memorial was then presented and published in the Globe, in that affidavit represented that in the month of September or October, 1861, a band of rebels came to Raccoon Furnace, in Greenup county, Kentucky, and captured a number of men and horses and took also other property, and carried him off among others, but that he escaped in four or five days; and that John D. Young, elected on the 4th day of May, 1867, to the Fortieth Congress, was with this band of rebels representing himself as their colonel, and being called by that title by the men.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman that he send the statement to the Clerk's desk and have it read.

Mr. BROOKS. I want first to state what the question of privilege is. It will be recollected that on the 3d of July, when this subject was up, I stated in behalf of the Representative from Kentucky that he did not know who this Hockaday was, and I supposed that he was of the same class of character as Geoghegan, who swore me out of my seat in the last Congress; but it seems that he is a much better man, because after he has made these errors he is perfectly willing to correct them. I hold in my hand a memorial from Willis Hockaday, and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, MONTGOMERY COUNTY, &c.

Personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid, Willis Hockaday, who states that he is a colored citizen of the State of Kentucky, and can neither read nor write; that he is the same individual whose pretended affidavit was taken by Captain Samuel McKee, on June 15, 1867, and the same which was read in Congress on motion to refer the credentials of the Kentucky Congressmen to the Committee on Elections; that said affidavit, a copy of which is herewith filed in print, does not contain a statement of the facts as detailed by him to Captain Samuel McKee when said affidavit was taken: this affiant never did tell Samuel McKee that "John D. Young, of the county of Bath, and the same man who was on 4th May, 1867, elected to the Fortieth Congress from the ninth Kentucky district, was with said band of rebels that captured him, and was in command of the same, representing himself as a colonel, and was by the men under him called by that title;" he never did make any such statements to Samuel McKee; and said affidavit in that respect is untrue, and does not contain what he detailed to said McKee at the time he pretended to take said affidavit, and in this respect this affiant has been made to swear John D. Young, who was elected to the Fortieth Congress on the 4th May, 1867, from the ninth Kentucky district, and never saw him that he recollects, and would not know him if he should now see him; that this affiant did not know or recognize any of the men who captured him, as stated in said affidavit; that this affiant never told Samuel McKee that "on the next day after his capture he saw John D. Young commanding the men who captured him;" that he never told Samuel McKee he was captured by rebels; he does not know now, and did not then, whether his captors were rebels or home guards; that this affiant never told Samuel McKee that "on his way to Camp Dick Robinson, through Owingsville, Bath county, he related the circumstance, and was then told that Young was absent from home and had gone to the rebel camp at Prestonsburg;" this affiant never stopped in Owingsville, never inquired about John D. Young, never heard any one say anything about him, and did not so much as know whether John D. Young was in being; this affiant has no knowledge about John D. Young's being connected with the rebellion in any way, nor does he know whether Young is what is called a "rebel" or not; this affiant says he only told McKee that he was captured in 1861 by a party of men at Raccoon Furnace, in Greenup county, Kentucky; that he did not know whether they were rebels or home guards; that he was captured on Saturday night and taken by the said party and escaped on the second night of his capture and saw no more of them; that he was told by said men that they were commanded by a man named Young, but what Young they did not say, and this affiant does not know whether the said party was commanded by a man named Young or not; that said affidavit was written by Samuel McKee, and was never read to this affiant either by him or the notary who certifies that he was sworn to it and had read it to him.

Attest: R. S. P. ANDERSON, J. M. CRAWFORD, JAS. H. TRUMBLE.

Sworn to before me, by Willis Hockaday, of color, who states in my presence, and the presence of the witnesses whose names appear above, that he has heard the foregoing affidavit read, and has fixed his mark to his name to the same, and that its statements are true.

Witness my hand and seal this 11th July, 1867.

J. D. REID.

Notary Public for Montgomery county, Kentucky.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that that affidavit was forwarded to me by several respectable citizens of Kentucky, and among them by Mr. Thomas Metcalfe, a respectable citizen of Mount Sterling, who says:

"Willis Hockaday lives in this town, and as soon as he heard the affidavit read, as it appeared in the Courier, he immediately disowned it, and said that he never did make any such statements to McKee as are set forth in that affidavit. He says that McKee wrote the affidavit himself, and that neither McKee nor the notary who swore him to it read the affidavit to him. He says further that the affidavit is a gross perversion of the facts detailed to McKee by him when the affidavit was given. Hockaday is an ignorant negro man, can neither read nor write, and says McKee has imposed upon him and grossly misrepresented him. He desired to make a second affidavit, and state what he did say to McKee when he gave that affidavit, and I took him before a notary public, and he yesterday made the affidavit which I inclose to you. The affidavit speaks for itself; comment is unnecessary."

I also hold in my hand a letter from Hon. Richard H. Stanton, of Maysville, Kentucky, a gentleman well known to some here as an old member of this House, who says that in this district the rebel votes cast in the district do not amount to as many as one half of Judge Young's majority. It is, therefore, most shameful to charge that his success was achieved by rebel votes. A large number of Union soldiers voted for Judge Young, and some of his most active friends were men who had signaled their Unionism in every manner it was possible.

Mr. Speaker, I do not expect the House in this case to do immediate justice; perhaps that would be expecting too much; but I do ask in the name of the State of Kentucky, I do ask for the honor of this House, that this memorial be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that some immediate action be taken upon the subject before this Congress adjourns. For, sir, the exclusion of a member bearing a certificate under the seal of the State almost exclusively on the ground of an affidavit from an ignorant negro who was imposed upon, and who now contradicts his previous affidavit by a counter-affidavit, is such a monstrosity that I am quite sure the House would not be guilty of it, if it were aware of the facts. I ask, therefore, the immediate attention of the Committee of Elections to this subject, and I hope that they will promptly report that Mr. Young is entitled to a seat on this floor.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to the fact that when a matter has been referred to a committee with instructions by the House to investigate the truth of the charges and to report to the House, there is an evident impropriety in bringing the matter up again ex parte upon affidavits, without referring those affidavits to the committee for their consideration and examination. But I reflect, sir, that no gentleman on this floor is so able in the matter of affidavits as my distinguished friend from New York; and I do not know that I can blame him for still lingering upon the field in which he has won so many laurels with affidavits which he has carried around in his pocket. Therefore I have no complaint to make on that subject. Every man must be conscious of that in which he has the greatest gift and that in which he can serve his country in the most distinguished manner.

I do not myself intend to express an opinion upon the condition of things in the district alluded to by the gentleman from New York. I supposed that it was my duty, as I supposed it was that of the gentleman from New York, to wait until an investigation has been had of all the facts, upon testimony properly taken, when all parties interested can be present and cross-examine witnesses, and when the committee could consider the weight due to such testimony and bring it before the House with such conclusions as they might think it justified. I do not now intend to express an opinion beyond this: that I can very well understand the condition of things in Kentucky that would bring about the production of the affidavit which my distinguished friend from New York has carried in his pocket and has brought forward, as I think inopportune, as is usual with him. But, sir, if there be any truth in the statement of the original affidavit, that there was in Kentucky in 1861 such a condition of things as would permit an armed band of rebels to come there and carry off a citizen of that State into the rebel confederacy and wage war upon him and other peaceful citizens of that State, I can understand very well how that condition of things may still remain to such an extent that the poor, unfortunate colored man whose name has been brought in here to-day may be under such an apprehension with regard to his present personal safety as to find his only way of deliverance in signing such an affidavit as has just been read to the House. Whether this be the fact or not I do not know. It would perhaps have been as well to refer this affidavit to the committee that they might examine whether there was any ground for it. I have, however, just had put into my hand the affidavit of two gentlemen who witnessed Hockaday's signature to the affidavit which was produced here on the 3d of July. The affidavit of these two gentlemen may throw some little additional light upon the condition of things in Kentucky to-day as well as at the time when the witness signed the affidavit originally read in this House, and also at the time when some person named Young—I do not know who—headed a band of rebels that invaded the State of Kentucky and carried off with impunity this poor colored man into the rebel confederacy.

I ask that this may be read and also referred to the Committee of Elections, which committee I trust will undertake to examine in a proper and legal manner the witnesses they may find who will throw any light on the real condition of things in Kentucky, and report at as early a day as possible.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Montgomery:

This day personally appeared before me J. P. Nelson and E. A. Thomas, well known to me to be credible persons, who state that they witnessed the signature of an affidavit made by Willis Hockaday, and read in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, United States Congress, on the 3d day of July instant, as a paper accompanying the protest filed against John D. Young being permitted to qualify as member for the ninth Kentucky district. They state that at the time said Hockaday directed his name signed to said paper he was asked the question, "Have you heard this paper read over, and are its statements true?" Hockaday answered: "I have heard it read; it is true every word of it, and I will swear to it anywhere." His name was then signed to the paper. Affiants witnessed it and were present before the notary, George E. Miller, who swore Hockaday to the same, and signed his own name to the certificate, asking witness if he had heard the affidavit read, who answered he had.

J. P. NELSON,
E. A. THOMAS.

Sworn to before me, by J. P. Nelson and E. A. Thomas this 12th day of July, 1867.

E. E. GARRETT.

Police Judge, Mount Sterling.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I happened to be the member who presented the protest on the first day of the session bringing up the question of the propriety of admitting Young to be sworn into his seat, or I would not trouble the House for one moment. But as I did present those papers I desire to make some little correction in regard to the statements submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.]

In the first place, sir, as to the papers which were presented, there was a protest presented by Mr. McKee, late a member of this House, and now contesting the right to this seat against Young being permitted to take the oath, reciting some ten or twelve or fourteen, I do not know how many, reasons for the exclusion of Young. There were two other protests numerous signed by citizens of the ninth district of Kentucky precisely similar to that presented by Mr. McKee. The action of the House was not, as the gentleman from New York supposes, based upon the single affidavit of what this negro man swore to, but there were ten, twelve, fourteen, perhaps more, affidavits of various persons covering various charges. Only one or two of the affidavits were read. The reading of the affidavits were suspended, and then all of the papers were referred to the Committee of Elections.

One word more. These affidavits were necessarily ex parte. They were not evidence against Young's right to a seat except as raising the question as to the propriety of his being permitted to take his seat. For that purpose, as a matter of course, they were sufficient simply to raise the preliminary question on which to base investigation into the matter and determine whether he ought to be permitted or not to take his seat. I offered it for no other purpose but simply to stop Young being sworn in. These affidavits were a fair, just, and sufficient showing for the preliminary action of the House. The papers, with the protest, went to the Committee of Elections, and I took care in the original resolution, and also in the substitute for the resolution, to provide that the committee should investigate the whole matter in regard to these charges, particularly including this charge of disloyalty, and for the purpose of making the investigation what it should be they should have the power to take testimony, and for this purpose to send for persons and papers.

Now, sir, the case was made before the committee. After that it seems to me there remained nothing to do except as the testimony might come into the House to send it to that committee, and for the committee at their discretion to send also for persons and papers. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has thought proper to introduce at this late stage a counter affidavit. It can have no effect one way or the other unless it may be supposed in some way or other to clear up the character of Mr. Young as it appears in the newspapers from that first affidavit which was submitted. I make no question in regard to the propriety or impropriety of having it read now. It can take no other course than to be referred to the Committee of Elections; and I may be permitted perhaps to say it cannot have much effect there any further than to help direct the committee to the sources of inquiry which they shall hereafter make.

I presume, therefore, the committee will send for this black man, and as he seems to have sworn one way at one time and another way at another, as he may have been deceived at one time or the other or at both times, the only way of eliciting the truth will be, the inquiry being established, to send for papers and look into the matter carefully. I suppose the only question is, shall these two conflicting depositions, one offered by the gentleman from New York and the other by the chairman of the committee, be sent to the Committee of Elections? I shall vote that they both go to that committee, there to be taken for what they are worth. But I wish to enter my protest against the committee acting definitely upon either of these affidavits, or upon any such testimony as concluding the case in regard to the right of Mr. Young to a seat. I think the witnesses should be before the committee, or else that affidavit should be taken upon proper notice, so that we may be sure, if the witnesses are not within reach, that both parties have had an opportunity of being present when the testimony is taken.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Massachusetts do not seem to comprehend the real point of this case, or rather I may say, perhaps they do not desire exactly to comprehend the great point at issue, which is the right of the State of Kentucky to an immediate representation on the floor of this House upon presenting the certificates of the Governor of the State, under the great seal of the State. The only one among these affidavits that was published, if I recollect right, is the ex parte affidavit of Hockaday. That was carried to the State of Kentucky, and there it turns out that the affiant is a colored man, who swears two ways. There were numerous other ex parte affidavits which were not published—made, it may be, by black men or not—which if published in the State of Kentucky would perhaps bring out counter affidavits like the one I presented.

Now I ask if under ex parte affidavits taken by a contestant, who, if I am correctly informed, is guilty of a most monstrous act—I may be incorrectly informed as to that—but at all events an eager, greedy contestant, who without regard to the law of elections brings those ex parte affidavits before this House, without having given any notice to Mr. Young, as he ought to have done—I ask if, under such affidavits, it is right to exclude a whole delegation from a State from their seats? Here are ex parte affidavits against the great seal of the State. They are taken without any notice whatever to the other party. They are sent to the Committee of Elections, and what is the result? Why, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] knows as well as I do that the effect of this action is, although the loyalty of Mr. Young may be undisputed, and he may be proved to have been the most loyal man in the country, to keep him out of his seat until March, April, or May next, until this Congress has exhausted a large portion of its legislative term. And in excluding him you at the same time exclude all the delegation from the State of Kentucky, except one member.

It is obvious, from the remarks of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, that he intends to make this a long examination. The argument of the gentleman is, if he is a disloyal man and has his seat given him under the certificate of the great seal of the State we are obliged to sit here with such disloyal member, and there is no remedy for that unfortunate position. Why, sir, if the precedents of this House had been followed, Mr. Young would have been admitted to his seat forthwith as a member of the House; and if he had been disloyal, if on taking the oath of office he had been guilty of perjury, it would have been in the power of two thirds of this House—and the dominant party here have a clear majority of two thirds—immediately to expel him from his seat. But the final result of all this action is to exclude the State of Kentucky from representation here until March, April, or May next upon ex parte affidavits of this negro, Hockaday, who has sworn two ways, and the ex parte affidavits of other persons whose testimony is not worth more than that of Hockaday. I followed the precedents of the House in proposing to refer this matter to the Committee of Elections, following out all the proprieties of the occasion in the most temperate manner possible. I violated none of the privileges well known and recognized in the proceedings of the House in asking the reference of this paper to a committee on which the political friends of Mr. Young have two members, while his political opponents have seven. I ask the immediate action of the committee on the case, because Mr. Young can at any time be excluded from the House if the charges made against him are established. All I ask of the committee is an early and immediate report. I have shown that the affidavit upon which this Representative was excluded is worthless. This is the spectacle presented: a member from the State of Kentucky, holding his commission under the great seal of his State, is excluded by negro testimony taken ex parte without his knowledge! To establish such a precedent would be monstrous.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from New York asks the immediate action of the Committee of Elections upon this question. Does the gentleman ask the Committee of Elections to pass upon the great question whether a man claiming a seat in this House is loyal or not, upon the mere affidavits of persons for or against him? I await his answer.

Mr. BROOKS. I answer by saying that ex parte affidavits, taken in violation of law, prove nobody disloyal under the election laws of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; then the gentleman desires the action of the Committee of Elections without evidence.

Mr. BROOKS. Upon the certificate of election.

Mr. DAWES. That I take to be the interpretation of the gentleman's remarks, both to-day and on a former occasion. He places so light an estimate upon the charge that a man claiming a seat in this House has waged war upon his country that he proposes to let the question be decided without evidence and upon such statements as may be made in his behalf in private letters addressed to the gentleman from New York.

I would like to ask the gentleman—and I want a categorical answer—whether, if it should be proved to his satisfaction that the gentleman claiming a seat in this House as a Representative from this district did actually, as is stated in this original affidavit, head a band of rebels who carried Hockaday off into the confederacy, he would vote to admit him to a seat? I ask a categorical answer.

Mr. BROOKS. Is there any proof of that?

Mr. DAWES. It is not for me to say whether there is or is not. I am instructed by the House to inquire whether the charge is true or not; and I again ask the gentleman to tell me whether, if it is proved to his satisfaction that this man did lead the band of rebels that carried off this negro, he will vote to admit him to a seat here?

Mr. BROOKS. I hold that where a man presents a certificate of membership under the great seal of his State, he ought to have the oath administered to him, and then, if he take the oath, he can be expelled for perjury or otherwise.

Mr. DAWES. Then I understand the gentleman that no crime of that character against the nation can be committed by any man claiming a seat here which shall be of so dark a dye that will justify his exclusion from a seat in this House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let in enough of such men, and they would exclude us.

Mr. DAWES. Exactly; let us get enough of them here, and they would soon have enough to exclude all the rest of us, excepting perhaps the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. All the proof, as I understand, against the loyalty of Mr. Young rests upon the statement of one Hockaday, who now withdraws that statement. Hence, so far as I can see, the record of Mr. Young as to loyalty is the same as that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] or myself.

Mr. DAWES. In answer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON,] I will say that he is exceedingly oblivious to what has been stated over and over again on this floor, and to what has been read from the Clerk's desk. There have been a multitude of affidavits presented. I suppose that an answer of the character of that furnished to-day by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has not been furnished in reference to the other affidavits for perhaps one of two reasons, either because the affiants could not be found out or hunted down, or because they had more backbone than the poor colored man whose counter-affidavit has been presented here to-day.

Now, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is over-zealous in behalf of his friends. He goes further than Mr. Young himself. While Mr. Young is anxious, as is every member of the committee, to proceed at once in the investigation of this matter, the question was put to him distinctly whether he desired this investigation to go on without further testimony, and, unlike the gentleman from New York, Mr. Young said that he desired that the committee should have an opportunity to investigate this matter upon evidence properly taken, upon due notice to the parties, and upon cross-examination. Hence the committee supposed it was in accordance with the wish of Mr. Young (whatever may be the wish of the gentleman from New York) that they should take time to proceed to Kentucky and examine this case according to the rules of evidence, so as to bring testimony here for the satisfaction of such members of this House as believe that a man may be such a traitor that he ought to be excluded from this floor. To the gentleman from New York it is quite unnecessary to take testimony. I submit that that gentleman has already committed himself to the doctrine that no matter what crime a man may have committed against his country, he has a right to come here and take a seat in this House—to sit here in mockery of the authority of the Government, pretending to make laws in its support.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in his judgment, a certificate of election from the proper authority does not, prima facie, entitle a member to a seat in this House?

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly, sir; I have said so a hundred times on this floor. Unless something can be brought forward deserving the name of testimony—something that deserves to have weight with honest and honorable men, who regard their country and regard the character of the men who sit here, such certificate of election should be sufficient, prima facie, to entitle a man to admission.

Mr. ROSS. Then I would inquire of the gentleman whether the holder of such certificate has not a right to take and hold his seat until it is shown by legitimate and legal testimony that he is disqualified?

Mr. DAWES. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that when there is presented alongside of the certificate a case which leads members here, clothed by the Constitution with the power and duty of passing upon the qualifications of those who apply for admission—when there is presented alongside of such a certificate such a case as leads us to suppose that there is good reason to believe that the man presenting himself is disqualified, it is the duty of those whom the Constitution requires to pass upon the qualifications of members to stop at this initial point and pass upon that question. In order to do this they must be furnished with testimony; and if they are to be furnished with testimony they cannot rely upon affidavits or counter-affidavits or private letters. They must summon witnesses either at the bar of the House or before a committee, and permit the party affected to cross-examine those witnesses. This testimony should be brought before us, and we should pass upon it under our responsibility as members here.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether he thinks there is before the House any such legal testimony as should rightly deprive Mr. Young of his prima facie right to occupy a seat here?

Mr. DAWES. Why does the gentleman put that question to me, when the House, in my absence, passed upon this subject?

Mr. ROSS. Because I want an answer.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] knows very well that no member of this House claims that a man should be deprived of his seat here upon any testimony that was produced in the Kentucky cases. But the House did decide, and I believe rightly, that there was presented in reference to some of the applicants for seats, including Mr. Young, sufficient ground to justify us in saying that the qualifications of these men to seats on this floor should be examined into and passed upon by the House before they take their seats.

The motion of Mr. Brooks was agreed to; and the paper was accordingly referred to the Committee of Elections.

CONTROL OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference and to be printed. It is a bill to restore the Bureau for Indian Affairs to the War Department.

Mr. ROSS. I will not object if it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. It relates to a military subject, and ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Let it come in, and then the House can refer it to whatever committee it pleases. I move to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 20.

Mr. ROSS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Ross and Mr. SCHENCK were appointed.

Mr. ROSS moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of citizens of the late State of Mississippi, praying that their civil organization be set aside.

By Mr. COBB: The petition of Andrew C. Smith, late sergeant of company G, thirty-second regiment Iowa infantry volunteers, for back pension.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of Daniel Hays and others, soldiers and widows of the war of 1812, for pensions.

By Mr. POLAND: The petition of John F. Conoley, judge of probate, of Dallas county, Alabama, praying to be relieved from disability on account of having been engaged in the rebellion. Accompanying the petition and recommending that the prayer thereof be granted are petitions from leading Union men of Alabama, also from General Swayne and several other officers of the United States Army.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 18, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MAURICE RICE EVANS.

Mr. CONKLING. There is on the table a joint resolution to which attention has once or twice been called before. I rise to ask the Senate to allow it to be taken up, and I think I can make a statement which will deter every Senator from making any objection. It is, as has been stated before, a resolution to give to a meritorious young man the opportunity of entering the Naval Academy, to which he has been nominated; but the time has been allowed to pass when regularly he could be examined. There is no other regular and matter-of-course opportunity to be examined until September, by which time he will have passed the age within which, if at all, he must enter this Academy. Previously, when something was said about this matter, Senators—and among them, I think, the chairman of the Naval Committee—did not appear inclined to give assent to the agreement by the Senate in the House resolution, because they thought a proper application to the Secretary of the Navy in so small a matter as this must lead to his allowing this young man to be examined now by some one of the number of officers who I understand are here and might just as well do it as not. Accordingly an effort to that end was made. I think the Naval Committee of this body unanimously or nearly so (all those who were here, at any rate, concurring in it) united in an urgent request to the Secretary to allow it to be done, feeling the hardship of the case. Without any reason that I can understand or any reason that I can learn from others he simply refused to allow it to be done, putting himself upon the law and saying that Congress has the power to order it to be done, and if the case appeals to anybody it appeals to Congress; in short, he will not do it; and I am informed that he also says that he has issued some regulation which this would not be in accordance with; and therefore, although I believe he considers himself competent to almost any task, it seems that he does not think his jurisdiction is broad and deep enough to vary some marinet regulation which he has, which prescribes that this thing shall be done on one day rather than on another; and accordingly, unless the clemency (perhaps I ought to say) of this body can be successfully appealed to, this young man, who has made all his arrangements and whose family have made all their arrangements for his entering upon this life, the life of a sailor, is to lose the opportunity and go home disappointed, with the loss of money and the loss of expectation. It seems to me too bad; and although I have been one of those insisting, as far as I thought I properly could, against the taking up of matters other than those referred to in our rule, yet we have done it heretofore, and this is so small a thing I hope the resolution may be taken up and acted upon. I think it will consume no time.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be done at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to take up House joint resolution No. 69, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Maurice Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next. Is there any objection to taking up the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. It is true, as stated by the Senator from New York, that when this bill was under consideration a few days ago I interposed some objection, and there are reasons why, as a general proposition, we should not indulge in such legislation as is proposed. But under the circumstances I do not feel like availing myself of the rule of the Senate to object to the consideration of the bill. It is true, as stated by him also, that the Naval Committee of this body, not able to perceive any objection to a special examination of this young man, united in a request to the Secretary of the Navy, urging him to order him to a special examination, well knowing as we did that there are thirty or forty officers of the Navy at this time in the city of Washington, who might as well spend two or three hours in his examination as not; and also knowing that there are naval officers now remaining at the Naval Academy at Annapolis who are qualified to make the examination, and who would be perfectly content to make it if they were so directed by the Secretary of the Navy. It seems that the Secretary of the Navy objects to complying with the request of the member of Congress who bestowed this appointment upon the young gentleman named in the resolution, or complying with the request of the Naval Committee, because he says that the law of Congress passed two or three years ago declares that these candidates shall be examined according to the regulations established by the Secretary of the Navy, and he having established certain regulations, he thinks that it is better for parties to come to Congress to get legislation here than it is for him with a stroke of his pen to change a regulation of his Department which he can renew in two minutes after the change has been made.

If such is to be the spirit and construction of the Department upon a question of this kind, I cannot of course interpose any objection to the consideration of such a resolution as this.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I concurred in the propriety of not taking this resolution up when it was first called to the attention of the Senate for the reasons stated by the honorable member from Iowa. I had no doubt that the Secretary of the Navy had complete power to authorize the examination of this young man, and I could not doubt that that power he would exercise. That he had officers enough within his reach from whom to select a board of examiners I understood was true beyond all doubt. But now he insists upon it that he will do nothing unless Congress interfere. He forces us to violate a rule which we have established in view of the general service of the country rather than do an act which he is authorized to perform, which every intelligent man and every liberal man would say ought to be performed, to give this young man an opportunity of being examined, when he will be lost to the service and when his own ambition will be entirely defeated of being an officer of the service if that examination is not now had. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not hesitate a moment in passing this resolution. It will not only be an act of justice to the young man, but I hope will serve in some measure to rebuke the obstinacy of the Secretary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I joined with the committee in recommending the application for this examination to the Secretary of the Navy. I thought it possible for him to do it under the law. And while I now vote for the resolution, I shall not vote for it with the understanding that the Secretary of the Navy is necessarily censured, as is intimated by the Senator from Maryland. On so trifling a matter as this I do not intend to vote a censure upon any officer of the Government. I do not know what would be the embarrassments of any of the Departments if, upon a mere matter of accommodation to some boy or some family, the regulations of the Department which are found useful for the public service are to be departed from. I shall vote for this because it appeals to my sympathies, and only for that reason.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of citizens of Alabama, expressive of their thanks to the Government of the United States for supplies forwarded to the suffering people of that State; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 143) regulating the selection of officers in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate take up the resolution which I offered the other day in regard to certain affairs in Mexico.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted on July 8, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to inquire into the facts connected with the alleged murder of officers and men in Mexico under a decree of the Emperor Maximilian.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the passage of the resolution. It is only a resolution of inquiry. I presume there is no objection to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe that resolution declares in the preamble that more than ten thousand Mexicans were killed.

Mr. CHANDLER. It simply says that is the allegation.

Mr. SPRAGUE and others. Let the resolution be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that Maximilian, the so-called emperor of Mexico, did on the 3d day of October, 1865, issue the following decree:

MAXIMILIAN, EMPEROR OF MEXICO.

Having heard our council of ministers and our council of state, we decree:

ARTICLE 1. All persons belonging to armed bands or corps not legally authorized, whether they proclaim or not any political principles, and whatever be the number of those who compose the said bands, their organization, character, and denomination, shall be tried militarily by the courts-martial; and if found guilty, even of the only fact of belonging to the band, they shall be condemned to capital punishment within the twenty-four hours following the sentence.

ART. 2. Those who, belonging to the bands mentioned in the previous article will be captured with arms in their hands, shall be tried by the officer of the force which has captured them, and he shall within a delay never extending over twenty-four hours after the said capture make a verbal inquest of the offense, hearing the defense of the prisoner. Of this inquest he will draw an act, closing with the sentence, which must be to capital punishment if the accused is found guilty, even if only of the fact of belonging to the band. The officer shall have the sentence executed within the twenty-four hours aforesaid, seeing that the criminal receive spiritual assistance. The sentence having been executed, the officer shall forward the act of inquest to the minister of war.

ART. 3. From the penalty established in the preceding article shall only be exempted those who, having done nothing more than being with the band, will prove that they were made to join it by force, or did not belong to it, but were found accidentally in it.

ART. 4. If, from the inquest mentioned in article two, facts are elicited which induce the officer holding it to believe that the prisoner was made to join the band by force, without having committed any other crime, or that he was found accidentally in it, without belonging to it, the said officer shall abstain from passing sentence, and he shall send the accused, with the respective act of inquest, to the proper court-martial, in order that the trial be proceeded with by the latter, in conformity with article one.

ART. 5. Shall be tried and sentenced conformably with article one of this law: 1st. All those who will voluntarily assist the "guerrilleros" with money or any other means whatever. 2d. Those who will give them advice, information, or counsel. 3d. Those who voluntarily, and knowing that they are "guerrilleros," will put within their reach, or sell them arms, horses, ammunition, subsistence, or any articles of war whatever.

ART. 6. Shall also be tried conformably with the said article first: 1. Those who will hold with the "guerrilleros" such relations as infer connivance with them. 2. Those who, voluntarily and knowingly, will conceal them in their houses or estates. 3. Those who, by word or writing, will spread false or alarming reports by which public order may be disturbed, or will make against it any kind of demonstration whatever. 4. All owners or administrators of rural estates who will not give prompt notice to the nearest authority of the passage of some band through the same estates. Those included in paragraphs one and two of this article shall be punished by imprisonment from six months to two years, or by hard labor from one to three years, according to the gravity of the case. Those who, being included in paragraph two, were the ascendants, descendants, spouses, or brothers of the party concealed by them, shall not suffer the penalty aforesaid, but they shall remain subject to the vigilance of the authorities during the time the court-martial will fix. Those included in paragraph three of this article shall be punished by a fine of from twenty-five to one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment from one month to one year, according to the gravity of the offense. Those included in paragraph four of this article shall be punished by a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars.

ART. 7. The local authorities of the villages who will not give notice to their immediate superiors of the passage through their villages of armed men will be ministerially punished by the said superiors by a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars, or by seclusion from three months to two years.

ART. 8. Whatever residents of a village who, having information of the proximity or passage of armed men by the village, will not give notice of it to the authorities shall suffer a fine of from five to five hundred dollars.

ART. 9. All residents of a village threatened by some gang, who are between the ages of eighteen and fifty five years, and have no physical disability, are obliged to present themselves for the common defense as soon as called, and for failing to do so they shall be punished by a fine of from five to two hundred dollars, or by imprisonment of fifteen days to four months. If the authorities think it more proper to punish the village for not having defended itself, they may impose upon it a fine of from two hundred to two thousand dollars, and the said fine shall be paid by all those together, who, being in the category prescribed by this article, did not present themselves for the common defense.

ART. 10. All owners or administrators of rural estates, who, being able to defend themselves, will not prevent the entrance on the said estates of guerrilleros or other malefactors; or, after these have entered, will not give immediate information of it to the nearest military authority, or will receive on the estates the tired or wounded horses of the gangs, without notifying the said authority of the fact, shall be punished for it by a fine of from one hundred to two thousand dollars, according to the importance of the case; and if it is of great gravity, they shall be put in prison and sent to the court-martial, to be tried by the latter conformably with the law. The fine shall be paid to the principal administrator of rents to which the estate belongs. The provision of the first part of this article is applicable to the populations.

ART. 11. Whatever authorities, whether political, military, or municipal, shall abstain from proceeding, in conformity with the provisions of this law, against partisans suspected or known to have committed the offenses provided for in said law, will be ministerially punished by a fine of from fifty to one thousand dollars; and if it appear that the fault was of such a nature as to import complicity with the criminal, the said authorities will be submitted by order of the Government to the court-martial, to be tried by the latter and punished according to the gravity of the offense.

ART. 12. Thieves shall be tried and sentenced in conformity with article one of this law, whatever may be the nature and circumstances of the theft.

ART. 13. The sentence of death pronounced for offenses provided for by this law shall be executed within the delays prescribed in it, and it is prohibited that any demands for pardon be gone through. If the sentence is not of death and the criminal is a foreigner, even after its execution the Government may use toward him the faculty it has to expel from the territory of the nation all obnoxious strangers.

ART. 14. Amnesty is granted to all those who may have belonged, and may still belong, to armed bands if they present themselves to the authorities before the 15th of November next, provided they have not committed any other offenses subsequently to the date of the present law. The authorities will receive the arms of those who will present themselves to accept the amnesty.

ART. 15. The Government reserves the faculty to declare when the provisions of this law will cease.

Each one of our ministers is charged with the execution of this law in the part which concerns him, and will give the necessary orders for its strict observance.

A true copy. Washington, October 25, 1865.

IGNO. MARISCAL, Secretary.

And whereas it is alleged that, under that inhuman and barbarous decree, issued in violation of the laws of war, the rights of the Mexican people, and of the civilization of the nineteenth century, Major General José M. Ortega, Brigadier General Nicolas Salazar, Colonels Diaz Paracho, Villa Gomez, Perez Militeua, Villands, and more than two thousand other Mexican patriots, officers and men, were inhumanly murdered in cold blood, after having surrendered as prisoners of war, in violation of every law and usage of civilized warfare.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to inquire as to the truth of the above allegations, and report the facts to this body at the earliest practicable moment.

The resolution was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 60) authorizing extensions of the mail steamship service between the United States and China; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 61) relative to letter-carriers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 62) expressive of the sense of the American people toward the republic of Mexico; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to hear the resolution read at length.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States, for and in behalf of the people of the United States, hereby express to the republican patriots of the republic of Mexico their admiration for the long, persistent, and heroic struggle of their people to maintain the integrity of their country and the republican form of its government and institutions, their congratulation for the signal triumph they have gained over foreign influence and domestic treachery, and their earnest hope that their victory will consolidate and strengthen the republic, establish and confirm republican institutions, law, and order, and a due regard for the rights of person and property, and that a humane and liberal policy toward the vanquished may crown the glory of their endurance, courage, and valor.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 145) in relation to the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio; a joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) in regard to judgments in the Court of Claims in cotton cases; a joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) authorizing the extension of mail steamship service between the United States and China and Japan, and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 79) relative to the purchase of Hall's carbines, in all of which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution instructing the Commissioner of Education to report upon the feasibility and expediency of introducing the phonetic system of spelling into general use.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Maurice Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next.

PEACE WITH INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration—

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senate proceeds with his bill I hope the bill which came from the House will be taken up. There is a bill on the table just received from the House. Let us have it disposed of.

Mr. HENDERSON. This is a matter of much more importance. I desire that the Senate should consider it. We can pass this bill in a few minutes now.

Mr. SUMNER. But there probably will be debate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 136, to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes. I have been very patient about this matter. I desire to get through with the bill, so that it may go to the other House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, (S. No. 136,) the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. HARLAN to the second section.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "that" in the first line of the second section and to insert in lieu of the words stricken out:

Said commissioners are required to examine and select districts of country lying north of the State of Nebraska and west of the Missouri river, of sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains and north of that river and the State of Iowa, not now peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, in which districts there shall be sufficient tillable and grazing land to enable said tribes respectively to support themselves by agriculture and pastoral pursuits. Said districts, when so selected and the selections approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for the said Indians to be located thereon, and no person, not members of said tribes, shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribe interested, except officers and employes of the United States. Provided, that said districts shall be so located as not to interfere with the traveled highways located by authority of the United States and the probable route of the Northern Pacific railroad.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that amendment will be adopted, because the objections that I have heard presented to the bill will be removed by it, and a similar amendment in the third section. I have consulted with the Senator from Iowa, and he has consented to offer an amendment of a similar character to section three; and then, by striking out section four, I believe all the objections that have been urged against the bill will be removed. Perhaps not all the objections, but certainly all except the objections urged by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] the other day. He objected to having any reservation in this northern section of country at all, but wanted the entire body of Indians removed to the southern reservation; that is the reservation contemplated in section three. The objection to that is, in the first place, that this section of country north of Nebraska is already occupied by the Indians, and this provision renders it no more difficult than it now is to get their consent when it becomes necessary to build roads across their lands. Indian reservations cover the entire section of country now. All that these commissioners will have to do will be to see these tribes and get their consent in order to remove the hostile Sioux. It will be observed that the difficulty of removing the Sioux Indians to the southern reservation, as contemplated by the Senator from Wisconsin, is a very great one, when we come to a knowledge of the country. Indeed, it will not do to remove the Sioux Indians, who know nothing in regard to agriculture, to that country, because if we remove them there there is nothing for their support. That is not the buffalo range of the Plains of the West; and we shall force them necessarily to adopt the habits of civilization and resort to agricultural pursuits to support themselves from the time they are removed there. The Senator from Wisconsin says they do not know the use of a hoe; they never had a hoe in their hands in their lives. That is true. They have lived by the chase entirely. It will not do to think of removing the savage Sioux to that section of country. If we do they will be simply prisoners of war, and we shall have to do as we are now doing with the Navajoes, spend perhaps one, two, or three millions annually to feed them. We can put them in this region of country, where I understand there are elk, buffalo, and fish enough to support them, and it will cost the United States nothing.

Now, in regard to the objection urged by the Senator from Minnesota, he will observe by looking to the map of that country and the treaties already made—

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to this amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very glad to hear that there is no objection to it; and without detaining the Senate, as I am exceedingly anxious to have something done in reference to this matter, I will propose an amendment to the first section myself after the amendments of the Senator from Iowa have been adopted. I will here remark that his amendments simply carry out the idea of the committee. There is nothing in these amendments inconsistent with the original purpose of the bill; and they do away with the objections urged by various Senators, and I believe make the bill acceptable to every person who has spoken, with the single exception of the Senator from Wisconsin, who clearly is mistaken in his ideas of removing the hostile Sioux into the Indian territory south of the Arkansas river. It will not do, and a reflection of five minutes by the Senator himself on the subject will satisfy him.

Now, without further discussion, without taking up any more time of the Senate than is absolutely necessary, I hope this amendment may be adopted, and the bill passed by the Senate and sent to the House of Representatives. I will remark that in all that has been said nothing of objection to the main purpose of the bill has been urged. I believe that every Senator has expressed his determination to vote for the bill in some shape, and in fact to vote for it carrying out the leading ideas entertained by the committee in its preparation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the second section, offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN.]

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] to strike out the second section of the bill as modified.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now offer an amendment to the third section, to strike out all after the end of the fourth line and substitute what I send to the desk. I will state that this has been drawn at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs and meets his view fully. The words proposed to be inserted are as follows:

That part of the present Indian Territory ceded to the United States for the use of other Indian tribes, or such part of it as may be necessary and which under existing treaties can be so appropriated, together with such other adjacent territory as may be suitable to constitute a permanent home for such Indians as now inhabit south of the Platte and east of the Rocky mountains and Pecos river, not peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, which territory when so defined and approved by Congress shall not be entered upon or settled in any manner, except by consent of the tribes interested, by any person other than members of said tribes and officers and employes of the United States.

So as to make the section read:

That said commissioners are authorized and required to select, as provided in the preceding section, a district of country south of the State of Kansas and west of the State of Arkansas, including that part of the present Indian territory ceded, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move now to strike out section four, because those two amendments will confine the action of the commissioners to tribes of Indians who are not located already by treaty stipulations upon reservations. The fourth section, it will be perceived, would be in direct conflict with that, and therefore I move to strike it out.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. In the first section, line twelve, after the word "discretion," the last word but one of the line, I move to insert the words "under the direction of the President;" so as to read:

And in their discretion, under the direction of the President, to make and conclude with said bands or tribes such treaty stipulations, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. In line six of section one, after the word "Beauvais," I move to insert "Nathaniel G. Taylor."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move further to strike out the titles of the officers: "Lieutenant General" before "William T. Sherman;" "Major General" before "W. S. Hancock;" "Major General" before "C. C. Augur;" "Major General" before "William S. Harney;" and to strike out "Major General John E. Smith." There will be some difficulty perhaps in securing his services. He is at Fort Phil. Kearney in the midst of these disturbances, and perhaps it would be better not to have him on the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to suggest to the chairman on the committee that in this commission it would be well to include General Alfred Sully, who probably has as large an amount of Indian experience as any officer of the Army, and he is now in that country. General Todd, of Dakota, is also in that country, and would be a very proper man for such a commission.

Mr. HENDERSON. I would inquire whether General Sully is yet connected with the regular Army.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to General Sully; he is a very good man, but Senators object to having so large a number of Army officers. We have a large number already, and the desire is to have a larger proportion of civilians, I believe, than we now have, and perhaps it would be better. I have struck out General Smith's name, not on account of any objection to him, but because I do not believe he will be able to serve, from what I understand.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to offer an amendment as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That the General of the Army is hereby authorized to accept the services of mounted volunteers from the Governors of the States of Kansas and Nebraska, and the Territories of New Mexico, Colorado, Montana, Idaho, and Dakota, in organized companies and battalions, not exceeding four thousand men in number, and for such term of service as in his judgment may be necessary for the suppression of Indian hostilities in those States and Territories.

And be it further enacted, That all volunteers so accepted shall be placed upon the same footing in respect to pay, clothing, subsistence, and equipment as the troops of the regular Army.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out the words "General of the Army" and insert "President of the United States." I do not make this proposition in any advocacy of the present incumbent of the executive chair, but I make it because it is proper and decorous to the head of the executive branch of our Government. Heretofore a proposition to refer a question of this kind to the discretion and judgment of the General of the Army or to any other officer in exclusion of the President would have been thought altogether improper. I think the Senate ought not seek to degrade the office of President of the United States. I have no reference whatever to the present incumbent in this motion, as I have said; but it is fit and proper that when a discretion of the kind proposed is created by an act of Congress and is vested it ought to be vested in the proper officer; and the proper officer is unquestionably the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of our Army. I do hope that Senators will not object to this proposed amendment to the amendment. I move it for the decorum of the proceedings of the Senate, for the decorum that is due from the Senate to the chief executive officer of the Government, without any reference to the present or to any future incumbent.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me that this amendment is quite inconsistent with the objects of the bill—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The question is now on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose there is no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the question be taken.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope this amendment to strike out the words "the General of the Army" and insert "the President of the United States" will not prevail. I think the General of the Army is the very person whose attention ought to be especially called to this matter, and for these reasons: these border difficulties have been pending now for several months. We heard the distant approach of the storm weeks and months ago. We saw the western horizon beginning to lower with an Indian war. We have a President of the United States whose duty it is to see that the laws are executed, and of course the word "laws" includes the treaties of the United States as well with the Indian tribes as with foreign nations; and during all this period of time the executive branch of the Government seems not to have bestowed the slightest attention upon the subject of our Indian difficulties and dangers. Instead of making provision for the protection of the frontier, instead of sending commissioners out there to make inquiries into the causes of complaint which the Indians may have had against the officers of the United States, the attention of the executive branch of the Government has been given to other subjects, and for hundreds of miles along the border there has been for long weeks and months and still is a feverish anxiety, a timidity, a trembling in the presence of some danger which appears to be approaching from that quarter. The executive government has done nothing.

They have sent no messenger there to make inquiry. They seem to have taken no pains to send troops there for the protection of the settlers. But instead of attending to this branch of business, certainly as pressing as anything else on the part of the Executive, the President has been amusing the people and himself on journeys to North Carolina and making speeches there, with a portion of his Cabinet, and making journeys to Boston and various other places, delivering speeches, making what political capital he could, exhibiting the utmost inattention to this most important and exigent state of affairs between ourselves and the Indians upon the western frontier.

I would under ordinary circumstances intrust a matter of this kind to the President of the United States. I would be content to refer the matter even to such a man as James Buchanan, for I should expect that he would have patriotism enough at least to do his duty and endeavor to enforce the laws and treaties of the United States in regard to the Indians. But as to the present incumbent of the presidential chair, his past acts are sufficient to justify us, and to demand at our hands—I will go as far as that—that we shall address this whole subject to the General of the Army, in whose fidelity and patriotism we certainly have the best reason to trust. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kansas will be adopted in the form he has presented it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should not say a word on this subject, but that the whole speech of my honorable friend from Michigan is a sharp, a gross, a very injurious attack upon the Secretary of War—not so intended by him, I believe, but necessarily so in its effect. It cannot be contended that the President in person can attend to all these details of business in the different Departments. The question is whether in those Departments business of whatever character is properly attended to. If it has not been in this particular instance, if it has been neglected, if the peace of the border has been ignored and everything which should have been attended to has been left to suffer, it must be the fault of the Secretary of War, who is the managing officer in regard to all these matters. I cannot consent to sit here quietly and hear remarks made that necessarily reflect upon him. Sir, I believe that all these matters have been as thoroughly investigated and attended to by the distinguished officer at the head of the War Department (in whom I think we all have confidence) as they could have been; that he has been constantly in communication with the commanding general; that the subject has engaged all his thoughts that it could engage; that nothing has been neglected on his part which he believed necessary to be done; and that he has acquired all the information which it was possible for him to acquire and which it was necessary for him to possess. I do not know this any otherwise than the honorable Senator from Michigan himself knows it; any otherwise than the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs knows it. Probably they know it better than I do; but if there has been anything neglected on the part of the distinguished officer at the head of the War Department I should like to know what it is.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think anything has been neglected on his part.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He has been making no journeys; he has not been indulging in any pursuit except that of attending to the public business, and attending to it so closely that I regret to say I believe his health has suffered much under the severe labors he has been called upon to perform during the last year. And it is very hard upon such an officer to have it said that little information has been acquired and that these affairs, so important to the country, have been neglected in that Department.

Now, sir, I conceive that it is his business, as the agent and right-hand man of the President, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to see that these matters are well conducted. It is his business to recommend measures to Congress, through the President, if any are necessary. It is his business to inquire whether more troops are wanted, and what descriptions of troops are required. It is his business to ascertain all these things, and to see that they are communicated to Congress, if there is any necessity of communicating them. This is not the business of the commanding general. He does not manage, and ought not to be required to manage the war affairs any otherwise than as an executive officer. The President is Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States; and he has at the head of the War Department, which manages and controls all these things, or ought to do so, an officer perfectly capable, as distinguished certainly as any man in the country, and entirely devoted to his duties. To him I would commit such a matter as this, and not to the commanding general.

Sir, in my judgment we are going a little too far with regard to the military: the disposition seems to be to put everything into the hands of the military. Now, while I trust General Grant just as far as I would trust any living man, while I have the utmost respect for him, I do not think it proper to commit to him, a mere military officer, the management of affairs which belong to the War Department proper under the direction of Congress. I think we may just as well pause a little in this career and inquire whether we are not setting at defiance the great rules which regulate the conduct of affairs as divided into civil and military, and not run them all together into one channel. In my judgment, it is a dangerous precedent, and not to be followed except in cases of absolute necessity.

Mr. HOWARD. I have but one word to say. It was not my purpose, Mr. President, to pass any reflection upon the Secretary of War. That was the farthest from my view.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I supposed not, and so said.

Mr. HOWARD. I have as high an appreciation of the value of the talents of that gentleman and of his labors during the last five or six years in behalf of the country as any other person. I have no doubt that in respect to the dangers which have been hovering upon the western frontier he has honestly and faithfully done or endeavored to do his whole duty. Of this I entertain no doubt; but, sir, in my seat here, I am under no obligation to hold a subordinate officer of the Government responsible for the evils of which I complain. I have a right to look to the Constitution, which instructs me that it is the duty of the President of the United States to see to it that the laws are faithfully executed, and I propose to hold responsible the highest officer, who alone is ultimately responsible for this, as I would for every other act. He has had ears to hear the rumblings of the storm; he has eyes to see the approaching danger; and if he had faithfully used both these organs I think we should not have found it necessary at this day to spend our time in the consideration of the bill now before us. I think the neglect, or at least the inattention to duty, is chargeable, not to the Secretary of War, but to the highest officer of the Government.

Mr. ROSS. I regret that we are to have a further discussion of this subject. I had hoped the bill, after being properly amended, would pass this morning with as little delay as possible. It is a matter of very grave importance to the whole West, and to my own State especially, and I have refrained until now from occupying a moment of the time of the Senate. I consider this to be a proposition of paramount importance, as without it the bill is comparatively inoperative. What we need on the frontier at this time is immediate, present protection. My reason for offering the amendment is, that as the bill now stands it is entirely inoperative for the purpose of present protection. There is no provision in the bill authorizing the adoption of measures for the suppression of present hostilities. I do not know that any will be necessary, but I do know that it is the opinion of General Grant and of General Sherman that a protracted and general war can more certainly be averted by the employment of a limited number of volunteers and for a brief enlistment than in any other way. It is for the purpose of enabling our commanding generals to carry out this idea by authorizing them, if in their discretion it should be necessary, and not otherwise, to accept the services of volunteers from the States and Territories named. It must necessarily be weeks, perhaps months, before this commission can take any effective action for the suppression of hostilities. They will be compelled to act through an organized and powerful military force, because they can have access to the councils of the Indian in no other way. They must be enabled to show to the Indians that they have the power to execute the purpose of their commission, and that it will be useless for them to stand in the way. But, sir, I desire to avoid further discussion, and I therefore accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the honorable Senator that he allow me to modify my proposed amendment so as to read thus: strike out the words "General of the Army" and say the "Secretary of War, under the authority of the President of the United States."

Mr. ROSS. Very well, I will accept it in that form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, as modified.

Mr. COLE. I am opposed to this amendment, and I believe my opposition is upon the same ground as that about to be expressed by the Senator from Missouri, who was interrupted in his remarks a few moments ago. It seems to me to be inconsistent with the objects of the bill. I regard the bill as it has been modified as a peace measure, and that its object is to secure peace at all hazards with the Indian tribes of the Plains, and of that object I most fully approve. I think peace is so desirable that it ought to be attained at almost any sacrifice, because the war if carried on will be an inglorious one at best, and a very expensive one at a time when we are little prepared to add to the expenses of the Government. I would be glad if the propositions to appoint commissioners to treat with the Indians could stand alone and independent of any other propositions in the bill; but to add this further proposition to raise an army of mounted volunteers from several States to carry on the war with the Indian tribes seems to me to be injudicious. We have a very considerable standing army under pay already, one large enough I believe to meet all the hostile Indians that may be found in the country, and I cannot see that it is necessary to add to this a large volunteer force at this time. I hope this amendment may not prevail.

Mr. ROSS. I regret that the proposition which I have submitted should be opposed by the Senator from California, whose State has suffered so much in consequence of these Indian hostilities; and as the discussion seems to have been reopened I hope I shall be pardoned for trespassing upon the attention of the Senate for a few minutes.

A state of things similar to that now prevailing on the frontiers, though in a modified form, has existed in Kansas for the past ten years. Scarcely a season has passed in which the frontiers have not been more or less disturbed by the incursions of bands of hostile Indians, who have murdered and robbed the pioneers and obstructed the extension of settlements and of civilization across the Plains.

During the late years of the war, and since, those incursions have been much more frequent, as the settlements have encroached more closely upon the ancient domain of the red man, and as desperadoes from the rebel armies have fled to these Plains to escape the punishment due their crimes of outlawry, and there joined the Indians to wreak their vengeance upon the loyal pioneer.

These disturbances have now culminated in hostile attacks along the entire frontier of the West, from the British possessions almost to the Gulf of Mexico. Kansas and Nebraska, especially, as the most forward in projected improvement toward the West, and having the most exposed settlements, have been singled out as peculiar objects of vengeance, and such has been the destruction of life and property in my own State that the State government has been compelled to initiate measures for the protection of its people, to take the risk of incurring the displeasure of the Federal Government or of seeing hundreds of its best citizens butchered, their homes destroyed, and all development to the West stopped. The State, however, first seeks the protection of the Government, or rather permission to protect itself, and in the hope of securing that protection the Governor has addressed to the Senate, through me, the following communication:

TOPEKA, June 29, 1867.

DEAR SIR: Our Indian troubles are growing worse every day.

On Wednesday last a band of Kiowas attacked and captured a train between Harker and Larned, killing and scalping eleven of the teamsters, (mostly Mexicans), burning the wagons, and driving off the stock.

On Thursday they made another attack on the railroad men fifteen miles west of Harker, killing one engineer and mortally wounding an employe. This almost entirely stops the work on the road, as Colonel Shoemaker's dispatch, herewith transmitted, will show.

It may be possible that during the present week we shall not suffer as we have during the past three or four months, since the same tribes which have been perpetrating these outrages are required to meet Colonel Leavenworth, agent for the Comanches and Kiowas, and Major Wynkoop, agent for the Apaches, Arapahoes, and Cheyennes, at or near Salt Plains, in the southern part of this State, there to receive one hundred and sixty thousand pounds of annuity goods, which were shipped from Atchison last week, and will reach their destination and be distributed to the murderers within the next ten days. As soon as they receive these supplies from the Government they will, without the least shadow of doubt, return to their fields of operation, which are already stained from one end to the other with the blood of our own citizens, and which contain in Kansas alone the fresh graves of more than five hundred men, women, and children, victims of these "noble red men."

This state of affairs cannot be tolerated any longer. General Sherman and other United States officers are willing to do all in their power to suppress further depredations, but they have not a sufficient force with which to operate.

The Indians, from Minnesota to Texas, have declared war. They have formed themselves into one powerful confederate band or army, and are moving with concert of action from one end of the line to the other.

Since the 1st day of July, 1866, more than five hundred persons, to whom the Government of the United States guaranteed protection, have been killed, scalped, and their bodies most shamefully mutilated by the same Indians who are now receiving aid and comfort from the Government.

With the aid they are receiving this year they will be able to prosecute the war more vigorously than ever; while if their annuities were stopped, former treaties declared void, and a vigorous effort made, they could soon be reduced to a state of suffering and compelled to sue for peace.

Then if the Government would send them to the Indian territory south of Kansas, give each twenty acres of land, invest one twentieth part of the money that is now being foolishly expended for annuities in school-houses, farming implements, &c., for their use, and compel them to remain at home, we should have no further trouble.

But before this can be done, they will have to be reduced to actual want, and made to feel and fear the power of the Government.

They have a powerful army in the field, well organized, armed, and equipped.

They mean war, and the Government of the United States can meet them in no other way than by organizing an army and moving against them in force.

Congress might, with equal propriety and justice, have forwarded a train of supplies and munitions of war to the rebel army after the battle of Bull Run, and upon that demanded or expected their surrender, as to demand or expect the hostile Indians to stop the war by giving them annuities.

There is no such thing as peace except by war, and the sooner you convince Congress of this the better it will be for the country.

It is to the pecuniary interests of Indian agents, traders, and contractors to prevent a war as long as possible, and, in my opinion, some of them representing wild tribes, rather than lose their position, would misrepresent the true state of affairs at whatever cost or sacrifice of life.

Most of them, if not all, represent their Indians as being at home quiet and peaceable, when in fact they know that every Indian belonging to their respective tribes (I mean those at war) is now and has been for months past murdering and scalping citizens whenever and wherever they could be found, either alone or in parties sufficiently small to be overpowered without the Indians incurring too much danger to themselves. Nine of them came into a small settlement a few days since on the frontier, west of Lake Sibley, murdered and scalped two men and one boy, and wounded another boy, who made his escape. They then took two women prisoners, upon one of whom each of the nine committed a fiendish outrage, and afterward, while she was lying in a helpless condition, plunged a tomahawk into her head and left her dead on the ground, and in this condition she was subsequently found by the citizens. The other woman they took with them as a prisoner, to suffer, if possible, even a worse fate.

I have represented the condition of affairs to the Secretary of War, who from some cause has taken no action.

I have appealed to Sherman, but he cannot engage in a war without troops or authority, so the whole subject rests with Congress, either to declare all former treaties with hostile tribes void by act of war on their part, declare war against them, and furnish Sherman with a volunteer force sufficient to enable him to take the offensive, or send out peace commissioners, who will doubtless guarantee additional protection to the Indians, assure them that their conduct has been entirely satisfactory to the Government, and that their supply of annuity goods shall be largely increased in the future. I judge of the future by the past. If peace commissioners are sent out it is equivalent to saying to the Indians, "Go on with the war and we will pay you a premium for all you do;" or, in other words, "we will pay you a reward for the scalps you take." In the name of God and humanity, I do earnestly protest against such a policy.

I hope that the false impressions which exist in the minds of many persons East in regard to the character and disposition of the Indian will not prevent members of Congress from discharging their whole duty fearlessly.

If those who believe that the Indian embodies in his nature everything that is noble and great could see their friends butchered and mangled as we of the West have seen ours, the probability is they would change their opinions. But whether they do or not is a matter of indifference to me, and I trust it will also be to Congress, which in fact is responsible for these atrocities. I could within a short time complete the organization of a militia force, composed of experienced officers and soldiers, and move against the Indians in Western Kansas. But in doing this I would necessarily be compelled to violate the law (if treaties are valid) which I have no disposition to do if it can possibly be avoided; besides, it is the duty of the Government to protect her citizens. If Congress fails to make provision for protecting our citizens and those quietly traveling through the State then there is but one course for me to pursue.

I cannot and will not allow a band of irresponsible, uncivilized, blood-thirsty fiends to invade the State, murder our citizens, stop the work on our most important railroads, and completely blockade the routes of travel to other States and Territories. This is asking a little too much, even though we have humanitarians in the country who may think it better to suffer a hundred or more of our people to be murdered and scalped than to sacrifice the life of one Indian.

I have submitted until forbearance has ceased to be a virtue.

If Congress will adopt prompt and decisive measures to bring this war to an end, or rather commence the war, I will render the Government all the assistance in my power. I will furnish troops, as many as may be desired. But if Congress fails to take action, I shall be compelled to declare all the Indians in Western Kansas invaders, outlaws, murderers, and highway robbers, and proceed against them with such force as may be necessary to bring them to justice or drive them from the State.

Yours, very truly, S. J. CRAWFORD.

Hon. E. G. Ross, United States Senator,
Washington, District of Columbia.

Further to show the actual existing condition of things, let me submit a communication from a respectable constituent of mine, received only a short time ago:

BACHELDER, RILEY COUNTY, KANSAS,
May 30, 1867.

DEAR SIR: I improve this opportunity to call your attention to a few facts in regard to the wants of the settlers of the Republican Valley.

As one of the first settlers west of Fort Riley, having been here more than eleven years, and being in a business that brings me in contact with all the people of the valley for one hundred miles west of Fort Riley—running the only flouring mill in the valley—I know whereof I affirm, and refer you to the business men of Riley, Davis, and Clay counties as to my responsibility. First, then, as to the Indian troubles on the frontier. The bare fact of so many outrages committed on the settlers ought to be sufficient evidence to the Government that the Indians are hostile; and having induced the settlers to go on the lands, by offering them for sale, it surely ought to protect their lives and property.

Less than one year ago six men from within fifty miles of Fort Riley, on a buffalo hunt, were massacred, their teams killed and taken, and not a man left to tell of the desperate fight they made for twenty miles before they were taken. Later, two more men from higher up the Republican were killed; a woman taken from the house and outraged by a dozen savages in sight of her family; a man robbed and shot, but not killed, and other outrages committed. This spring brings a repetition of these horrors. On White Rock a whole family is annihilated; three men are killed; a boy shot and left for dead, but who revived after the Indians left; and worse than all, a woman carried off captive, tenfold more horrible than instant death. On the same ground, a few days later, a party were attacked and robbed of their teams, and narrowly escaped with their lives. These are but a part of undisputed outrages on the settlers, and for a strip of thirty miles the settlement is abandoned, and homeless families are seeking bread and shelter all up and down the valley. Within a few days I have had a dozen applications for work from men drove out from their homes by Indian hostilities—many of them with no home for their families but the wagon which carried them to a place of safety. You, sir, was a pioneer in Kansas. Your fancy can tell you their misery. The proofs of these outrages point strongly to the Otoes and Pawnees as the guilty parties—robbing and killing to the credit of Cheyenne and Sioux. Cannot something be done to protect these people; something worthy the name of protection, that shall not be a satire and burlesque on the Government?

Hon. E. G. Ross.

A. B. WHITING.

Previous to the war and during the first year of its rise the commerce of the Plains involved a capital of not less than $100,000,000 per annum, employing thousands of men, and was the means of building up prosperous communities at the terminal as at the initial points of the lines of communication. The prosperity of the Territories of New Mexico, Colorado, and Montana, as of California, Oregon, and Washington, was largely promoted and sustained by this commerce.

Since that time, and under the hazards which have attended that trade from the hostilities of the Indians which inhabit the great Plains, that great commerce has languished, until at this time one quarter of the amount of wealth then represented would be a liberal estimate of the amount of capital involved, while life as well as property is utterly unsafe on those Plains outside the lines of an organized army.

For many years previous to the opening for settlement of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska these hostilities were comparatively unknown. It will be remembered that the immense emigration across the Plains to California in 1849 and subsequent years was with comparative safety, so far as the Indians were concerned, and the cause of this change in the attitude of the Indian has become a pertinent inquiry. Many and sage have been the hypotheses upon which it has sought to be accounted for. The reasons assigned have been various, and partaken largely of the prejudices peculiar to the different localities of the country. In the East, far removed from contact with the wild Indian, utterly ignorant of his habits and impregnated with the romantic fantasies of novel writers, these nomads have been invested with an heroic halo, and they represented as fighting for their homes and the graves of their fathers, &c., while the pioneer, who has been serving as the advanced guard of civilization, Christianity, and free government, who cultivates the soil, and fulfils the divine injunction, to earn his bread by the sweat of his face, is set down as the ruthless intruder upon the sacred realms of these creations of the imaginative novel reader.

On the other hand, and among those who have felt the force of his terrible blows, the Indian is regarded in directly the reverse light, as the incarnation of all that is devilish and brutal, as a very wolf, whose utter destruction is a work of humanity to our race and to the world. To his wantonness and innate blood-thirstiness have been attributed all his acts of violence upon the pioneer and his hostility to all trespasses upon his manorial hunting grounds.

Both these hypotheses are, in my judgment, mistaken. The real cause of these troubles lies beyond and deeper than these—the savage nature of the one, and the trespasses of the other having nothing to do, as moving causes with the case. They are merely incidents to the strife, and should not be taken into the account when seeking for the remedy. The strife and turbulence which is now going on in the western section of Kansas and Nebraska is but a continuation of the war which was inaugurated upon the early colonists upon the shores of the Atlantic. The massacre of Wyoming, to which touching allusion was made on this floor a few days since, was but the beginning of a series of butcheries which have been continued upon the frontiers of civilization as they have receded to the West from that day to this, and which every year of the settlement of Kansas has witnessed upon our prairies on a less extensive but none less brutal scale. The massacre of Fort Phil. Kearney of 1865 is but a repetition of many such during and subsequent to the revolutionary war.

Who will claim that the Indian hostilities of those days were induced by frauds upon the Indians; by the perulations or deceit of individuals, or by wrongs of omission or commission on the part of the Government?

The conflict now, as then, is one between civilization and barbarism. From that day to this the forces of each have been constantly marshaled, the one for conquest, the other for resistance. The Indian, stimulated by the instinct of self-preservation, has resisted and struck at the advancing wave of emigration rudely and awkwardly, but with all the barbaric force at his command, while the white man, as instinctively possessed with the desire for conquest and development, pressed forward by the constantly increasing density of population in the older States, impressed with the consciousness of his destiny and the philosophy of the sacred injunction to replenish and subdue the earth, and armed by a superior civilization, has as steadily moved forward in his self-imposed mission, until prosperous and powerful States now embrace the great hunting grounds of the aborigines, and beautiful cities with all their wealth of commerce, their elegant churches, and school-houses crown their ancient burial-places. Who wonders that in his barbaric simplicity the Indian has so persistently, though impotently resisted this, to him, destructive march of the white man? The wagon of the emigrant is to him the precursor of eventual but certain banishment from the home of his people. The sound of the church bell tells him of the presence of a stronger race, armed with his untutored conception with magic power, before which he is as the dry grass of his native plains, swept by a tornado of fire; the scream of the locomotive is the very presence of the engine by which his race is being swept from the face of the earth. No wonder that he holds on with a death-grasp to the grounds where he and his fathers for many generations before him have followed the chase and roamed at will.

On the other hand, who can say nay to that advancing wave of civilization which is year by year subduing the regions of the far West and spreading all over that vast domain the arts and sciences, wresting it from the hands of an unproducing, revolting barbarism, and establishing there the humanizing influences of a better life? How could we, if we would, curb the aggressive spirit of emigration which was landed from the Mayflower, and which in two centuries has well nigh peopled an entire continent, subjecting to the dominion of law, and curbing by the restraints of religion that which before was barbarous, wild, and chaotic?

On the one hand, the country was held by a race rude and unsusceptible of culture, and the purpose of whose existence, whatever that may have been, is substantially fulfilled, and who are now passing away. On the other, the pressing needs of a multiplying people demand room for development. Civilization and Christianity demand that no barrier shall be thrown in the way of the accomplishment of their mission of peace and humanity.

Herein lies the text of the controversy. The Indian is fighting for existence and the white man for the fulfillment of a destiny whose bonds are as potent as the decrees of fate.

The duty of the hour is to temper the conflict consistently with the exalted maxims of humanity by which we profess to be governed, to render not unnecessarily painful the pathway to the grave of an expiring race.

But above all things else that duty is first to those who are bound to us by the ties of consanguinity, of a common language, and a common religion. Our own race has claims upon us which the dictates of humanity and the instincts of self-preservation ever adjure us to regard. The people who have carried the flag of our nationality upon the Plains are our brothers and friends. Many of them have sacrificed all but life in battle for the Republic, and have gone upon these wild wastes to build for themselves new homes, in the effort to recover their former positions of comfort and independence. They carry with them a tried and unflagging loyalty to the country and its institutions. They are ready now, as in the past, to brave all and endure all for its perpetuity and success. We have invited them upon these lands by surveying them and opening them to purchase. We have taken their money for them, and thereby incurred the obligation of protection in the peaceable enjoyment of their purchase. They have in turn organized communities and extended over themselves laws, the paramount purpose of which, next to immediate self-protection, is the maintenance of allegiance to that Government for which they have on so many sanguinary fields demonstrated their fidelity and affection. Who will say that they are not entitled to it, or that they shall not have it?

We are engaged in building two great lines of railroad across these Plains. The Government has embarked many millions in these enterprises. Their speedy construction is demanded not only by commercial considerations of the very highest import, but for very grave political reasons also. Sundered as important sections of the country are by rugged and almost impassable mountains and barren plains, no time nor effort should be spared to secure the more perfect connection and a more thorough community of interest, political and commercial, by the speedy completion of these lines of rail.

Yet, in the face of a conquering army, and despite the fabulous resources of the nation, they are permitted to languish. A handful of nomads has for months held them at bay. The settlements along their routes, which at one time bid fair to keep pace with the track-layer, to become at once their support and protection, have been stopped, and in some instances obliterated. The pioneer, the avant-courier of civilization and self-government, is either turned back upon his westward march, or, as is frequently the case, slain, and his wife and children captured and reserved for a fate worse than death.

An interdiction is laid upon the travel and traffic of the Plains; the great United States mails are stopped; the great interior States and Territories of the Union are more effectively cut off from the capital of the nation than though the ocean rolled between. There are vacant seats in these Halls which could not be filled by reason of an intervening hostile people, who are defying the power of the Government, and in that far have succeeded in obstructing its legislation.

Yet, when we ask for protection and redress, we are met by the criticism that we have brought this calamity upon ourselves, that the West desires war that her farmers may find a market for their surplus grain. When we point to the mangled corpses of our friends, slain in the vain effort to stop the course of empire, we are met with the sneering cry of "Grain! Grain!" When we point to the record of defenseless children murdered and women outraged and tomahawked to gratify the brutal lust and revenge of a savage foe, we are taunted with the response that we have too much "Grain!" as though the venturesome pioneer, who does well for the first few years if he keeps the wolf from the door, were already blessed with full stock-yards and plethoric granaries, and as though the incoming tide of immigration, sure to follow the maintenance of peace, were not and had not always been more than enough to consume the surplus food of the country.

Yet, in one sense the criticism is true. The country has brought this calamity upon itself by the maintenance of a false and pernicious Indian policy. We have committed the almost unpardonable absurdity of dignifying a few roving bands of Ishmaelites as independent sovereignties, when they were properly the wards of the nation, subject in every respect to a stronger power and a higher intelligence, which knew better than they what was for their good, and should have treated them accordingly.

It is true, also, that the West wants war when the peace and safety of life and property on its frontier can only be secured by war, and only then. That time is now. War we already have whether we want or not. Gentlemen may call it war or conflict or collision, or whatever other term may best please their fancy; but to us, whose homes are threatened by the scalping-knife and the torch, and whose friends are daily being butchered while in the pursuit of their legitimate vocations, it is war in all its horrors.

That war will be continued until the savage is made to feel in a most effective and wholesome manner the restraining influence of the power of the Government. His depredations have so long been regarded with apparent indifference that he has come to look upon his pastime as in a measure licensed, and laughs to scorn the weakness of the garrisons and the contemptible numbers of the squads of soldiers with which the Government essays to stop his plunderings and protect his victims.

He must be made to know and to feel that the Government has the power to protect its citizens, and will use that power. He must be convinced that we intend to construct the two great highways of the Plains, and that interruptions on his part will not be tolerated; that they will carry civilization in their path, and that unless he will accommodate himself to the new and higher life which it gives he at least will not be permitted to obstruct its march, but must go beyond the radius of its influence, where he can have lands and game and protection in all just rights and indulgence in all privileges consistent with the good of our own race.

Let him go without these lines. Give him land and stock, instead of money and goods. Encourage him in pastoral pursuits, and learn him to assimilate himself in some degree, at least, with the customs of civilization, and in time to abandon his nomadic habits and become self-sustaining.

By the adoption of some plan like this, and only this, in my judgment, will permanent peace with him ever be secured. It is idle to talk about extermination; the humanity of the age forbids us to entertain such a proposition. We need no more war than enough to demonstrate to the Indian the power of the Government to protect its citizens and compel obedience to its mandates. Place him beyond the lines of civilization, and without the course of immigration, and the subsequent encouragement which I suggest will secure his comparative good behavior for all time to come.

Mr. GRIMES. If I understand the proposition now under consideration, it proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to raise four thousand men, and confines the levy to certain States and Territories. I move to amend the amendment so as to authorize the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, to call these troops from any portion of the United States. I know no reason why, if the Secretary of War is satisfied that he can raise the troops upon more reasonable terms and get equally good troops in the State of Indiana or the State of New York, he should not be permitted to do so. I therefore move that amendment.

Mr. TIPTON. On that amendment I will simply say that the advantage of having troops already acclimated is very great, as every gentleman understands thoroughly. If you confine it to the western States and Territories, the men there are acclimated and you gain that point at once. In the next place they will volunteer on account of the interest they have in their own homes and their own region of the country. I apprehend that there will be no great desire on the part of volunteers from the State of New York or from New England to go to the West to run the miserable chance of being scalped by savages. I see no harm in confining the selection to our region of country; and if this service should be any advantage at all in a pecuniary point of view to the soldier who may volunteer I would say let those who are already in peril by their present locality have an opportunity of filling these companies and these regiments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa proposes to amend the amendment, so as to make it read:

That the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, is hereby authorized to accept the services of mounted volunteers from the Governors of the several States and Territories, &c.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I suggest an amendment: to add the words "without distinction of color." [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now in order.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. Ross,] as amended.

Mr. HENDERSON. I doubt very much the propriety of adopting this amendment of my friend from Kansas. As I stated before, it is totally inconsistent with the view that we entertain in the bill. If the Senate intends to pass the bill at all, I cannot for my life see the absolute necessity of this amendment. I certainly would not be willing to go further in this direction than to provide that if these commissioners shall fail to make peace with the Indians, General Sherman, under the direction of the President, may be authorized to call out troops. I think there might be some reason in that. But to pass a bill authorizing a commission to make peace with the Indians, and then in the same bill to add a provision for the raising of four additional regiments in order to prosecute a war, looks to me to be a little contradictory. I cannot for my life see that the amendment is at all consistent with the measure itself.

My friend from Iowa has proposed to amend the amendment so as to have the troops raised in every section of the country. What difference would that make? I can state to my friend from Iowa that my opinion is that Colonel Chivington will be the first man who will be ready with his regiment under this provision. Colonel Chivington has already cost us money enough, I may safely say not less than $50,000,000. He was a candidate for Congress, perhaps, at the time he committed the massacre, and rendered himself exceedingly popular, in all probability, with a certain class of people; and but for the anger aroused throughout the country everywhere perhaps he would have been elected on account of this very great deed, on account of the glory that he won at the Sand Creek massacre! I think the probability is that if you adopt this amendment in any shape whatever Colonel Chivington will be ready with his regiment, and instead of making peace with the Indians the result will be that we shall have further troubles. I know that we can make no peace with such men at the head of our military commands. Two thirds of the present difficulty grows out of the fact that lieutenants in the service have issued orders that the Indians do not understand. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs have protested against these orders; but their protest does no good. I do not know really who is commanding in the Indian nation, whether the agents or the military. We must, at the next session of Congress, when we have a little more time, attempt to get some order out of this confusion; and I desire hereafter when an Indian war occurs in this country to know who it is that starts it; I desire to know from whence it originates, and who is responsible. The truth is, I do not want any war, except a defensive war, with the Indians, unless it be by order of the Secretary of War, or by order of the President of the United States, or by act of Congress. If we must have wars, why not submit the matter to Congress, and let us determine whether we want an expenditure of millions of money in order to carry on an inglorious, unprofitable, and injurious war, injurious to our trade, injurious to our business, and injurious to our character.

I do not wish to reflect upon Colonel Chivington; but I have made some examination into the matter, and it is my honest belief that our present difficulties are due in a great degree to his act at the Sand Creek massacre, a thing uncalled for, a thing unmerited on the part of the Indians; and in fact it was a deed committed upon them at a time when they were under the pledge of the protection of the United States, for they had been brought there by the order, not only of military commanders, but of civilians, for the purpose of making peace—an unparalleled butchery which necessarily drove them into war; and I should have had no respect for them if they had not gone to war after that, and nobody else would have had. In fact it is one of the redeeming qualities of the Indian that he does go to war after acts of that character. Now, that the Indians commit depredations on the whites out there, that they have committed a great many, I do not deny; but that they do it as tribes until they are driven into it I am not disposed readily to believe.

I doubt the policy of adopting this amendment, and I submit to my friend from Kansas whether it is really necessary. If it were absolutely necessary for the protection of Kansas, or Nebraska, or Colorado, or any part of that section of country, I should be perfectly willing to vote for it; but is it necessary? As I understand, the President can enlarge the regular Army to any extent he desires; can he not? He can fill up the regiments to a much larger number than they now have.

Mr. GRIMES. He cannot increase the number of regiments.

Mr. HENDERSON. He cannot increase the number of regiments, but he can increase the number of men in the regiments.

Mr. GRIMES. A few.

Mr. HENDERSON. He can increase them so as to enlarge the Army from fifty thousand to about seventy-five thousand men. Am I not correct?

Mr. EDMUNDS. You are.

Mr. HENDERSON. He has that authority already; and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has stated on the floor of the Senate during this session that the Secretary of War needs no further power in order to carry on a war against the Indians; whatever is necessary he has now. If it becomes material for him to increase the Army he thinks he has sufficient authority and thinks he has the power to pay them. In view of this, I cannot doubt that this amendment is unnecessary. I should certainly be unwilling to vote for it unless it were predicated upon the hypothesis that this commission shall make an earnest effort to make peace and then fail. Only upon that condition would I consent that the President should have authority to call out volunteers. Indeed I do not think it would be necessary then. The Secretary of War says he needs nothing of this sort. If, however, the calling out of troops should become essential, I for one am willing to pledge the Senator from Kansas that if in an emergency troops are called out by the Governor of his State no man will more willingly vote in favor of paying them than I shall. Let them be called out and paid and subsisted by the respective States; let them be accepted by General Sherman, and let them be put in command of Federal officers. The State of Kansas is rich enough to pay them for the time being. In the State of Missouri we paid some seven or eight million dollars during the war to defend ourselves and drive the rebels back from that State. We raised the troops by State authority, put them under the command of the Federal officers at St. Louis, and the State raised the money to pay them. My friend from Kansas lives in a rich, prosperous, thriving State, and certainly that State, through her Governor, will be able to raise as many troops as will be absolutely necessary to protect the border of the State. So in other States in the West. There is no difficulty in Colorado requiring troops to be raised. The difficulty is far this side of Colorado; in fact there is no difficulty beyond Fort Wallace. But if anything should be needed there the Governor of the Territory can call out troops. They have already done so in Montana. Whether they have waged any war against Indians there I do not know.

I do not deem this amendment at all necessary. I think the better plan would be to pass this bill as it is; let this amendment go by the board; and if it becomes absolutely essential to raise troops the people in the western country are patriotic enough to raise as many as may be needed to protect themselves, and if they are not patriotic enough to do it they surely will be driven to do it by self-interest and for their own security. If troops must be raised there, let them be put under the orders of our military commanders, and then let the Governor of the State send in the account and we will audit it and pay it. That strikes me to be the proper course. It seems to me quite inconsistent indeed to have four or five sections of a bill looking to peace with the Indians, providing for the appointment of commissioners, and making appropriations for that purpose, and then at the close of the bill to provide for raising an immense volunteer force to engage in warlike operations against them.

Mr. ROSS. The Senator from Missouri presupposes that these troops are going to be called out by the President at all events. That, to say the least, is a violent presumption. It does not necessarily follow that because we authorize him in case of necessity to do it he is going to do it anyhow.

There is another feature of the case which renders it somewhat important that the amendment should be adopted. General Sherman has already called on the Governor of the State of Kansas for eight companies of troops, and four of them are now in the field, having been mustered in at Fort Harker the day before yesterday. General Sherman distinctly says to the Governor, "I want your troops, but I have not a dollar to pay them. You must look to Congress for their pay." And unless the bill contains a provision of this kind, there is no authority on the part of anybody to pay them. These men are poor; they cannot afford to turn out and fight, not only for their homesteads but for the protection of Government property, and give their time for nothing. They want some assurance that they will get some recompense for their time while protecting the Government property, the lines of the Pacific railroad, and the lands which the Government proposes to sell to the people for money.

Sir, I see no better way of strengthening this bill than by this very proposition. So far as the inconsistency of putting a war proposition on a peace bill is concerned I do not see that. Any man acquainted with the Indian character knows very well that the most effectual way to reach the Indian is by a manifestation of your power. You cannot reach him in any other way. Commissions may visit him year after year for the next century, and they can do nothing with him unless there is some manifestation of power which shows him that there is a disposition and a force to compel a strict observation of treaty stipulations on his part.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should regret exceedingly if it should be the sense of the Senate to adopt this amendment and put it on this bill; first for the reason stated by my honorable friend from Missouri, that it is utterly inconsistent with the object of the bill, and would defeat all that the friends of the bill I think could reasonably expect from it; and in the next place, I should regret it particularly for the consequences that I am sure could not fail to come from such a proceeding.

I said on a former occasion all that I feel justified in saying upon the general subject to show that there was no necessity for strengthening the military arm of the Government against the Indians, and I have no occasion to do more than repeat now what General Sherman emphatically says in one of his communications of a recent date, that there is no decent pretext for a war with these Indians. In the face of such a declaration as that from the general commanding in the field, on the spot, conversant with all the movements on both sides, that this nation has no decent pretext whatever for war, you are asked to raise four regiments of volunteers on the border for the purpose of prosecuting war.

Mr. THAYER. Allow me to ask the Senator from Maine when was that report of General Sherman made from which that remark was taken?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The report was submitted to us at the last session.

Mr. THAYER. I think it was in September, 1866. General Sherman on that very point recently complained to me of detached portions of his dispatches being published, extracts, sentences cut out from the context, and spread abroad over the country. He complained that that proceeding misrepresented him and did great injustice. He spoke on that very point, and said he did not intend to convey any such impression as that at this time or since the massacre of Fort Phil. Kearney.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The date does not become material to the point to which I am addressing myself. It is the last utterance to the country on the subject, and that is sufficient. The last word he has spoken to the country is that war will disgrace the nation. There it stands on record.

Mr. ROSS. Allow me to say to the honorable Senator that the object of this proposition is not to raise troops for the purpose of making war.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It will come to that.

Mr. ROSS. If I wanted to make war on the Indians, I should ask for a great many more regiments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand it. Mr. ROSS. It is simply for the protection of the two lines of railroad and the frontier. Four regiments would be a very small number with which to make war.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have a word to say about that. I am now addressing myself to the question of the necessity of troops, of strengthening the arm of the Government. If I understand anything from the commanding general in the field you cannot do it consistently with your honor. That is what he says; you cannot contemplate war, and if you cannot contemplate war, on what ground can you raise troops? Sir, there is no necessity for it. That is my first answer, and this is the evidence, and I submit whether it is not conclusive.

The next answer is one of a financial character. What is to be the expense of four regiments of volunteers on the border put on a footing with the regular Army? Heaven only knows. We do know this: that out of the war of 1864 and 1865, as it is called, which turns out to have been a bloody and atrocious massacre on our part, we have $40,000,000 as the result. What is to be the result of a war now on an extended scale if you enter upon it? Who can tell the millions, the scores and hundreds of millions that will necessarily come of it? If there were no humanity or sense of justice in the country that of itself ought to be sufficient with the declaration of the commanding general that he does not want it, and that you cannot enter upon it with honor, and with the utter silence of the War Department, who have been interrogated on this subject to know whether they wanted force, from which I have a right to infer that they do not want it. My honorable friend who has charge of Indian affairs, and is the organ of that committee in the Senate, had a resolution addressed to the Secretary of War when we first met at this session, asking him to communicate the facts in regard to the Indian difficulties on the border, and whether he wanted any aid from Congress. He is silent on that subject. He has not answered the resolution at all. There is not a word from the commanding general, who is here, and of course is cognizant of what is going forward.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason why I submit to my honorable friend from Kansas. He ought not to urge the nation to consider this question at the present time. I can understand the solicitude which he feels; I can understand the interests which urge him to make this proposition. Nay, sir, he has disclosed the fact now that without authority of law the Governor of his State has already put into the field—I do not know what force, but a military force to take protection into their own hands.

Mr. POMEROY. Under the authority of General Sherman; he has accepted them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the military power of this Government is to be strengthened I submit that the only safe method to strengthen it is through the regular Army. I object to the employment of volunteers from the border. I understand perfectly their expertness; I can understand perfectly well that they may be more familiar with the haunts of the Indians than persons taken remote from there; but there is a disqualifying fact that accompanies the condition of the men of the border, which I hope will admonish the Senate that they ought not to put the defense even of the border, and particularly the prosecution of war, if you are to have war, into the hands of the men of the border. I will illustrate this by a reference to a fact which has become historical. In 1864 we had these border collisions with Indians, it was said. There was the regular Army on the border which was there to keep order, and they had a force at Fort Lyon, on the Platte river, I think. Colonel Chivington, however, was at the head of a regiment recruited on the border, border volunteers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. For my own information I wish to ask the Senator one question, whether those troops of Chivington were organized under a proclamation that was issued by the Governor of Colorado directing the enlisted men to make their own pay off the Indians?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My understanding is that they were enlisted under a proclamation of the Governor; but as to the latter fact in regard to which the Senator inquires I do not know. There was the presence of the Army of the United States, which was doing its duty keeping order on the borders, and here was a regiment of volunteers organized under circumstances similar to what are supposed by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kansas. What was the result? The commander at Fort Lyon had induced a portion of the Indians to separate from the hostile portion and to come into the neighborhood of the fort over which he had command, receive the protection of the Government, and to make treaty stipulations for peace. They came there, men, women, and children, to the number of some six hundred or seven hundred, encamped within the military protection, and having the word and faith of the Government for their security. Colonel Chivington at the head of his regiment arrived at the fort, and was advertised of this fact that these people were assembled, men, women, and children, in that region of country, and had the protection of the Government. What did he do? In the night he marched upon their encampment, reaching there at early dawn; the Indians were surprised; he drew his regiment up in line for the assault. The Indians raised the flag of the United States and a white flag under it. The chiefs put themselves in front to show themselves to Colonel Chivington's command. The women and children were brought under the American flag with a white flag run up; and there, in the presence of the flag, these men were inspired with the spirit of demons by a speech from Colonel Chivington, in which he charged them to remember the outrages which the Indians had perpetrated upon the border settlements, and to "go in," and they went in like savages, like devils, slaughtering men, women, and children indiscriminately. But more, the record shows that having murdered in cold blood under these circumstances some hundred men, women, and children, more or less, in every instance they scalped not only men, but women and children, and committed upon them such outrages and mutilation of body that the details are too sickening and disgusting to be detailed in open Senate.

Mr. President, I do not want to have that scene repeated. When the honorable Senator tells me that the Army of the United States is not capable of defending the border, and that they wish to take their defense into their own hands, and to enlist men inspired by such passions and entertaining such sentiments, I hesitate; nay, sir, I deprecate it altogether. With the history and the record of these outrages fresh in our memories, I admonish the Senate that if they would not have the barbarities and the atrocities of 1864 repeated, to confine the defense of the border to the Army of the United States, and not give up the protection of the border or the prosecution of war upon any plea whatever to volunteer troops residing there. I have the record here as to the transaction to which I have alluded. I hardly know that it is worth while now to read it. There are portions of it that I would not feel authorized to read; but I will read one answer of a very intelligent witness to a question that was put to him in regard to it:

"I can state, according to the received version, that the command marched at eight o'clock in the evening from Fort Lyon. They attacked the village, which was thirty miles distant, and fired into it about daylight. The Indians for a while made some resistance. Some of the chiefs did not lift an arm, but stood there and were shot down. One of them, Black Kettle, raised the American flag and raised a white flag. He was supposed to be killed, but was not. They retreated right up the creek. They were followed up and pursued and killed and butchered. None denied that they were butchered in a brutal manner and scalped and mutilated as bad as an Indian ever did to a white man. That is admitted by the parties who did it. They were cut to pieces in almost every manner and form."

And then follow details too sickening to be read in open Senate. I protest, sir, if the border is to be defended, let it be defended by the regular Army, and do not call in this sort of troops.

Mr. POMEROY. Before the vote is taken on this amendment I would be glad to suggest an amendment to it. I have supposed that this bill was looking toward peace, and did not contemplate the employment of force. I have been an advocate of this bill, thinking it would stop the war; and I did not suppose it was intended to prosecute war by any provision in this bill. I propose to amend the amendment of my colleague by inserting the following words, to precede its first section: "If said commissioners fail to secure the consent of the Indians to remove upon the reservations, then," and then will follow the words of my colleague's amendment authorizing troops to be raised. If the commission shall fail and the Government must prosecute war, it may then be well enough and expedient to raise volunteers; but I am exceedingly anxious that this effort to secure peace should not fail. It is of the utmost importance to us in the western country that peace be at once secured. I think it can be secured by removing the hostile Indians, with their consent. I regard this as only a temporary measure. This bill is designed to allay this war temporarily, to get through with it for the present. I do not know that any one can tell what may happen years to come; but for the present, for this year, I think hostilities can be brought to a close by a commission of intelligent gentlemen going out there and having the Indians consent to a removal; and even if the Government supported them in their new homes, temporarily, for a time, it would be better and cheaper in every way than to fight them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is true.

Mr. POMEROY. But before I sit down I must say that I do not think the difficulties we are liable to get into will arise altogether from the border. I want the Senator from Maine to remember that there are two borders to this country. There is an eastern border as well as a western border; and we are as liable to get into difficulty by advice and influence from the eastern border as from the western.

I have had my attention called to the solution of this problem of dealing with the Indians by men on the eastern border. The last time I was in Bangor I went up to Old Town to see how a little tribe of Indians flourished under the administration of my friends of the eastern border, and I confess that what I saw there convinced me that the doctrine of absorption had been pretty well applied there—not the kind of absorption that the Senator from Ohio advocated yesterday, incorporating them into the body-politic, making them citizens and voters, putting them into your schools, educating them with your children, letting them come into your courts, and regarding them as men. That is the absorption which the Senator from Ohio advocated; but the other absorption that has been practiced on the eastern border has been absorbing all the Indian blood out of them. There is not a pure-blooded Indian among them. They are cooped up on little reservations about seven by nine, with almost no intercourse with the white people. They are not improving under that culture. There is a little colony of them in Massachusetts, and a little remnant of Narragansetts in Rhode Island, and they, too, are being absorbed by the Indian blood wasting away. In fact, there is no real Indian blood among them; but it is French and Irish, and everything else. So with the Senecas and the Onondagas in New York. They have got little reservations; the lines of the reservations are well defined, and the white people do not trespass upon them. The lines of their reservations are as well defined as the lines of a white man's farm; but what progress do the Indians on those reservations make? None at all. They are no further advanced to-day than they were twenty years ago, in my opinion. You are absorbing them, and the absorption consists in changing them from Indians to a sort of mongrel human beings, so that if they were mere animals I should say they were neither fish, flesh, nor fowl.

In this country the way to absorb a race is to take them in and reckon them among mankind. The Senator from Maine yesterday eloquently and beautifully showed to the Senate and to the country how, in the last six years, we had taken a race, brought them up to manhood and citizenship, and solved the great problem of a war of races by giving them the ballot, in that way making them learn to love each other and respect each other. We did not take the negro and put him away on a reservation, and coop him up, and draw a line around him, and stop intercourse with him. That would not elevate him in a thousand generations. We elevate him by making a man of him. When men are counted as men then you can assimilate them and make American citizens of them; and that is the great reason why we have elevated a race. It is not by excluding them from society; it is not by driving them away when the march of civilization overtakes them. The true way is to take them in, to treat them as belonging to the great human family. By that course we should have long since demonstrated that they are of one blood, of which all the nations of the earth are made. The policy of isolating a race on this American continent, where everybody should be an American and an American citizen and a voter, is the ruinous policy in this whole Indian arrangement. Facts will repeat themselves, history will repeat itself. You may put them on little reservations in the West, and you will only reenact what you have done in Maine, Rhode Island, New York, and every eastern State; you will keep a little race together until they die out or become bleached out. That is not the solution of this question. That is not the way to solve the problem.

I repeat, without trying to defend my friend from Ohio, that the policy of civilizing and evangelizing the Indians by making them citizens, by associating them with white men, by educating their children with our children, is the solution of this question. If you lose half of the first generation by it you will save the second, and if the second is saved you save the race.

But, sir, I will not prolong my remarks on this amendment. I repeat if this commission fails, if the object of this bill fails altogether, then I am for the proposition of my colleague; but I propose to amend his amendment by prefacing to it these words: "if said commissioners fail to secure the consent of the Indians to remove to the reservations, then."

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest to the Senator that he add the words "or fail from any cause to secure peace."

Mr. POMEROY. I accept those words as a modification of my proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ross] as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment just adopted, as to the failure of the commissioners to induce these Indians to move to the reservations, or to secure peace, seems to be in the alternative. Now, I wish to know whether it is intended to have these regiments raised in case the commissioners fail to induce the Indians to go to the reservations without their also failing to make any other terms with the Indians that shall be satisfactory. I do not think we ought to raise these regiments unless the commissioners fail in both instead of one of the two. It may be that the Indians can be composed without their being removed to these reservations. They may be very unwilling to go; if I were an Indian I think I should be. At the same time they may be willing to make peace upon some other just terms. Now the question is, whether this amendment is not in such form that if the Secretary of War should choose he could raise these regiments the moment he found out that the Indians were indisposed to go to the reservations without waiting to try any other measures of composition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that would be the effect of the amendment from the language.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The language is such that if the commissioners fail either to get the Indians to go, or to make peace in some other way, the failure of either one of the propositions or causes for raising troops authorizes them to be raised. I think they ought to fail on both points before we go to this extent.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the amendment is drawn in such language that it is susceptible fairly only of the adverse construction.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That if said commissioners fail to secure the consent of the Indians to remove to the reservations, or fail from any cause to secure peace, &c.

Mr. POMEROY. Strike out "or" and insert "and;" so as to read "and fail to secure peace."

Mr. HOWE. Now, either that does not meet the point made by the Senator from Vermont, or it does not meet the point that I mean to make myself. In order to prevent the raising of these troops, as the amendment now stands, these commissioners have got both to make peace with them and to induce them to go down to these reservations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, they have got to fail to do both before the troops can be raised.

Mr. JOHNSON. If they fail in both, then, and not before, troops can be raised.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; if that is the construction I have nothing to say.

Mr. JOHNSON. It will not be a direction to the Secretary of War or to the President to raise troops. He may, upon the happening of the contingency stated in the amendment, receive the regiments or not, as he thinks proper. He certainly would not do it if the commissioners can secure peace upon any terms.

Mr. ROSS. I feel that the adoption of this amendment to my amendment has weakened the force of my proposition very materially; but as it is apparent to me that it cannot pass as originally introduced by myself, or in any better form than that in which it now stands, I suppose I must content myself with it as it is.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "that" in the third line of the first section to the word "power" in the eighth line, and to insert in lieu of the words stricken out:

And the President be and he is authorized to appoint a commission to consist of three officers of the Army not below the rank of brigadier general, who, together with N. G. Taylor, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, John B. Henderson, and William Windom, chairmen of the Committees on Indian Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall have, &c.

My reason for this is twofold. A year or two since General Sherman (the first name standing on the list as reported by the committee) was requested to serve on a similar commission, and he then declined doing so on the ground that it was incompatible with his other duties. I have no doubt that it would be a very irksome duty also for him to perform, and would in all probability come in direct conflict with the performance of his duties as second officer in command of the Army of the United States. There are other names here of persons who I do not think are well acquainted with our Indian affairs. They are able generals, men of great intelligence, and men who doubtless would discharge this duty to the best of their ability; and yet men who have occupied a less prominent position in the public eye, in all human probability, would make better commissioners than some of these high officers of the Army to negotiate with Indians. I therefore would prefer myself, and I think it would conduce to the public interest, to leave the appointment of the officers of the Army who shall be on this commission to the President of the United States, who will doubtless consult with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior in making the selections.

Then the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the chairmen of the Indian Committees of the two Houses I think ought to be coupled with the commission. Senators will remember that a year or so since two or three members of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, under a joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives, did visit the Indian country, and doubtless then prevented a long and bloody and expensive Indian war. They became personally acquainted with some of the chiefs and head men of the hostile bands, and induced them to believe that it was for their interest to preserve peace with the United States; and I have no doubt that the distinguished gentlemen who are now at the head of these committees, together with the distinguished officer at the head of the Indian Bureau, would be very important auxiliaries in these negotiations, and be much more likely to succeed on terms that would meet with the approval of the Senate and House of Representatives than some of the Army officers who are named, and some Indian traders whose names I see at the end of the list. I am not personally particular who go, but this amendment is in accordance with my judgment of what is wisdom in the premises.

Mr. TIPTON. I think if we are not to take the list of commissioners as already indicated in the bill, it would be better to leave it blank entirely, and let the whole commission be appointed by the President of the United States. The men of the border States then would have an opportunity of making at least recommendations; and I do think that a man so eminently qualified as Beauvais is supposed to be, speaking the Sioux language fluently and well, not being included in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, should have a chance, and I want the bill left in such a shape that we can use influence in behalf of such a man, if we can get his recommendations considered by the President. I would rather have it blank, therefore, than filled in the way indicated either by the chairman of the committee or the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted. My impression is that the commissioners named in the bill are the very best men who can possibly be selected. I feel, of course, very grateful to the Senator from Iowa for what he has said in behalf of myself; but there is scarcely a man whom I have named in the bill upon this commission who is not better qualified than I possibly can be to discharge this duty. Again, it is a duty that ought to be performed immediately. Of course I will not say that I cannot attend to it if it be imposed upon me; but it would be exceedingly difficult for me to undertake a trip of this sort at present; and with so small a commission as the Senator from Iowa proposes, it would be absolutely necessary for me to go with them and be with them, if I were one of them. I think the military men who have been engaged in this war ought to be upon the commission. The President, if the matter be left to him, may select other officers, and I am not sure that any of the men whom I have named will be left in the commission.

I will state further that one of the very best commissioners we can possibly select—a man who ought not to be left off the commission—is John B. Sanborn. According to my friend's proposition he will not be included. He knows more about this matter than any man I have yet been able to talk with. He is better acquainted with this whole question than any gentleman I have met with, not excepting the officers who are immediately charged with the duty of conducting Indian affairs.

It is true that Mr. Bent, whose name is in the bill, is an old Indian trader; and he speaks the Cheyenne and the Arapaho language as well as any Indian chief among them, is perfectly familiar with it, and I understand the Indians have great confidence in him. So it is with Kit Carson, who also speaks the language. I inserted Mr. Beauvais's name because I knew he was perfectly familiar with the Sioux language, all the dialects spoken among the Sioux or Dakota nation. The commission that my friend from Iowa suggested will be utterly unable to converse with any of the Indians, though of course interpreters might be sent with them. But will it not be better to have men who are familiar with them, who speak well their language, on the commission—men who can therefore speak with authority?

It seems to me that the objection which my friend urged yesterday, that the President ought to be authorized to appoint all the officers; has been done away with by an amendment made this morning in the twelfth line, which perhaps he did not notice at the time, inserting the words "under the direction of the President," which removes any constitutional objection, if any there were. I do not think there were, but if any existed they are certainly removed by the insertion of those words. I think that perhaps the very best commission that can be selected is already selected by the bill. If you adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, the President may select any military officers he pleases, and I think it exceedingly doubtful whether I could undertake the duty which it is proposed to devolve on me.

Mr. RAMSEY. I agree with the Senator from Missouri, that one of the most useful men on such a commission would be John B. Sanborn. He has had much experience in Indian affairs. He is a man of excellent judgment, and an active man. He would be in every way useful on such a commission; no man in the country, more so; and I should consider it a very great loss to the object which the committee and Congress have in view in creating this commission if his name were omitted; and I respectfully suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he add his name to the other names mentioned in the amendment. Indeed, I shall move that myself as an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa. I propose to insert the name of Mr. Sanborn.

Mr. TIPTON. In regard to the nomination of Mr. Sanborn, I will say that all we ask is an impartial commission, and I understand he is already committed against us. He has expressed an opinion on the subject.

Mr. RAMSEY. The business of the commission is simply to manage to quiet the Indians, and select a proper reservation on which to locate them.

Mr. NYE. A remark was made a moment ago by the Senator from Nebraska, the meaning of which I should like to know. He says that he understands Mr. Sanborn is "committed against us." What does that mean?

Mr. TIPTON. I take it for granted that no man should be placed upon this commission who has prejudged this case. When I hear among Senators and others that a particular gentleman has been expressing opinions on this subject, and coming to the conclusion that there is no special trouble, no necessity for prosecuting this matter, I take it for granted that he has so far prejudged the case that he is not prepared to consider the question in all its length and breadth. When you send men to negotiate with the Indians we want to have men who have not been discussing this question as publicly as some of these gentlemen have. That is what I mean.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose the question has been duly considered by my colleague, who has proposed this amendment; but it is well enough for the Senate to consider it, whether or not we have the power to create this office of commissioner and then to appoint members of Congress to fill the office. We have a clause in the Constitution which expressly declares that no member of Congress shall hold any office created during the term for which he was elected. I suppose this is an office created by this bill, as much so as if we used the term "office" instead of the term "commission."

Mr. HARLAN. I will say in reply to my colleague's suggestion that I think the amendment as proposed does not involve the difficulty which he suggests. It authorizes the President to appoint a commission to consist of three officers of the Army not below the rank of brigadier general, who (together with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the chairman of our committee) shall proceed to negotiate with the Indians. The commission will consist of the three men appointed by the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. There is nothing in this bill requiring this board of commissioners to report to any particular branch of the Government. In order to impose that requirement I offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners report their doings under this act to the President of the United States, including all such treaties and all correspondence, as well as evidence by them taken.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to have a separate vote taken on the amendments which were agreed to in the second and third sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin will be excepted from the general vote of concurrence. The question now is on concurring in the residue of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first reserved amendments will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the second section, which was to strike out all after its enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That said commissioners are required to examine and select districts of country lying north of the State of Nebraska and west of the Missouri river, of sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains and north of the Platte river and the State of Iowa, not now peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, in which districts there shall be tillable and grazing land to enable the said tribes respectively to support themselves by agricultural and pastoral pursuits. Said districts, when so selected, and the selections approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for the said Indians to be located thereon; and no person not members of said tribes shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribe interested, except officers and employees of the United States; Provided, That said districts shall be so located as not to interfere with the traveled highways located by the authority of the United States, and the probable route of the Northern Pacific railroad.

Mr. HOWE. I was not in the Senate when the vote was taken upon adopting that amendment. I did not suppose the bill would come up until one o'clock, and I was occupied outside. I would not raise the question again if I were not firmly convinced that it is just as idle to send this commission out there under the instructions contained in those two amendments as it would be to send them to Japan with a view of negotiating a peace with these same tribes. The amendment instructs these commissioners to make peace with these Indians only in one way, and that is by negotiating with the northern hostile bands to agree to be shut up within the territory described there, between the forty-fifth and the forty-third degrees of latitude, and between the Missouri river and the Powder river.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me, the amendment, if it should be adopted in the Senate as it was in Committee of the Whole, prescribes different limits. The district of country may be selected at any place west of the Missouri river, north of Nebraska and east of the Rocky mountains.

Mr. HOWE. But it must not interfere with located highways, one of which I understand to be by the Powder river. Therefore I suppose it must be east of that.

Mr. HARLAN. It may be west of it.

Mr. HOWE. If it had been suggested that any point could be selected west of the Powder river I should have thought of that expedient, but hitherto the whole discussion has turned upon giving them a location upon the White Earth, the Little Missouri, and the Big Cheyenne rivers. Now, there is not only one road built running right along to the south of that country, and another located running to the north of it, but it is traversed by four public highways, located by the Congress of the United States, and to which they appropriated $150,000 two years ago: one running up the Niobrara river, one running up the valley of the Cheyenne itself, another running up from the mouth of the Big Sioux river to the mouth of the Cheyenne river, and another running from the western boundary of Minnesota across to the mouth of the Cheyenne river—four highways laid out by act of Congress in 1864, and $150,000 appropriated to the opening of them. These commissioners must say to these Indians, if they propose for them to go up there, "You must keep off from these highways." Well, these highways occupy all these valleys. Where can you offer them a home in this district of country? Besides, the Northern Pacific road is authorized to go down to the forty-fifth parallel, and you have already granted to that company alternate sections to the distance of twenty miles to the south of that line.

Then, in reference to the southern bands of Indians, the Cheyenne Indians, I am very much afraid, though I do not speak with so much certainty, that the district of country within which the amendment to the third section instructs these commissioners to secure a possession for them is so limited that it will be absolutely impossible. They are to keep out of the Indian country; they are to keep out of every country already appropriated by existing treaties to any other bands of Indians. Where is there a tract of country, then, for them? It authorizes them to fix them upon any portion of the Indian country to which we have already acquired jurisdiction, and I do not know that we have acquired jurisdiction to any portion of that Indian country. The Senator from Iowa does know if that is the fact.

Mr. HARLAN. Yes, sir; under a treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws the Government acquires the right to settle other Indians in what is called the leased district, containing several million acres of excellent land. They also acquire the entire control for that purpose of the original reservation of the Seminoles, and a large part of the Creek reservation, and more than two thirds of the Cherokee lands, particularly including that part extending westward into the plains.

Mr. HOWE. I was not aware of that. If that is done there is ample territory to settle all these ten or thirteen thousand Indians, with whom alone this bill as it now stands authorizes these commissioners to negotiate.

Now, Mr. President, as a compromise, if the Senate will not agree to these two amendments, I have drawn one that I think ought not to be objected to, and I will read it for the purpose of information. This is a substitute for both the second and third sections:

That said commissioners are required to examine and select a district of country having sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains not now peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, to which the Government has the right of occupation, or to which said commissioners can obtain the right of occupation, and in which district there shall be sufficient tillable and grazing land to enable the said tribes respectively—

Going on, then, in the language of the amendment drawn by the Senator from Iowa. The only difference between this amendment and the amendments agreed to is that it refers the subject to the commissioners, without restrictions, to get territory where they can get it and get it rightly, territory sufficient for these hostile tribes, subject to no supervision but that of Congress, to be exercised after the negotiation is concluded.

I wish, Mr. President, that this substitute could be adopted. I do not see the slightest propriety in expending $150,000 to send this commission out there to make a treaty which I do not believe can be made, and if it could be made I do not believe that the Indians could exist under it twelve months. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] said a short time ago that this was a temporary expedient, that it might last a year. It would be worth something if it lasted a year; but, sir, is it worth while for us to make a negotiation only for a year when you can make one for years just as well? Mr. President, these people are on our hands, and must be provided for at some time and in some way; and why not address yourselves to the work of making permanent provision for them? Here is a formidable and influential commission provided for. I agree with what the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] said yesterday that extermination is not the work blocked out for us. We are not commissioned to any such enterprise. They are, what is left of them, to be preserved and protected. Somewhere, then, they must have a foothold within this domain of ours. Instruct this commission, the largest you ever organized, to find that location where they may have a home, to get possession of it, to purchase it if necessary, to set it apart if we already own it, and to induce the Indians to take up their residence upon it.

Mr. President, while I am up I want to make one comment upon the remarks made yesterday by my friend, the Senator from Maine. I listened to his speech with a great deal of interest, as the Senate did, and it was so good, taken altogether, that I would not indulge in a single criticism but for one fact, of which I think the Senator was not conscious at the time he was speaking. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] had argued, as I thought with force and completeness, that the true solution of this Indian problem was in what he called the policy of absorption. The Senator from Maine, replying to that with immense force, insisted that that meant extermination. I should not interfere with the prosecution of the Senator from Maine against the Senator from Ohio but for the simple fact that I happened to have indorsed, as the published debate will show, the bill which he drew, and if the Senator from Maine maintains his suit against the drawer I may find myself liable as indorser. [Laughter.] I therefore beg leave to say that if the Senator insists that absorption and extermination mean the same thing he uses a dictionary different from what I use and from what I suppose the Senator from Ohio used. According to my understanding it means no such thing. It means the salvation, the preservation of the Indians, the absorption of them into the human family as soon as they can be prepared for that sort of absorption. If I understand the policy of the Indian Committee, they are already looking toward that very thing. There is, as I happen to know, one treaty before them which recognizes that idea, and which proposes—I suppose I may speak of it—to incorporate, to absorb a portion, one half of one tribe into the political system of the United States; in point of fact, to make citizens of them, to settle up with them as Indians, and to receive them into the great body of American citizens; and that thing has been done before. It has been done once in the history of this country with a whole tribe. I agree thoroughly and fully with what the Senator says: that these Indians may be civilized. I know they have been. There is one tribe of them constituting to-day a portion of the population of Wisconsin.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What tribe is that?

Mr. HOWE. The Brotherton Indians. Twice during the existence of our State government persons who were members of the Brotherton tribe have represented their district in the Legislature of the State. I myself have held court and had an Indian for the sheriff of the county, and a good sheriff he was, too; so that I believe they are capable of civilization. I believe they are capable of becoming good citizens. I know they are. It may take more culture than is required for some other portions of the human family, and it may take a different culture; but they are capable of that sort of culture; and what I meant by absorption was the giving them that sort of culture, and then receiving them into our political system. I never did look upon the policy of extermination with any degree of complacency. I do not believe there is any considerable portion of the American people that does contemplate any such fate or any such destiny as that for the Indian race; and I thought it no more than right that I should say so much in explanation of what I meant by the policy of absorption when I indorsed it.

Now, Mr. President, I conclude by expressing the hope that the Senate will non-concur in this amendment; indeed, I hope the Senator from Iowa and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will consent to take the proposition which I have read as a fair compromise between these two opinions.

Mr. HOWARD. I will not consume the time of the Senate in discussing this bill; I said yesterday as much perhaps as it is important for me to say on the subject; but I cannot suffer the bill to pass without again expressing my dissent from the proposition embraced in the second section. The amendment offered by my friend from Wisconsin is a great improvement upon it, and if it shall come to a vote I shall support that amendment. But, sir, I am opposed to the principle of attempting to gather these wild Indians of the Plains together and settle them upon what are called permanent homes; and especially am I opposed to the project of huddling together some fifty or sixty thousand wild Indians upon the northern border of Nebraska, occupying, as they probably will if this bill shall take effect, at least one half of the present Territory of Dakota, and embracing the most valuable portion of that Territory.

I think, sir, that instead of having a tendency to secure peace between our people and the Indians, this mere proposal, the simple passage of this bill, will have the effect to alienate the Indians still more from us. It will be saying to them in very plain terms: "Our purpose is to permit you no longer to pursue the buffalo, the deer, and other game upon the wild prairies of the West, nor to suffer you to fish in the streams of those immense regions; but it is to collect you together, a dozen, fifteen, or perhaps twenty different bands of wild Indians, and confine you to a particular territory, and to compel you, from the very necessity of the case, to resort to the arts of agriculture for your subsistence. We intend, in other words, to compel you to become agriculturists. We intend to compel you to submit to the arts of civilization. We have seen, and still see, that if you are suffered to rove your ancient nomadic lives over this continent you will soon become extinct. We therefore, in order to save you from extinction, will compel you to resort to agriculture to raise your bread and thus feed and subsist yourselves. We will compel you to become educated. We will compel you to become voters. We intend to coerce you to give up your old habits, your old customs, to abandon all your old traditions, your old ideas, as old as the continent. We intend to compel you to abandon all this, and to become citizens of the United States, educated men, and Christians."

Now, sir, is this practicable? Is it in its nature possible? Will not the mere announcement that such is our policy make them still more unfriendly, more irreconcilable to us? I fear it will; and I think the passage of this bill will be but the signal for them to resort to still severer measures against our settlers upon the frontier. I think, in short, that instead of this being an olive branch of peace sent to these Indians, it will be but the signal for a still more flagrant and destructive warfare against us on their part. It will not be peace, but it will be a sword.

Mr. GRIMES. What do you propose? What is your plan?

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Iowa asks me what my plan is. My plan is a very simple one: let us send among them commissioners, ascertain what grounds of complaint they really have against us or our authority, look into the evils of which they complain, and if it be possible for us to remedy those evils, and especially if those evils have grown out of our own legislation or the acts of our own functionaries, let us hasten to do the Indian justice, frankly and fairly, and immediately remove the grounds of complaint, whatever they are. We do not know at present what they are. We have not been informed, and I do not know that there is any gentleman in this Chamber who is able to give us full and ample and sufficient information as to what the real grounds of the complaint of the Indians are. But it will cost us nothing to send a commission among them to confer with them, to ascertain what the evils are, and it would cost us very little to apply the proper remedy by way of legislation. I shall therefore vote to non-concur in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole in regard to the second section, and if the proposition is made to substitute for it the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, I shall vote for that as being the less of two evils.

Before I sit down, let me say one word in reply to some of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] made yesterday. He seems to entertain the idea, whence derived I know not, that the whole course of policy of the United States toward the Indian tribes has been one of oppression, wrong, and injustice. Indeed, he characterizes it by a far severer term, and he says that it has been a mere robbery of the Indian; that we have driven the Indian from one point to another, first toward the West, now from the West, and that we are finally cooping up his tribes in the center of the continent, and that our purpose is his ultimate extinction and extermination. Sir, it is not necessary for me to vindicate the character and policy of the Government of the United States against so serious an imputation as this; and I will content myself by simply saying that, according to my reading of the history of our relations with the Indians, there are very few cases in which the United States have been in the wrong.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator misapprehended me if he supposed I said it was the purpose of the Government to adopt a policy for the extinction of the Indian. What I said was, that its policy in the past and the present tended to his extinction.

Mr. HOWARD. I accept the correction, with this observation: that it is to be presumed the Congress of the United States and the Government of the United States legislate and act with their eyes open, and that they must be cognizant of the tendency of their own measures; they must know what their measures tend to establish or to produce.

Now, sir, I deny that the Indian has been driven from his hunting grounds, if by the word "driven," so often used by the honorable Senator from Maine, he means any act of injustice. The American people have, from time to time, from the earliest period of their colonial history down to the present moment, acquired the Indian territory by honest purchase. They have paid the Indian his own price for his land, and have obtained his title of occupancy by the payment of money or by the delivery of such articles of property as the Indian preferred. The necessities of the Indian have constrained him to make these sales. Why? Because from the very habits which he has adopted, from his mode of life, his tastes, and, in short, his savage condition, he has been obliged to part with his possessions in order to obtain subsistence and to preserve body and soul together. He has been obliged to sell his land to the white man.

Was it a crime in the white man that he had been raised in a different state; that his habits were different; that he supported himself and his family by means of agriculture and the mechanical arts? Was it a crime that he was thus raised? No, sir, it was no crime, unless you condemn the civilization of which we boast. The necessities of the Indian have constrained him to sell. It is this same necessity that now constrains him to sell. He must sell his lands in order to obtain subsistence, and if he sells, he must sell necessarily to the white man, who acquires his lands for the purpose of agriculture and other purposes of civilized life. This has been the course of events. This will continue to be the course of events so long as there is an Indian tribe upon the face of the continent, and there is no way to prevent it, unless we can address to the Indian some inducements that will lead him voluntarily to abandon his savage habits and resort to those of civilization. Can you invent any such persuasion? I say, as I said yesterday, the ingenuity, the humanity, the philosophy, the religion of this country for the last two hundred years has failed to bring about a result which I admit is most desirable, if it were attainable; but, sir, it is not attainable.

I think, therefore, that the Indian must submit to his destiny, and that our duty in regard to him is to preserve his life and his existence by observing justice toward him, treating him kindly, treating him fairly, and by no means looking to schemes of extermination or cruelty. He must go the way of all the earth. He is the weaker party, and his habits of life, his social system, his governmental system will render him and keep him forever the weaker party, and he must abide his fate, although it may produce a thousand such eloquent speeches as we listened to yesterday from the Senator from Maine. The truth stands out broadly and prominently, that the object of the honorable Senator, judging from the past history of the two races, is absolutely a chimera. I wish it were otherwise, but I must recognize existing facts.

In making these remarks I certainly do not intend to deny that the efforts of philanthropists have done much occasionally to mitigate and to improve the condition of the Indian. In my own State these experiments have been attended with rather unusual success, and we have at the present time, I am very happy to say, some four or five thousand Indians within the limits of my State who have abandoned their tribal connections and their barbarous habits and resorted to the arts of civilization, and are actually at this time voters and citizens of that State. It is one of the happiest results that I am able to put my finger upon anywhere in the United States. But that is not the general fact in regard to the Indian tribes. The general truth is the reverse of that.

I hope that the second section will be stricken out, and that we shall confine ourselves to sending a peaceful mission among the Indians to ascertain the ground of their complaints, and then it will be time enough for us to apply the proper remedy.

Mr. HARIAN. It is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of the Indian policy of the Government, but to say a few words in relation to the point suggested by the Senators from Michigan and Wisconsin. The Senator who has just resumed his seat says he is in favor of sending out a commission to ascertain what the grievances may be of which the Indians complain. Sir, we know what the grievances are; and if the Senator is not very well posted upon this subject, he can obtain valuable information by going to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, where the records of the Government in regard to it are kept.

A short time ago, less than two years I think, we made a treaty with the Arapahoes and Cheyennes. In negotiating that treaty no less than three of the men now named by the Committee on Indian Affairs served as commissioners, and the Government in that treaty allowed the southern Cheyennes and Arapahoes to occupy the territory over which the southern branch of the Pacific railroad has since been located by a subsequent act of Congress. At that time the territory was open. The southern branch of the railroad, usually called the Kansas branch, was located up the Republican river and was to intersect the main branch on the one hundredth parallel, leaving this country all open. It has been the buffalo region or the hunting ground for these Arapahoes and Cheyennes time out of mind. They would not agree to give it up, and for the purpose of making peace with them the commissioners agreed in the treaty that they might pursue the buffalo across the Arkansas up into these Plains during the summer months of the year. They have done so, and they have met there thousands of men laboring on a railroad right across the territory we gave them. That is the reason of the difficulty with the southern Arapahoes and Cheyennes.

The origin of the difficulty with the northern Cheyennes and Sioux has been stated over and over again by other Senators. In violation of what they understood to be their rights under previous treaties made with them, the Government attempted to locate a military road across their country, and to erect posts and fortifications. They objected to this for more reasons than one, because it drove away the game, and because it brought in a population which they did not deem calculated to promote their interests and welfare. I do not now desire to enter into that subject, but everybody who is familiar with it knows that a soldiery located in the immediate vicinity of an Indian tribe tend to demoralize them, for reasons perhaps we could not without blushing describe. The Indians know this as well as we do, and they did not desire to have forts erected within the heart of their hunting grounds, where they lived and brought up their families. This was the original reason of the difficulty with the southern Cheyennes and Arapahoes and the Sioux that are now at war. There is not a large number of these people.

This brings me to the objection suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin. He says that there is not a district of country north of Nebraska large enough on which to locate these Indians properly without interfering with wagon-roads and railroads. Why, sir, according to the best accounts that we can get, there are less than ten thousand of them, and it is an immense country, an empire, territorially speaking, west of the Missouri river, east of the Rocky mountains, and north of Nebraska; and if this bill be permitted to remain as it now is this commission may roam over the whole country and locate them on the north side or the south side or the east or west side of any one of these roads. I do not doubt but that there is country there large enough to support these Indians by their usual pursuits. But then it may happen that they cannot live as well afterward as before, if they are not permitted to roam down south on to the Platte and the Arkansas rivers; but they will see to this. When this commission meets there they will talk over the amount of supplies that will be cut off by their giving up their district of country. They know the number of buffalo and elk they take in this region from year to year, and they know what will be necessary to supply the amount of which they are thus robbed; and they will be careful to stipulate for indemnity. Doubtless they will require that a few thousand head of cattle and a few hundred or thousand barrels of flour shall be given them from year to year in lieu of the supplies that they will be deprived of by such a contingency.

The Senator from Michigan seems to be laboring under the delusion that these Indians can remain there in a condition of peace if they would agree to preserve the peace. Why, sir, it is an impossibility now. There are three great lines of travel across this region of country, the railroad leading from Omaha westward, and that from the mouth of the Kansas river up the Smoky Hill fork of the Republican river, and the great wagon-road to Santa Fé. It would be, in my opinion, a literal impossibility to preserve the Indians who roam over the country traversed by these great lines of travel. The policy of the committee seems to be, and I approve it most heartily, to remove those Indians peaceably if possible, but if that is not possible, then by force, north and south of this strip of country. We shall have to come to it sooner or later. They believe, and so do I, that it can be done peacefully; that we can enter into negotiations and agree with them what they will receive as indemnity for the loss they will sustain by giving up this country; and hence I hope that the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole may be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Just five words more. The issue between the Senator from Iowa and myself is this: he insists that this commission can find a location for these Indians within the limits described in his amendment. My opinion is right the reverse of that; but I do not ask the Senate to take my opinion. I only ask that the Senate shall not act upon his opinion, but refer the whole matter without any restrictions to the commission. If they find such a location that they can negotiate with the Indians better for, then they can negotiate and there they will put them. I would just as lief that they should all be put on that section of country as any other if they can be put there. But if you send the commission out under the restrictions contained in the Senator's amendment, and they find that they cannot negotiate for a location there, then the commission has utterly failed, is powerless; the negotiation is at an end; for they must do that specific thing or nothing. If you send them out under the instructions as I have drawn them, then if you cannot suit them there they can look elsewhere. That is the issue between the Senator and myself.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator, if I understand his proposition, proposes to have but one district of country provided for these Indians, which shall be either south or north, and that they shall all be persuaded to go to the one country or to the other, or compelled as a last resort. That is objectionable practically on this account: those that have heretofore lived north cannot be induced without great difficulty to go south some seven or eight hundred miles, I believe nearly a thousand miles, from their old homes where their ancestors have lived for hundreds of years. The Committee on Indian Affairs propose to leave them on a part of the very country on which they and their ancestors have been living time out of mind, contemplating a great difficulty in securing their removal south. If you attempt it by force you will have to catch them first, which will be as difficult as to catch the wolves. They propose to send the southern Cheyennes and southern Arapahoes south, where they live a large part of the year. In this way they will avoid a conflict with the civilized Indians now residing in the Indian Territory, because under the old treaties with these Indians they have agreed to aid the United States in controlling the wild tribes; they have agreed to do so in the more recent treaties, and if we compel these Indians to live on their borders, it violates no agreement that we have heretofore made with them. But the very moment we attempt to send down wild and savage tribes of Indians from the north, the sixty thousand Indians now living in the Indian Territory will be disquieted, and probably make us more trouble and difficulty and occasion a greater expenditure of the public treasure than will be occasioned by the war now existing.

We must look at these things practically. Theoretically, it might be very well to send them all down south on to that beautiful land, for it is an excellent country; but we know practically, I suppose, everybody who has looked into the subject closely knows, that the northern Indians probably cannot be induced to go down there. They have lived on the buffalo, the elk, the antelope, the deer, the vegetable products of that country, and the fish of the streams for century after century, and they are as much attached to their homes as we are to ours. Now, the committee propose merely to confine them to a limited district of country, and then of course to pay them what may be necessary to enable them to live, if they are unable to live afterward by their usual pursuits.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, mark how plain a tale shall put that down. The Senator assumes, and asks the Senate to believe, that these northern Indians cannot be induced to go south, nor the southern Indians to go north. In the very last treaty the Government negotiated with the Cheyennes, there was a band of about eighteen hundred protestants among them who did not agree to the treaty. What did they do? These are southern Indians. The treaty provided for their going south and being located there. They went south; but these eighteen hundred who did not agree to that treaty did go north, and they are now allied with the Sioux Indians who are waging these hostilities from the north. So there is no such reluctance to go in the one direction or the other; but if the Senator makes a point of fact that I have provided for one district he can make it two or three districts. I think they are precisely the same kind of men, and there is no more difficulty in this case than in that. The southern Indians are located in the neighborhood of this Indian Territory. There is no other disturbance between them. I assume that putting nine thousand more there would not create any disturbance; but if they cannot go there let them all go north; or if the Senator insists that there shall be or may be or ought to be two districts or three districts instead of one, as I think, then I have no objection to altering this to the plural, and let the commission select there a district or districts, and let the commission have authority when they get out there to do what they find it is best to do, not restrict them within such terms as induce me to believe that they cannot negotiate at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise not to discuss this question but simply to appeal to the Senate to let us have a vote. If we desire to settle this difficulty, let us adopt this plan and see if we can settle it. The proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is simply the proposition he offered yesterday when the bill was in Committee of the Whole. Our proposition is to close the difficulties with the Indians. Suppose that when the commission go out there we can close them by having two localities to remove them to; suppose the Sioux Indians do not wish to go south and the Cheyenne Indians do not wish to go north, the commission can settle the matter under the bill as it now stands. But if the proposition of my friend from Wisconsin be adopted, we must drive them all to one locality and we must have but one locality; and if it does not meet the favor of the two several tribes or three or four tribes, if they are unwilling to get upon the same reservation, then of course the commission will fail of the object intended by the bill.

The Senator ought to remember another fact: suppose that the commission shall recommend but one reservation, as they will have the right to do, or suppose they recommend two or three, under the amendments as they now stand it is left in the power of the Senate to adopt the one, two, or three as it may choose when the report comes in. The commission must certainly report to Congress; and when that report comes before us it will be within our discretion to adopt these suggestions or not; we can take one of these reservations, we can take two, or we can take three. Is it not better to have the privilege on the part of the commission of selecting several localities?—because it may conduce to the pacification of the Indians. I think therefore we had better take the amendments as they are now. And I hope we shall have a vote and let the bill go to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator had not made another argument I would not have objected to a vote; or if in making that argument he had not represented my amendment as so essentially different from what it is. First he undertakes to tell the Senate that it is precisely what I introduced yesterday, and which the Senate rejected. It differs as broadly from that as is possible for two propositions to differ. In that proposition I asked the Senate to instruct the commissioners to provide for all these men within the Indian Territory. Now I simply propose to ask that the commission shall provide for them within the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. But on one reservation. Mr. HOWE. But I do not insist that they should select but one reservation; for I expressly told the Senate that if that was objectionable I would put it in the plural, so that they would have authority to select a district or districts; but I do not wish them to be so tied up as that when they get out there they may find they cannot negotiate at all.

The Senator says, and says truly, they have got to report their doings here, and if we do not like what they agree to we can reject it. Very true; but how will the question stand before us? They go out under these instructions, which require them to provide for one portion of the Indians in one part of the country within narrow limits, and for another portion in another part, and they do so feeling obliged to do so under our instructions, and they come back here. How shall we object? It will be said to us at once, "If you do not agree to this arrangement there is a war on your hands." But if you give them now full discretion to go out and make the best provision for the Indians and the cheapest one for the Government without this territorial restriction, then when they come back here you cannot urge that argument. Now I am willing to have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, and Sprague—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, and Williams—22.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next reserved amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is in the third section, after the word "including" in the fourth line, to strike out the residue of the section and in lieu of the part stricken out to insert:

That part of the present Indian Territory ceded to the United States for the use of other Indian tribes, or such part of it as may be necessary, and which, under existing treaties, can be so appropriated, together with such other adjacent territory as may be suitable to constitute a permanent home for such Indians as now inhabit south of the Platte and east of the Rocky mountains and Pecos river, not peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, which territory when so defined and approved by Congress shall not be entered upon or settled in any manner, except by consent of the tribes interested, by any person other than members of such tribes and officers and employees of the United States.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOWE. Is it in order now to move to amend the bill by striking out the second and third sections and putting in a substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose that is in order.

Mr. HOWE. Then I move to strike out the second and third sections and to substitute what I send to the Chair, and I will take a vote on it without any further argument.

The words proposed to be inserted were read, as follows:

That said commissioners are required to examine and select a district or districts of country having sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains not now peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, to which the Government has the right of occupation or to which said commissioners can obtain the right of occupation, and in which district or districts there shall be sufficient tillable or grazing land to enable the said tribes respectively to support themselves by agricultural and pastoral pursuits. Said district or districts when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for said Indians to be located thereon, and no person not members of said tribes shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribes interested, except officers and employees of the United States: Provided, That the district or districts shall be so located as not to interfere with travel on highways located by authority of the United States, nor with the route of the Northern Pacific railroad.

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Ramsey, and Wade—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Davis, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Williams—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the first section read for the information of the Senate as it now stands amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commission to consist of three officers of the Army not below the rank of brigadier general, who, together with N. G. Taylor, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, John B. Henderson and William Windom, chairmen of the Committees on Indian Affairs of the Senate and House of Representatives, and John B. Sanborn, shall have power and authority to call together the chiefs and head men of such bands or tribes of Indians as are now waging war against the United States, or committing depredations upon the people thereof, to ascertain the alleged reasons for their acts of hostility, and in their discretion, under the direction of the President, to make and conclude with said bands or tribes such treaty stipulations for the action of the Senate, as may remove all just causes of complaint on their part, and at the same time establish security for person and property along the lines of railroad now being constructed to the Pacific and other thoroughfares of travel to the western Territories, and such as will most likely insure civilization for the Indians and peace and safety for the whites.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. YATES. I had not intended to say anything on this bill, and I do not intend now to say more than a very few words, and I hope they will provoke no reply. I think they are necessary under the circumstances. My attention has just been called to some remarks which were made by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] in relation to certain expressions that were made use of by a distinguished general of the Army, General Pope. I did not happen to be present when those remarks were made or I should have replied to them at the time.

The honorable Senator from Maine seems to characterize the expressions of General Pope as a high crime or misdemeanor, or something for which he should be cashiered by the Government of the United States and deprived of his office. Sir, as I know General Pope to have been one of the most effective and one of the most skillful and patriotic generals of the Army, one who won as much distinction in the late war as any other general, and I feel that it is due to him and due from me as his friend and as representing here in part the State from which he comes, to say a few words in response to what the honorable Senator from Maine has said upon this subject.

What is the offense of General Pope? On looking into the facts of the case it will appear that General Pope, instead of having committed any offense for which he should be arraigned by the Senator from Maine, has only said that in a former communication he warned the Government of the United States, or the General in command of the Army, that this Indian war was inevitable, that there was no reliance to be placed upon the treaties which are made by the Indians with this Government, saying in that respect nothing more than the honorable Senator himself said half a dozen times in the course of his own speech. He told us that the conduct of this Government toward the Indians had been inhuman and barbarous; in effect that we had not kept our treaties of peace. General Pope only gave a warning to the Government that this same policy would be continued.

The Senator quoted from General Pope's report, in which he said that the commissioners knew when they made these treaties, and agreed that the whites should not go into the Indian Territory, that these promises would not be kept. Sir, I say they did know it. General Pope told the truth. Every one knows that fact; the Government knows it; the honorable Senator from Maine knows it; He knows that such promises have never been kept. General Pope's offense is in having stated that fact. The honorable Senator himself makes the same charge against the Government of the United States when he speaks of its inhumanity and its barbarity to the Indians. General Pope was warning the Government against this war, which was inevitable. He told the simple truth when he said that the commissioners who made these treaties knew well that such a promise would not be kept. The Senator from Maine knows well that whatever treaties we make with the Indians we cannot stay the advance tide of population on its westward way.

The Senators who have spoken have said as much. They have said that these tribes were barbarous; that they were roving tribes; that they will not stay in any fixed locality; that the whites must have this territory; that the whites must occupy this territory west; and General Pope's offense is that he said the commissioners who made these treaties knew that such would be the case. Sir, he knew well, as the honorable Senator knows, that when one of these six-footer pioneers from the pine hills of Maine goes out West in the neighborhood of an Indian tribe and wants Indian territory he will go there and occupy that territory. He has done it from the beginning of the Government down to the present time.

I say, then, General Pope has committed no offense. I agree with him that the policy of the Government as to the Indians has been wrong. I will not enter into that subject now. I will simply say that the Indians should never have been treated as owning the land. They never did own the land. No man has a right to own land who will not work it. The Government should never have treated them as owning the land; but as barbarous, roving tribes, it was the duty of the Government to treat them with that Christian humanity and consideration which was due to their condition.

What the true policy is I do not pretend now to indicate. I rose simply to say that what the honorable Senator from Maine charges as a crime, as an offense upon the part of General Pope, should go to his highest credit. It is a merit in him. He predicted this war; the war is now upon us according to his prediction. His warnings were unheeded. These treaties have not been kept, and will not be kept. White men will not keep out of the Indian country whatever treaties you may make, and Senators all around say they ought not, and should not, and will not be kept out of that territory. But if the Senator says that General Pope has not done his duty as an officer of the Government in this war, or any other war, to the best of his knowledge and ability, then I call upon him for the proof. Where are the facts? Where is the evidence that he has not done his duty? There is certainly no evidence couched in this language which he has used. When he said there was no reliance to be placed on these Indian negotiations he did not mean to reflect on the Government of the United States. Sir, the fact is, from the circumstances we all know it to be so, that there is no reliance to be placed upon these negotiations. We are dealing with men with whom we can have no treaties really, and we admit that fact, because we acknowledge that they are savages, that they are barbarous, that they are not civilized, that they will not stand by their obligations. When General Pope said there was no reliance to be placed upon these negotiations with the Indians he did not mean to reflect upon the duty of the Government, or to intimate that the Government had failed to keep its faith, as far as it possibly could, in regard to all the treaties and in regard to all its policy as to the Indians.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps, Mr. President, I ought to say a word in reply to the honorable Senator from Illinois. He seems to suppose that in the remarks which I had the honor to submit to the Senate yesterday I, too, had arraigned the Government for perfidy. I had no such idea in my mind, and I am sure no language I used is fairly susceptible of any such interpretation. The Government on its theory has been just enough to the Indian. I did not arraign the Government of the United States in its purposes, as I had occasion to explain to the honorable Senator from Michigan a moment ago. What I complained of was that spirit to which the honorable Senator from Illinois refers when he speaks of men from other parts of the country who approach the border and disclose a lawlessness of purpose to trespass upon the rights of the Indian, irrespective of law or treaty. That was the spirit that I deprecated yesterday; and my arraignment of General Pope was that he took that spirit for his guide, and not the treaty and the law; and that he had the bad taste to say to the General of the Army and to the American people that they negotiated treaties with the purpose of breaking those treaties. That was the arraignment.

Mr. YATES. That language is not used in what the Senator read from General Pope.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will quote it again and see whether it is or not:

"The peace commissioners promise the Indian, in the first place, that the whites shall not go into the Indian country, knowing well that it is impossible to fulfill such a promise."

General Pope has no right to know any such thing if he speaks for the Government, for he ought to know that what the Government promises the Government means to fulfill. My objection to General Pope and my arraignment of him was that being there to fulfill the purposes of the Government, which are the promises of the peace commissioners, he allows himself to cooperate with the spirit of the border that overrules the Government; he falls in; he becomes—I will not use an offensive word—but the instrument in the hands of that spirit of the border which the honorable Senator himself recognizes as irrepressible on the frontier, and turns upon the Government and tells it to its face "You need not expect me to observe your treaty stipulations."

Now, sir, I say that was neither in good taste nor decorous. It was not in accordance with the fact; and it was not in accordance with the theory of the Government, and it did not lie in his mouth to utter any such sentiment, to predict any such thing, or to assert any such thing; and I submit to the honorable Senator whether I am not fully borne out in stating that, while he arraigns the Government, he shows clearly that he is acting on the spirit which is lawless on the border, and which I am sorry to say seems to impress Senators more or less that there is not power enough in this Government to keep a treaty after you have made it.

That was my specification; that is what I meant to say precisely; and that is what I meant to hold him responsible for. I did not mean, and I think no language I employed yesterday was susceptible of the interpretation that I intended to arraign the purposes of the Government. I say that the Government in its general purposes has been humane; but its policy has been constantly overruled in the manner I undertook to describe, and in the very way the honorable Senator himself illustrates by this six-footer from Maine, who goes upon the border and cannot be resisted. General Pope said that, and for that I condemn him. When he goes there to maintain the flag and the honor of the country and the treaties of the nation made with these Indians, he is to stand by the flag and stand by the nation, and he is not to yield to the six-footer from Maine nor to the spirit of the border; and when he does that and turns to the Government and in its face says, "Your treaties cannot be kept; they were never made to be kept; the commissioners who made them knew they were not to be kept;" I say he takes a high responsibility.

If the honorable Senator from Illinois can find a justification in any duty that is devolved upon a major general in the service of the United States for using such language, he can do better than I can. If he can find an apology for it even, I shall be glad. I have no personal feeling in the matter, of course. I desire to say, now that I am up, that I have not the honor of knowing General Pope, and I have no fault to find with his general record. That he is brave and gallant and patriotic I do not question. I applaud him in that particular, as would the honorable Senator from Illinois; but on a great question of this kind neither General Pope nor any other general has a right to use such language with impunity. Rights higher than the individual rights of Major General Pope or any other major general are in controversy here. It was with that view and no other that I alluded to General Pope yesterday and criticised what he had said.

Mr. YATES. A single word, sir. The remarks of the honorable Senator as printed, which I did not hear, seem to me very uncharitable in reference to General Pope. General Pope never meant, as is evident from the phraseology employed by him, to say that the Government had acted in bad faith. He was charging no crime, no offense upon the part of the Government, no wrong upon the part of the Government. He evidently never meant any such thing. But he meant simply to say that when the Government made these treaties they would not be kept, from the nature of the case, considering the parties with whom he had to act, and judging from the past history of the country. That was General Pope's meaning. Sir, we have to deal with these Indians in some way. We have treated them as owners of the land, which we never should have done; and we have found that we can deal with them in no satisfactory way.

All that General Pope meant to say was, that any barrier we might attempt to throw up against the advance of the white man would be unavailing. He meant to say only what every Senator has said, that we cannot stay the wave of population; that you may promise the Indians that the white man will not go into their country, but the white man will go there. It was very uncharitable, I think, on the part of the Senator from Maine, thus to arraign General Pope for making a prediction which has proved to be true, and for stating to the Government that war would result, and that the consequences would follow which have followed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it was not my intention to have said a word on this bill or upon any cognate subject; but I cannot forbear protesting, whatever the protest may be worth, against the idea that the United States are unable to fulfill their faith pledged by any treaty with Indians or with civilized nations. I cannot understand how it is possible that these treaties should be violated with impunity unless the United States are to be considered as a party to such violation. I have no idea that it has ever been the purpose of the Government of the United States not to fulfill any of their obligations. It is certain that so far these treaties have been made and they have been broken. I do not know in the history of these tribes since they came under the quasi dominion of the United States that they have ever upon any occasion broken any of their treaties. They have been broken by the whites, not acting under the authority of the Government, but they have been broken by the whites without the interference of the Government, I mean the practical and influential interference of the Government.

It is idle, I think, and disparaging the power of the Government to assert for a moment that it is not in its power to enforce obedience upon the part of its citizens to all these treaties. What are we doing now? Here we have in subjection, absolute subjection—not an arm raised against the power of the Government—ten States with a white population of some eight or nine millions; and the principal purpose for which the friends of that policy avow the propriety of adopting that policy is the protection of three or four millions of the so-called black race, and we are doing it, and doing it effectually with an army comparatively small, properly distributed. No black man's rights are violated except in occasional instances, such instances as occur in the other States in the Union. And is it to be said that we cannot protect three or four hundred thousand Indians in their possessions of land which God and nature gave them in the beginning of their existence? Why is it that we cannot protect them? Are our people such marauders, such rebels to the due authority of the Government, that they will not obey the orders of the Government and perform their duties as good citizens to the Government? That I think is a libel upon our people, with due deference to those who entertain a different opinion.

There may be spirits upon the outer borders of the United States which it would be difficult without force to restrain; but the idea that the power of a Government strong enough to keep ten States in subjection, to hold in its hand eight or nine million people consisting of as gallant men as ever trod on the soil of any land, is not able to keep against violating the treaties of the Government the few men, unruly and reckless spirits, who without any fault on the part of the mass of the people in those borders from time to time are found violating their duties to the United States and trampling upon the rights of the Indians secured by the pledged faith of the United States—the idea is not to be entertained. No matter what General Pope designed, and it certainly is far from my purpose to call in question his gallantry or his services during the war, I think he has unintentionally or intentionally libeled the Government or the people whom it is the duty of the Government to restrain from the perpetration of any wrongs upon any people, be they black or be they copper-colored.

Now, that we cannot find a place within the broad limits of the United States within which to place these three hundred thousand Indians and there save them harmless against any power, domestic or foreign, I do not believe. I should regret to be forced to believe it, because if forced into such a conviction I should believe that it was a foul and damning spot upon the reputation of the country.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

On the motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 18, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NATIONAL ASYLUM FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the board of managers of the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I find in the Globe of yesterday certain remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VAN TRUMP,] representing the twelfth district, purporting to have been made on the 13th instant, but which, if I am correctly informed, were not made in the House, but are published and sent to the country under a permission to print. I now ask the Clerk to read the paragraph which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Sir, I will notice one other significant but false recognition by the Republican party of the fact that the southern States are still legitimate sovereignties within the Union. In looking over the certificate of States ratifying the late amendments to the Constitution of the United States, by the Secretary of State, with the broad seal of the Union attached, and to which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] so much objects, I find the name of a so-called State of the Union voting upon said amendment, to which, I suppose, the honorable gentleman will not object. I mean, sir, the so-called State of West Virginia. West Virginia, by act of Congress, was attempted to be erected into a State in July, 1862, one of the most doubtful and desponding periods of the war. In order to impart to it the semblance of constitutional existence the huge legislative mendacity was resorted to of reciting that it was done with the consent of the sovereign legislative authority of the State of Virginia. West Virginia, indeed! What withering, irrepressible scorn must any honest mind feel for the miserable, inconsistent, and ridiculous assumption which claims West Virginia to be a State constitutionally within the Union, and that Arkansas is a mere waif upon the sea of national life, an unorganized colonial dependency outside of the Union! West Virginia, sir! she has no constitutional home, no rightful, legal abiding place in the great family of States; she is a bastard Commonwealth, a mere political foundling, without a drop of constitutional blood in her veins; she is an illegitimate star in our political constellation; she was conceived in the sin and born in the iniquity of modern radical republicanism; and the whole rightful constitutional theory of our confederate system, the whole original framework of our Government as designed by our fathers is disturbed and dislocated by this horrid burlesque of a State. And yet, sir, its erection, however revolutionary and unconstitutional, when you look to the animus and mode of its accomplishment, as against those who perpetrated the outrage, is a clear and unequivocal recognition of the fact that Old Virginia was and is a State within the Union, unshorn of any of its original sovereignty."

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman when I get through with my explanation.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. One moment.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. The gentleman published his speech in the Globe, a speech not delivered upon this floor, and I had no opportunity to reply. I do not think under the circumstances the gentleman deserves the courtesy at my hands.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask the Clerk to read a second time that part of the paragraph which I have marked with double lines; for I want those words "seared as if with a hot iron" on the heart and memory of every loyal man in West Virginia, that they may know the future that awaits them if the party with which the gentleman from Ohio is associated obtains control of this Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

"West Virginia, sir! she has no constitutional home, no rightful, legal abiding place in the great family of States; she is a bastard Commonwealth, a mere political foundling, without a drop of constitutional blood in her veins; she is an illegitimate star in our political constellation; she was conceived in the sin and born in the iniquity of modern radical republicanism; and the whole rightful constitutional theory of our confederate system, the whole original framework of our Government as designed by our fathers is disturbed and dislocated by this horrid burlesque of a State."

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I do not propose to enter into a discussion of any constitutional question connected with the admission of the State. It is sufficient for me to know that West Virginia has been admitted as a State by the Congress of the United States; that branch of the Government authorized by the Constitution to admit new States, and I presume the members of that Congress understood their constitutional obligations fully as well as the gentleman from Ohio. West Virginia has been acknowledged as a State by the executive department of the Government in all its branches. Her name has been entered on the roll of States by the Supreme Court of the United States, no justice on that bench, so far as I know, dissenting therefrom. She has fulfilled all her constitutional obligations as a State since her admission. She furnished her full quota of soldiers for the defense of the Union—all volunteers, no drafted men among them. Can the gentleman's district say as much? She has paid her share of the direct tax, and stands as ready to-day to sustain a preserved Union as she did to defend it in its time of danger and peril.

Yes, sir, West Virginia has a home, a constitutional home, a legal abiding place in the great family of States; she is a true Commonwealth saved from insurrection and rebellion by the best blood of freemen; an honored star in our political constellation; born of loyalty and dedicated to freedom she magnifies our national system of government and proclaims to the coming future that loyalty is the birthright of a State.

I know she is not a State by the consent of rebels or rebel sympathizers. I know her name is not called in Democratic conventions, that it is not enrolled on Democratic banners, for she does not muster in that camp; and I am not surprised that the gentleman's ire is excited by seeing her Representatives on this floor. But I am surprised at the bitterness of invective with which she is assailed, and especially that it should come from a Representative from the State of Ohio—a State which, of all others, (I speak it in no spirit of boasting,) has most reason to thank God for the loyalty of West Virginia. For four long years of fire and death West Virginia stood between the citizens of Ohio and the destroyer. We were her wall of defense; while our fields were laid waste and desolated theirs were rich with fruitful harvests; while our homes were left without a roof-tree by the ruthless hand of war theirs were the abodes of peace and plenty; and yet a government and recognition among the States of the Union, secured by such earnest devotion and won by such heroic sacrifices, must be branded as "illegitimate," "conceived in sin and born in iniquity," and that by a Representative of a people who have been most benefited by that devotion and that sacrifice. O shame, where is thy blush?

Mr. Speaker, I have been at a loss to conceive any sufficient reason for this unwarrantable attack on West Virginia, made, too, not on the floor of the House in the heat of debate, but in the quiet meditations of his room, under a permission to print, and published some four days afterward; so that it would probably have escaped my notice entirely had not my attention been called to it by a member of the other House.

I say I am at a loss to assign any reasonable motive for it. Can it be because the admission of West Virginia as a State will ever stand as a reproach to rebels and traitors, and will be an encouragement to loyal men and patriots in all ages of the Republic, or that her recognition here is an abiding assurance that the "lost cause" can have no hereafter so long as the name of West Virginia is on the roll of States; or is it that she cannot be forgiven because she would have stood in the way of the hundred thousand men who were going to bring Vandalism home from the rebel lines if he had been elected Governor of Ohio? But I am at a loss for the reason.

I can only say, in conclusion, that had the gentleman from Ohio referred to the admission of West Virginia in the same manner and spirit in which he refers to Mr. Lincoln's action in reference to Arkansas his remarks would have passed without any notice from me. Under the circumstances I could not do otherwise than I have done. And it only remains now for me to thank the gentleman from Ohio for the undisguised expression of his sentiments and those of his party toward the State of West Virginia, for I am sure the warning will not be passed by unheeded by her loyal people.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I ask to make a brief reply.

Mr. UPSON. I hope that the time will be limited.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I do not rise to make a speech.

Mr. UPSON. I object unless the time is limited.

The SPEAKER. The time will be limited to ten minutes, if there be no objection.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I wish to make an explanation, and that is, it is manifest to every gentleman in this House I could have meant no disrespect to the people of the so-called State of West Virginia as citizens of the United States. By no means, sir; I simply spoke of their organization as a State or corporation without the consent of old Virginia under the provisions of the Constitution.

Sir, I have every reason to have the highest regard for the people of West Virginia. I lived within her borders, such as they are now, for a year, and some of the best friends of my life are there; and, sir, I have nothing to reply to the gentleman. I was an admiring auditor of the eloquence and energy with which the gentleman defended his State. I repeat I meant no disrespect to the people of West Virginia.

SOUTHERN RELIEF.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise for the purpose of presenting to the House a paper in the nature of a letter of thanks, signed by citizens of Alabama. Early in the Thirty-Ninth Congress I had the honor of introducing a resolution requesting the President to direct the chief Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau to supply the then starving people of the mountain counties of Alabama and Georgia with seed with which to put in a crop. That resolution was adopted and the seed furnished. The letter I ask to have read is in acknowledgment of the kindness of Congress in furnishing this timely and vital relief, with an assurance that with the aid thus given they hope to be able to provide for their future wants. I ask to have the letter read.

The letter was read, as follows:

DECATUR, ALABAMA, July 13, 1867.

To the Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth Congress:

GENTLEMEN: In behalf of the suffering poor of North Alabama accept our heartfelt thanks for your timely supplies forwarded through your worthy agent, General O. O. Howard, to this needy and desolate class. Be assured that the recipients of your favor duly appreciate your act of humanity, and the lives you have thus saved will be used to bless and honor you. We are aware that the consciousness of having performed an act of benevolence is more to you than any pleasure you can derive from outside expression, but nevertheless we cannot forbear this token of our appreciation for the lasting benefit you have conferred upon our famished country.

We are happy to state that the prospects for a crop are so flattering that we hope that we shall this year raise an abundance of everything, and that we will be able to dispense with your further bounty.

We are gratefully, your obedient servants,

GEORGE M. TABER, and numerous others.

The letter was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION.

Mr. ARCHER. I ask leave to make a correction. On Saturday last, on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the reconstruction bill I am recorded in the Globe as voting ay. I voted nay, as the Journal will show.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Maurice Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next.

Also, that the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed Hon. Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, the additional member on the part of the Senate of the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED COTTON.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following joint resolution:

Whereas it is stated that the Court of Claims has rendered judgments to the amount of $3,000,000 in favor of parties claiming for captured or abandoned cotton: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be hereby instructed to withhold the payment of said judgments until further action by Congress.

No objection being made, the joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I appeal to the gentleman to allow me to offer the following amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will hear it read.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Whereas this House on the 30th day of April, 1862, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to adjust the claim against the Government for the five thousand Hall carbines purchased through Simon Stevens, esq., by General John C. Fremont, on the 6th day of August, 1861, and afterward delivered at the United States arsenal at the city of St. Louis, on the basis of a sale of said arms to the Government for $12 50 each, rejecting all other demands against the Government on account of the purchase of said arms."

And whereas by a recent judgment of the Court of Claims the said Simon Stevens has recovered against the United States the sum of $58,000 on account of said arms, being, with the sum heretofore paid on said purchase, at the rate of twenty-two dollars for each of said arms, the said arms having been sold on the 6th day of June, 1861, by the order of the Secretary of War, as condemned arms at $3 50 each: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the circumstances under which said judgment was recovered, and whether the judgment of said court should be subject to any other method of review than that now authorized by law, with authority to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not yield for that amendment. I may vote for it separately, but I do not wish to have it attached to a resolution which I think nobody will oppose, while there may be objection to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to state that at the last session of Congress, and I believe for almost every session since I have been here, bills have been introduced by different members requiring the action of Congress before judgments rendered by the Court of Claims should be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury. I have always opposed them mainly because I was personally very well acquainted with two of the judges of that court who hailed from Pennsylvania, and had confidence in them as well as in other judges. I am satisfied from what is being said in the press and what I hear in private circles that great frauds on the Government have been perpetrated on this question of cotton claims. I do not say that anything wrong has been done by the Court of Claims, or that we can ultimately, when we come to examine the judgments, avoid their payment; but so much has been said upon this question that I think it is but just to relieve the Secretary of the Treasury from the embarrassment that he feels, as I hear, about paying claims that I understand he believes are somewhat unjust, by action on our part. I hope there will be no objection to this resolution unless it be an objection as to form. At the next session of Congress these judgments or claims can be examined by the proper committee, and if found correct we can authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay them. I yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to oppose the resolution, but to suggest what the practical difficulties are that need the action of the House. By the abandoned and captured property act all parties who proved their loyalty during the war are allowed to reclaim in the Court of Claims property captured from them by our armies or taken as abandoned by the Treasury agents. The difficulty is that we have made no definition of loyalty, and it is left to the court to judge upon the evidence whether a given claimant was loyal in sentiment. Now, it is very difficult in the South to prove that there is any one who ever was not loyal. Everybody who did not hold a commission in the confederate army or in their government comes forward and proves by his neighbors that he was a good Union man during the war, and therefore, under the laws of evidence, the Court of Claims could not do otherwise than as they did in the cases under consideration. I think we should have this matter of this operation of the law inquired into; otherwise all this property, amounting to many millions—I think I am safe in saying thirty millions—may be all taken back by the rebel owners or by those from whom it was captured, who had abandoned it to go into the rebel service.

The difficulty, as I have stated, is that Congress has given to the court no law and no guide as to what shall be the presumption as to loyalty. With the permission of the gentleman I will state what might be the needed legislation. In a loyal State we treat every man as loyal, however disloyal he may be, unless he commits some overt act of disloyalty. So in disloyal States every man should be treated as disloyal until he shows some overt act of loyalty during the war. And for the purpose of getting that definition into the law I hope the House will pass the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; although I think, as a rule, it is not well for this House or Congress to interfere with the judgment of courts duly constituted, against whom there can be no just censure. I think the Court of Claims have carried out the law in what they have done, and the law I understand to be what my friend now desires to reach.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.]

Mr. PRUYN. I am glad to hear the latter portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] because I can fully accord with him and with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] in paying the highest tribute to what I believe to be the integrity and ability of the judges of the Court of Claims; and I think that we ought not lightly to interfere with their judgments.

I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the amount of the judgments to which the resolution refers is to be paid out of the Treasury as a matter of course, or whether an appropriation by Congress is needed for that purpose? I suppose an appropriation to be needed.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The law as it now stands requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay all judgments rendered by the Court of Claims without further action of Congress. Repeated efforts have been made by different members of Congress to get some law passed requiring an appropriation by Congress for the payment of a judgment after its rendition by the court. Those efforts have always failed. So far as my vote, and sometimes my voice, would go, they have been heretofore against any such action, because I have had confidence, as I still have, in the Court of Claims. But when so large an amount of money is about to be paid, with many more claims of a similar nature still unacted on, I think that the matter should be examined by Congress, that the propriety of the payment may be considered by us. I think that the Secretary of the Treasury should not be allowed—indeed I presume he is not inclined, unless compelled by law—to pay the large amount involved in these cases, without any examination of the matter by Congress.

Mr. PRUYN. Does the gentleman propose an examination by a commission or a reference of the subject to a committee?

Mr. SCOFIELD. Neither. This joint resolution simply proposes to relieve the Secretary of the Treasury from paying these judgments until Congress shall make an appropriation for the purpose.

I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] that while I agree with him in this proposition it does not meet the evil. It is but superficial legislation. While I have as much confidence as he or any one else can have in the gentlemen who compose the Court of Claims, one of them being a gentleman from my own State, whose integrity is above suspicion, yet, sir, let any gentleman look at the organization and constitution of that court, as well as to the results of the litigation in that court, and he will see at once that the Treasury of the United States is put at the mercy of the solicitor of that court. Let me show why this is so.

We pass an appropriation bill setting apart a certain amount of money to pay the judgments of the Court of Claims. That money can be used for no other purpose. It is liable to be expended for paying these cotton claims as well as others. Now, the Court of Claims can try a case only as it is presented to the court by the solicitor; and although the gentleman who occupies that office is a personal friend of mine, in whose integrity I have all confidence, yet I happen to know—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I would inquire of the gentleman who is, as he understands, the present solicitor of the Court of Claims?

Mr. DAWES. I am speaking with reference to Hon. Jesse O. Norton.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that gentleman to be the solicitor.

Mr. DAWES. It is to that gentleman I refer, although I know nothing against any other gentleman who may occupy the office.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. The present solicitor of the Court of Claims is Mr. Eli Norton. If any gentleman here knows him it is more than I do.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; then I was mistaken. But I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, while he has this matter in hand, to the operation of things in that court, as illustrated in my own observation.

There has been a judgment of that court for $58,000, rendered, I have no doubt, in all integrity by the court, but which never would have been rendered but for the failure (from one cause or another, I know not what) of the solicitor to bring to the attention of the court matters that are spread upon the records of this House as a part of the official documents of Congress, and also spread upon the report of a commission appointed by President Lincoln, consisting of Judge Holt and Mr. Robert Dale Owen. That judgment for $58,000 has been rendered since we left here last March, in consequence of the fact that the solicitor of the Court of Claims (it may have been from lack of knowledge; I do not mean to intimate that there was the slightest lack of integrity on his part) failed for some reason to bring to the attention of the court certain facts, which, if they had been presented, would have made it utterly impossible for the court in its integrity to render such a judgment.

That is only one case. Now, sir, on the integrity and ability of the solicitor of the Court of Claims rests the question whether millions are not taken out of the Treasury of the United States past the inquiry of the House of Representatives, or indeed either branch of Congress. Such has been the case in reference to these cotton claims as to attract the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania, and in the last Congress such was his strong influence against the movement as to put some guard over the Court of Claims and secure some protection to the Treasury of the United States against the mistakes in that court of a grievous character like those which have come to his knowledge and mine. I beg my friend, while he has the matter in his hands, to see whether he cannot bring that Court of Claims within the pale of legislative inquiry, touching the judgments they may render by mistake, for I have not the slightest disposition to lay anything beyond mistake to their charge. They are not more above errors than any other tribunal. Let us by some means suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania, some method of review of their judgments, save the Treasury of the United States and not have it depleted by lack of knowledge or integrity in the officer appointed to present the facts to the Court of Claims on which they are to pass their judgments, their judgments being final upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not understand my friend from Massachusetts to oppose the adoption of my resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Not a bit.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have always opposed all general legislation, as I have stated before, but now when a case has come up where I see we ought to have general legislation, I shall hereafter change my action, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts or some one else will introduce a resolution I will support it. I have introduced this to meet the present emergency. There is a doubt whether these cotton cases can be appealed to the Supreme Court, although an effort will be made to appeal them to the Supreme Court of the United States. If I am correctly informed there is a doubt that all these claims will be paid before Congress assembles again, and therefore it is this ought to pass immediately. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to know from the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the Secretary of the Treasury doubts the legality and propriety of this claim; whether there is any charge against the fairness of these claims? I ask whether we ought to act here in opposition unless there is some doubt.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have had no consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, and all I know about his doubts and feelings is from his order. Therefore I cannot speak with any authority. I have understood that the Secretary of the Treasury was unwilling to pay these claims as they stood unless forced to do so. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I know nothing about this matter except what I have seen in the papers. I notice by the morning papers that the Secretary of the Treasury has presented the matter to the President and Cabinet to seek advice whether he shall pay this judgment or abide an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. I hope the House will not adopt a resolution which will in any way have the effect to prevent the Secretary from appealing these cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

One word more while I am up. I hope we are not going to pay the speculators and cotton kings for cotton captured by our own Army in the rebel States, while we strenuously and persistently refuse to pay the poor widow for the loss of her cow and her mule because she lived in the rebel States. It seems to me Congress should either pay the poor people who lost all they had or else shut down the gate and refuse to pay speculators and rebel cotton men for the cotton we have captured from the rebels. I am not opposed to the resolution provided it will not prevent the appeal of these cases. I rise more for the purpose of saying that than anything else. I do not wish that the Secretary of the Treasury shall lie down on a single resolution of Congress and not appeal these cases to the Supreme Court where the decision of the Court of Claims may be reviewed.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Although my acquaintance with the Secretary of the Treasury is not of an intimate character, I am able in part to answer the gentleman from New York. I happened to be at the Treasury Department within a week when the question passing between the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates led to an incidental remark which impressed me with the conviction that an immense amount of wrong is being done to the country, and that there is an indication of combination in behalf of the most inveterate blockade-runners, those who were powerful on both sides of the military line, powerful in resources, sending cotton to England to be sold and remitting funds to the confederate government; and he believes that the agencies are now on foot to induce or compel this Government by processes like this to pay to these most insidious and powerful enemies of this Government for the balance of cotton found in their hands when the army surrendered. I do hope, whether this resolution be the wisest that can be framed or not—it certainly is a good step for the present—that some check will be put upon any payment out of the Treasury to rebels for cotton found in their possession at the close of the war.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker, I am very thankful that this matter has been brought to the attention of Congress. In connection with what my colleague has said I will state a case that came to my knowledge which will go to show that there are large fraudulent claims made upon the Treasury.

While in New Orleans two years ago I was informed of a certain lot of cotton, thirty-five hundred bales, which was surrendered by the Treasury Department in Mobile by Mr. Dexter, through his sub-agent, to a rebel by the name of Violet. It was shipped to New Orleans. A thousand bales came into New Orleans one evening on the Cherokee. I went to General Canby, then in command in Louisiana, and asked him to take possession of this cotton, giving him the information I had. General Canby said he knew it belonged to the Government; that he had captured about two hundred thousand bales in Alabama, and under orders had delivered it over to the Treasury Department. At that time the agent of the Treasury Department, Mr. Dexter, was surrendering cotton on fraudulent claims, and General Canby told me that having got clear of it himself he did not want to touch it, but advised me to see to it. I went and got the United States marshal to take possession of this cotton. He required a bond to the amount of $100,000 before he could do it, and I got a gentleman in New Orleans to furnish the bond on my responsibility. He then went and seized the cotton.

Mr. Dexter came from Mobile to plead the cause of the man to whom he had surrendered the cotton. After making his statement, I told him he might go home, and I would hold on to the cotton. I telegraphed to the Treasury Department to send down a man whom I named, Major McQuaide, to take possession of the cotton and ship it to New York. I got General Canby to give me a military guard for the purpose of holding it there. I came home and went to the Secretary of the Treasury and explained the case fully to him, as I also did to the President. I told him there was a hundred thousand bales of cotton in the South which were being used in this corrupt way. The Secretary of the Treasury said he knew it, that the Treasury agents became scoundrels there, even if they were honest when he sent them down. He then sent down one Mellen, who, after being well fed and treated, came back and reported that the matter was all right. The President afterward pardoned Mr. Violet, and with the pardon came the restoration of the property. He was thus put in possession of property which he never owned, property belonging to the Government. And this man Violet has now a claim, as I understand, in the hands of an attorney in this city to be prosecuted against the Government for three thousand five hundred bales of cotton, amounting to, I think, over five hundred thousand dollars, not one bale of which belonged to him. The Treasury agent, Dexter, I will state by the way, was afterward arrested and imprisoned, and his case was so bad that the Government would not let him out on bail.

Sir, it is time to put a stop to the payment of these claims. I am satisfied that parties have been buying these claims against the Treasury Department. I have told the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury so and he admitted it. I know of about eighteen million dollars worth of the Draper cotton claims in the hands of agents here, and these claims ought to be shut down upon so that they shall not be paid until Congress examines them. I am opposed to allowing either the courts or the Treasury Department from passing upon these claims, as they will amount to scores of millions. I believe Congress should examine them before they are allowed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOTFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

Mr. McCLURG. I ask leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Southern Railroads be ordered to proceed in their investigations by sub-committees.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish the gentleman to explain the object of this resolution.

Mr. McCLURG. Two of the members of the Committee on Southern Railroads also belong to the Committee of Elections. Under the order of the House it is necessary for the Committee of Elections to take testimony in Kentucky during the coming vacation. The Committee on Southern Railroads have also been, by a resolution passed by the House, required to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill declaring certain lands forfeited to the Government which were ceded to five States that were in the rebellion, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas. That resolution may cause a necessity for an investigation in various States, and if we are not permitted to investigate by sub-committees it may be impossible for us to discharge the duty imposed upon us by that resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know that I object to the resolution, but I wish to state that the practice of creating special committees and sub-committees, with reporters and clerks, is objectionable, and I think the House should put a check upon it; yet it is not for me to interpose an objection.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Have not the committee this power without an order of the House?

The SPEAKER. They have not. A quorum of the committee must ordinarily be present, and of course it increases the expense to have the whole committee go to distant portions of the country when a sub-committee can act.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON POLITICAL ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to appoint a standing committee, to consist of thirteen members and to be called the Committee on Ethnology, whose duty it shall be to take cognizance of all matters relating to the origin of and differences among these several races of America, and particularly to inquire whether these three great races of the country, the whites, the negroes, and the Democrats, are specifically different and descended from so many distinct original creations; and if so, whether that fact makes any difference in their respective rights and duties.

Several members objected.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NORTHERN OHIO.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask leave to introduce the bill in relation to the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] objected yesterday. The gentleman from Pennsylvania now withdraws his objection, as I understand. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the alternate sessions of the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio shall be held annually, one session in the city of Cleveland on the second Tuesday of July, and one in Toledo on the second Tuesday in November, under such rules and regulations as the district judge for said district may prescribe; and it authorizes the holding of adjourned courts when the business before the court shall in the opinion of the court require it.

The bill was received, and read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I wish to say that this bill has been submitted to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, who approves it, and that the delegation from my State are unanimous in its favor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIM OF SIMON STEVENS.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the House on the 30th day of April, 1862, adopted the following resolution, namely:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to adjust the claim against the Government for the five thousand Hall carbines purchased through Simon Stevens, esq., by General John C. Frémont, on the 6th day of August, 1861, and afterward delivered at the United States arsenal at the city of St. Louis, on the basis of a sale of said arms to the Government for $12 50 each, rejecting all other demands against the Government on account of the purchase of said arms.

And whereas by a recent judgment of the Court of Claims the said Simon Stevens has recovered against the United States the sum of $58,000 on account of said arms, being, with the sum heretofore paid on said purchase, at the rate of twenty-two dollars for each of said arms, the said arms having been sold on the 6th day of June, 1861, by the order of the Secretary of War as condemned arms, at $3 50 each: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire into the circumstances under which said judgments was recovered, and whether the judgments of said courts should be subject to any other method of review than that now authorized by law, with authority to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Morris Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next.

EXAMINATION OF BOUNTY CLAIMS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Speaker to confer with the Paymaster General and the Second Auditor of the Treasury as to the propriety of transferring all claims arising under the bounty bill of last July from the Paymaster General's office to that of the Second Auditor, and thereby facilitating the payment of said claims, with leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reception of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I wish merely to state that under the rules and regulations prescribed by the bounty act all claims for bounty are first sent to the Paymaster General and then referred to the Second Auditor. All the labor required in the examination of these claims is now performed in the Second Auditor's office, after which the cases are reported to the Paymaster General, who simply issues his check for the amount reported to be due. Thus the reference of the claims in the first instance to the Paymaster General operates simply to prevent the settlement of those claims at as early a period as would otherwise be possible. I believe that a conference by a committee of this House with these officers will result in suggesting a system which will obviate the complaints now made by the soldiers that they cannot get their bounty.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. PAINE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Certainly. Mr. PAINE. I shall vote for this resolution, unless by doing so I shall be regarded as committing myself to the idea that, by making the transfer proposed, the payment of these bounties will be expedited. I have carefully looked into this matter, and I am by no means satisfied that such will be the result. Hence I am unwilling to pledge myself indirectly, as I shall do by voting for this resolution, to the idea that this transfer will expedite the payment of bounties.

The fact is that the Second Auditor, who is, I am sure, very anxious to pay these bounties as rapidly as possible, who is devoted to the interests of the soldiers in this matter, informs me that he is only able to prepare the statements in five hundred cases each day. It will be seen at a glance that at this rate the payment of these bounties cannot be accomplished with such promptitude as to satisfy the soldiers of the country or the members of this House. The Second Auditor further informs me that the number of clerks now at work in that Department upon the rolls is as great as can be employed in his office upon those rolls.

Now, it seems to be almost impossible to expedite this matter by a simple transfer of duties from one office to another. These clerks cannot prepare more than five hundred cases in one day, whether the duties are discharged in the office of the Second Auditor or the papers are transferred to the pay department for final disposition. I hope the gentleman will strike out that latter clause.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I accept the gentleman's modification of my resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will add to his resolution a further inquiry as to how far the use of muster-rolls of the Army in the Adjutant General's Department can be made available in facilitating the adjustment of said bounty.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I agree to that as a modification of my resolution, and now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAIL SERVICE TO JAPAN AND CHINA.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution authorizing a modification and extension of the mail steamship service between the United States and China and Japan.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me a moment, I will state the necessity for this proposed legislation. We have now a monthly mail steamship service between San Francisco and Hong Kong, in China, via Yokohama, in Japan, with a branch service from Yokohama to Shanghai. The port of Osaka, the chief port of Japan, is to be opened to foreign trade on the 1st of January next, and this joint resolution will empower the Postmaster General to change the port of call from Yokohama to Osaka. Steamers bearing our flag are plying from Shanghai to and from the ports on the coast of China as far as Hong Kong, and the interests of the Government demand that postal should keep pace with our commercial interests. It will be observed that the resolution involves no additional expense to the Government. It simply authorizes the Postmaster General, in his discretion, to modify the line of route and practically multiply the termini of the western end of that branch of our Pacific mail steamship service. There can be no reasonable objection to the proposition, manifestly protecting and developing so important a part of our foreign postal relations, and I hope the resolution will at once be passed.

Mr. BROOKS. It seems to me that we ought to know whether this is to be done without expense to the steamship company. I do not think that the company will run any additional lines in Japan or China without an increase of pay.

Mr. FERRY. If the gentleman from New York had observed the phraseology of the resolution he would have discovered that it does not propose to increase the expense to the company at all. It merely permits the Postmaster General to change the port of call from Yokohama to Osaka when the latter port shall be thrown open to trade; and also to extend the mail service to the various ports along the coast of China, to and from which steamers under our flag now run. The routes under contract to the Pacific Steamship Company are in no wise essentially changed by the proposed modification, nor does it in any way increase the trips of this line of steamers, as will be seen by the language of the joint resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. Is it a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It can only be effected by a joint resolution.

Mr. BROOKS. It does not change the existing contract?

Mr. FERRY. It does not materially.

Mr. BROOKS. The existing law requires them to run from Yokohama to Shanghai.

Mr. FERRY. So I understand it. The only change in that respect is to make Osaka instead of Yokohama the port of call at Japan, which will not in any manner prejudice the terms of the existing contract. I would also state in this connection that application has already been made to the Government by those more immediately interested to cause this change to be made. Furthermore, the object of the resolution is to allow our mails to be carried from Shanghai to Hong Kong and the intermediate ports along the coast where steamers now run, and where there is now no authority of law to allow such service so essential to the necessities of the country.

Mr. BROOKS. We have a contract with that company, and I should like to know whether they are willing to make the change?

Mr. FERRY. I have already stated that it does not interfere with the contract with the company. And I may add that a moment's reflection will impress the House and the country with the vast importance of facilitating and rendering more efficient and useful that rapidly developing department of our foreign mail service.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON COTTON.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the great staple product of the southern States, cotton, is the only article of importance of regular export from the United States forming the great basis of exchange for the vast imports; and whereas the successful culture of cotton in those States involves the deepest interests of all sections of this nation; and whereas from the development to perfect success of the production of cotton in many foreign lands the price in the markets of the world is no longer controlled by the American crop, and hence is already at a low figure, with every prospect of still further reduction; and whereas it is clearly apparent that with the increased cost of the growth of cotton in this country under the new system of free labor it is impossible to profitably produce it subject to the present oppressive internal revenue tax of two and one half cents per pound, and since there is actual danger of the very general suspension of its cultivation after the present year: Therefore,

Resolved, &c. That so much of the acts of Congress known as the internal revenue laws as finally amended and approved March 2, 1867, as creates and provides for the assessment and collection of any tax on raw cotton be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. BENJAMIN objected.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to suspend the rules. I want to repeal the tax on cotton as the best thing we can do for the reconstruction of the South and the best thing we can do for our colored friends.

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. The party on the other side rule out all such things, and we have to submit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the last remark. He will explain the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have made no reflection on the Chair.

The SPEAKER. All business thus far today has been done by unanimous consent. No motion can be made to suspend the rules while another is pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. What I said was that the gentlemen on the opposite side are objecting to such useful legislation here, and we on this side cannot help it.

CANDIA.

Mr. BROMWELL, by unanimous consent, offered the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the people of the United States cannot look with indifference upon the struggles of any oppressed people contending for human rights against absolute power; and whereas the moral force of this Republic should in all cases be wielded for the encouragement and support of those in all parts of the world who strive for the security of human liberty, so far as their efforts may appear to be honorable, and just: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into and report to this House what action of this Government will best manifest the sympathy of our people for the heroic people of Candia and other communities subject to the Turkish empire, now engaged in a sanguinary conflict with the Ottoman Government, and in what way, consistent with our duties as a neutral and friendly Power, the good offices of this Government may be most successfully interposed to secure for said people of Candia the blessings of peace and an amelioration of their political condition.

CIRCUIT COURT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill directing the circuit court of the United States to be held at the city of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania. It is a matter of interest to the people of western Pennsylvania. It is a question whether the circuit judge can sit at Erie with the district judge, and it is important that some business should be done.

The bill was read.

Mr. JENCKES. I object.

ASSASSINATION COMMITTEE.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee for the investigation of the assassination of the President be, and is, authorized to conduct the investigation by such sub-committees as the committee may appoint, and at such places as may be convenient.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

REVENUE FRAUDS.

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House with the amount of money received in the different collection districts in the United States from the manufacture of distilled spirits for the several fiscal years since 1862, and for the separate quarters of the last fiscal year so far as received, together with the tax per gallon levied upon said article during said periods; and also a statement, so far as the returns will admit, of the expenditure on the part of the Government for prosecuting offenders against the law for manufacturing, storing, transporting, buying, and selling said articles. Also the number of gallons of said article seized by the agents of the Government, and the amount of money received for said confiscated spirits, and for fines imposed upon parties for violating the laws in said particulars.

Mr. SCHENCK. I want to understand the resolution before I object. Does it propose that the Secretary shall furnish this amount of money to the House, because it would be more than the mileage would come to? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I object to the resolution.

CONTROL OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now insist on my motion to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce a bill to restore the Bureau for Indian Affairs to the War Department.

The question was put; and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The bill was then read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when appointed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL SICKLES.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask leave to have read at the Clerk's desk, that it may appear in the Globe, the telegram that I send up.

No objection was made.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, July 18, 1867.

Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM, House of Representatives: Thanks for your handsome reply to EDWARDS. You may relieve his anxiety with the consoling information that my equipage has not cost him or his friends anything, said equipage being the cherished gift of my colleagues of the third Army corps.

D. E. SICKLES.

Mr. BINGHAM. All I ask is that that telegram shall appear in the published proceedings of the House.

THE PHONETIC SYSTEM.

Mr. NOELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor when appointed:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring), That the Commissioner of Education is instructed to report to Congress upon the feasibility and expediency of introducing the phonetic system of spelling into general use in the schools and its adoption in general literature; and in said report shall embody the main features of difference between the present system and the phonetic system, and that the report shall embody such information as shall impart a general knowledge of the system.

INVASION OF MEXICO.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to offer again a resolution offered yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SELYE] and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. If that committee—whose chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] I do not now see in his seat—design reporting the resolution to-day, I would not of course present it. But, presuming that, as the members of the committee have not been called together, it is not the intention to report the resolution to-day, nor probably before Congress adjourns, I ask consent to offer this resolution, that it may be acted on at once:

Whereas it is currently reported in the public press and otherwise that bodies of armed men are being organized in different parts of the country for the purpose of invading the territory of our neighboring republic of Mexico, in direct violation of the neutrality laws; and whereas all such attempts and purposes are also at variance with the wishes and feelings of all good citizens of the United States, and contrary to established public policy: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States, in case he shall be satisfied that such organizations exist, or are being formed, be respectfully requested to issue a proclamation requiring all proper officers of the United States to prevent such unlawful organizations being formed within the United States, warning all persons that whosoever shall depart from the United States, either individually or collectively, for the purpose of invading the republic of Mexico or any other country, or creating any disturbance therein, shall forfeit all rights to protection under the laws of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. I trust that my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] will not consider me discourteous in objecting to the introduction of this resolution. There are serious objections to it, and I would like to debate it.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, sir, I wish to say—

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] objects to its introduction.

Mr. LOGAN. I am aware of that; but I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Before the gentleman discusses the question I hope the committee may have time to consider the subject. I would rather not have any hasty action on this question.

Mr. LOGAN. I will modify the resolution, so as to apply only to the republic of Mexico, if that will be satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON. I prefer that the subject should be considered by the committee. I think it quite likely that we shall have a meeting before Congress adjourns.

Mr. LOGAN. As the gentleman is one of the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I will ask him whether the members of the committee have been called together?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman to state what prospect or probability there is that the committee will meet for the purpose of considering this question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am sorry that the chairman of the committee has just been called out of the House. I cannot give the gentleman a positive answer.

Mr. LOGAN. I mean no reflection at all upon the committee, but I regard this as a question that does not require the consideration of a committee. It is a question of the infringement of the rights of a nation with which we are on friendly terms; it is a question of law, and the execution of the law by the President of the United States. It is a question that this House can consider without a reference to any committee. I will state to the House that I am satisfied from evidence worthy of belief that there is to-day an organization in this country formed with the intention of invading the republic of Mexico and overthrowing its government.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a point of order, that the resolution is not before the House, and therefore is not open to debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LOGAN. I knew that I was probably trespassing upon the patience of gentlemen who object to the resolution, though perhaps not upon the patience of the House. I will move that the rules be suspended to allow the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not like to persist in the objection, and I withdraw it. I am willing to leave the question entirely to the House.

Mr. LOGAN. I now modify the resolution by striking out after the words "republic of Mexico" the words "or any other country."

There being no objection, the preamble and resolution, as modified, were considered and adopted.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIMON STEVENS.

Mr. PILE. I ask unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution to the effect that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to suspend the payment of the judgment of the Court of Claims for $58,000 in favor of Simon Stevens, for payment of his alleged claim against the Government of the United States for the purchase of Hall's carbines by order of John C. Frémont, until further action by Congress.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was read a first and second time. It was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PILE demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I should like to have some reason for this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been seconded.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered. Let us have some statement to go upon the Journal for invading the jurisdiction of this court.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The motion was disagreed to.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOUTHERN SWAMP LAND GRANTS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to inform this House through the Freedmen's Bureau or the military commanders of their proper districts what quantity of swamp lands heretofore granted to the States lately in rebellion yet remain undisposed of by said States.

IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. BROOMALL obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. ROSS, who asked unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report to this House at its present session the testimony taken by them upon the subject of impeaching the President of the United States, with a view of having the same published and laid before the country.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object.

Mr. ROSS. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS. I will offer it again.

MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the proceedings of a public meeting held in Choctaw county in the late State of Mississippi, which came to me accompanied by the request to present them to the House. I therefore move to suspend the rules for the purpose of having these proceedings read and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction; also for the purpose of having them published in the Congressional Globe.

Mr. BROOKS. The Congressional Globe is so big now that nobody reads it.

Mr. BROOMALL. It is a petition to this body that the civil government of that State be set aside and the military government be allowed authority to protect the citizens there. I ask a division on the motion to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 29; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BROOMALL and Mr. BROOKS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 16.

So the rules were suspended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPRING VALLEY, CHOCTAW COUNTY, July 4, 1867.

After a celebration in which we raised the old United States flag, and had several speeches indorsing Congress, a convention was called, and Mr. G. H. Holland was called to the chair, and Mr. G. W. Dudley was elected secretary. The following resolutions were read and unanimously adopted:

Whereas the position of the loyal citizens of the late rebel States has been a theme of misrepresentation among the enemies of the Government; and whereas we consider that justice to ourselves demands an honest avowal of the principles which really actuate our party: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we consider the course pursued by the rebel party, lately dominant here, and even now making desperate efforts to regain their former ascendancy as likely to cause southern men, irrespective of their real sentiments, to be regarded with suspicion and distrust.

Resolved, That we, the loyal citizens of the State of Mississippi, disclaim all connection or sympathy with any party or persons advocating or professing sentiments unfriendly to the legislative branch of the United States Government.

Resolved, That we heartily and unhesitatingly denounce the policy of President Johnson, considering it detrimental to the cause of liberty and the Union, and as exercising a baneful influence upon the attempts of the loyal and law-abiding citizens of both sections to destroy the political prejudices and restore harmony and unanimity of sentiment.

Resolved, That we consider that the present civil authority in this State, wielded in a majority of cases by persons at enmity with the Union Government, is not calculated to protect the lives, liberties, and property of the loyal citizens thereof.

Resolved, That we desire the United States Government to enforce the military government in this State, making it efficient in giving aid and comfort to the friends of the Government, and discourage all attempts at treason and rebellion; and we hereby pledge our fortunes and our lives, if necessary, in assisting in its enforcement.

Resolved, That we hereby ask Congress to relieve us of the present enormous and uncalled for rebel

State and county tax, and that we pay but one tax and that a loyal one.

And resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Congress of the United States of America.

G. H. HOLLAND, Chairman.
G. W. DUDLEY, Secretary.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. The motion was agreed to.

REAR ADMIRAL GOLDSBOROUGH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in reply to a call for information relative to the case of Rear Admiral L. M. Goldsborough; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

METROPOLITAN REVENUE BOARD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, in reply to a resolution of the House asking for information in regard to the Metropolitan Revenue Board; which was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 18, 1867.

SIR: To the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, requiring information concerning a commission organized by this Department in the city of New York, and styled "the Metropolitan Revenue Board," I have the honor to reply that a board was established there under that designation by this Department on the 21st ultimo, the powers and duties of which are best defined by reference to the order creating it, which is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 21, 1867.

For the purpose of aiding the Internal Revenue Bureau in the prevention, detection, and punishment of fraud upon the internal revenue, and with a view to a more stringent enforcement of the law, Isaac E. Messmore, Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue; H. H. Van Dyck, Assistant Treasurer at New York; Samuel G. Courtney, United States Attorney southern district of New York; A. Q. Keesbey, United States Attorney for the district of New Jersey, and B. F. Tracy, United States Attorney for the eastern district of New York, are hereby with their consent constituted a board to be known as the Metropolitan Revenue Board.

All revenue inspectors, revenue agents, general inspectors of spirits, and special agents of the Treasury Department in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and thirty-second districts of New York, and the third, fourth, and fifth districts of New Jersey, will immediately report to said board for duty, and will hereafter act under the direction of said board.

Such revenue officers as may be designated by said board will be specially authorized by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make seizures within said districts, and are hereby required to report all seizures immediately to the said board, and also to the collector of the district in which any seizures are made, and all special authority heretofore conferred on any officer to seize property within the said districts, or either of them, is hereby revoked.

Immediately upon the seizure or detention of any property within said districts the said board will investigate the causes thereof. If in the opinion of said board the property so seized is not liable to forfeiture, or for any sufficient reason ought not to be held for forfeiture, if the value thereof does not exceed $3,000, the said board is hereby authorized to direct the seizing officer to release the same.

If the value thereof is over $3,000, and in the opinion of the board the same should be released, the facts of the case, together with the opinion of the board thereon, will be reported to the Commissioner for his action.

Hereafter no collector in said districts will approve any distiller's bond, or bond for bonded warehouse, or bond for transportation or rectification, redistillation, or change of package of any spirits, or tobacco manufacturer's bond, until after the same shall have been transmitted to said board for investigation and report as to the responsibility of the sureties thereto. The collector or assessor will not consider himself in any manner released by the creation of said board from the performance of any of the duties imposed on him by law or regulation.

Said board shall have the power, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to make all necessary rules and regulations for the transaction of its business and the execution of the powers hereby or hereafter conferred.

H. McCULLOCH, Secretary.

E. A. ROLLINS, Commissioner.

It will be observed that the duties devolved upon the commission are chiefly advisory. The authority for creating it is found in the general scope and spirit of the internal revenue laws, which clothe the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with power to enforce them by the use of such means as to them may seem to be judicious, not inconsistent with the provisions of these laws.

It is a matter of public notoriety and of painful interest to those who are cheerfully bearing their portion of the public burdens that the internal revenue laws in regard to distilled spirits have been shamefully violated and set at naught throughout the country, and especially in the city of New York.

The Department has used every exertion through the ordinary instrumentalities to correct this evil, but without success. Officers have been not only inefficient in the discharge of their duties, but in many cases they have been suspected of direct complicity with dishonest men to defraud the Government.

Satisfied that the means heretofore employed for the purpose were insufficient to suppress fraud and to expose and bring to punishment dishonest officers, and convinced that a faithful enforcement of the laws in the city of New York is necessary to secure the collection of the tax upon distilled liquors throughout the country, and of vital importance to the welfare of the entire public service, I felt it my duty to exercise in a special manner the supervisory powers conferred upon me by law. The course that has been taken in creating the commission referred to is believed to be strictly within the limits of those powers; and so confident are both myself and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that good results will be attained by it that, unless Congress shall disapprove of our action, measures will be taken to organize similar commissions in other cities in which the Government is largely defrauded of its revenues.

The board in New York has been so recently instituted that the advantages to be derived from it cannot now be properly estimated; but it is believed that in consequence of its labors the removal of spirits on fraudulent bonds has ceased, and illicit distillation largely decreased. The violence with which it has been assailed by some who, to say the least, do not favor an honest execution of the law, affords encouraging evidence that it is a movement in the right direction, and that distillers may yet be compelled to bear with others their portion of the burdens of the public debt.

In conclusion, it is proper for me to remark that the board in New York was created with the concurrence and advice of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose untiring efforts to enforce the law against the powerful interests which have been combined to evade and violate it, merit the thanks of every honest tax-payer in the country.

Inclosed will be found copies of all documents and correspondence relating to this board that are of record or on file in this Department or its bureaus.

Very respectfully,

HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will move to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed, and that it be printed. Before making that motion, however, I desire to say that the resolution I introduced the other day, which has resulted in bringing from the Department this information in reply, was offered because I had received a great number of communications, not, as the Secretary seems to suppose, from parties in the whisky interest, but from persons directly or indirectly connected with the revenue service itself, criticising the establishment of this board, and expressing not merely doubt as to whether it would result in anything good, but also an apprehension that it already foreshadowed evil in the establishment of a strong and controlling outside power in the city of New York over a great number of revenue districts, and that this power would be likely to be abused so as to result in positive evil to the Government in aiding corruption rather than preventing it.

Now, I do not for one moment pretend to think, much less to say, that the motives of the Secretary and of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue were not perfectly good, and just such as they have detailed to the House, in the establishment of this board. But notwithstanding their explanation, which upon its face I admit seems to be in a good degree satisfactory to myself, I can most clearly perceive that there is an extraordinary power vested in an extra-legal body in the city of New York, to be followed up by similar experiments, as I understand, elsewhere. There at that great commercial city and in that great commercial center from which the Government derives a large proportion of its revenue, is established a board not contemplated by law, which is to exercise something more even than a supervisory or advisory power over ten districts in the State of New York and three in the State of New Jersey. All the officials in those districts connected with the collection of the revenue are required to report to this board for instructions, for advice, and for direction. We know how much mischief ensues from that necessarily large power vested in the United States officers in a single district to make seizures, to make adjustments, to call into requisition and appliance all that very forcible legislation which we have found it necessary to resort to in order to compel the honest and faithful collection of the revenues of the country. But here is a board which is to exercise that extraordinary power over thirteen districts, and that, too, without one particle of legislation on the subject authorizing this substitution of such a power in place of that of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or in place of the Treasury Department.

Now, though it may be a good experiment, though it may be that the law ought to have provided some such boards as this, one thing is very certain, and that is the law has not provided anything of the kind. I think, therefore, this whole subject ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means. Let that committee report whether it is proper that the laws should be so amended as to give this extraordinary power to any commission whatever. I move that the communication be referred to that committee when appointed, and printed.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words, partially in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] with reference to the organization of this board. If the gentleman has listened attentively to the reading of the instructions given to this board by the Secretary of the Treasury he will have observed that the main object of its appointment was to control and direct the seizures in the State of New York and in three districts in the State of New Jersey. Now, I submit to him and to the consideration of this House that there could be no better agents selected to supervise the seizure of property under the internal revenue laws than the precise parties selected by the Secretary of the Treasury in this instance. The chairman of the board is the deputy commissioner of internal revenue. Three other members of the board are district attorneys of the United States, who have the control of seizures in the courts of the United States and who must from necessity have the prosecution of all proceedings in the courts in reference to these seizures. The other member of the board is the United States Treasurer, Mr. Van Dyck. With the exception of Mr. Van Dyck, all the members of the board selected by the Secretary of the Treasury are men whose duty it is under the law to supervise these seizure and control and direct them.

I believe for myself that this arrangement will work advantageously to the Treasury of the United States. It had become notorious in the city of New York that there were men making seizures there and the next day making releases, and all sorts of corruptions were indulged in by officers of the United States.

Now, it may be that these three district attorneys, the Assistant Treasurer at New York, and the deputy commissioners of internal revenue can all be subsidized by these men who are defrauding the Government in the city of New York. For one I do not believe it, and I do think that it was a wise proceeding on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide this board, which I believe he had the power to do under the existing law, and if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has observed the instructions given by the Secretary of the Treasury he will see that this board has no power except what is individually given by law to four members of the board. Therefore they cannot in any manner violate the law or exercise any powers not given to them under the law.

It seems to me, therefore, that the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to be censured by the House for selecting this board, and giving them the authority that he has given them in the city of New York. His object being, if there is a possibility of doing it, to break up the enormous frauds on the revenue committed there, amounting to millions of dollars, that must be replaced by the honest tax-payers of the country. I for one give him credit for it, and hope that at least now we will not interfere with this experiment of the Secretary in the right direction.

Mr. SCHENCK. It becomes necessary that I should say a word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] who is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means. Perhaps there is not any great difference of opinion between that gentleman and myself except upon one or two points. I understand this board to have been established with the contemplation of like boards in other places hereafter if the experiment shall be successful, with a view to supervising, watching, and preventing as far as practicable the corruption prevailing among the officers and employes of the Government.

Well, I do not know that a more wholesome duty could be imposed upon anybody. Heaven knows that there has been enough of rascality practiced in this country by those who are making whisky and selling whisky, and still more by those who are speculating in whisky; but I doubt very much whether one tenth part of their rascality would ever have existed if they had not had an opportunity of perpetrating it in collusion with the rascals employed by the Government, who have helped and winked at the perpetration of these frauds. That being the case, I do not intend to say that something should not be done to watch those whom the Government employs as well as to watch those from whom we desire to raise revenue. But the whole argument of the gentleman from Iowa, it seems to me, goes to the proposition that there ought to be some board of this kind provided; that this is the kind of board for which the law should provide. It is true he goes a little further toward the close of his argument, and insists with the Secretary that there is authority for the establishment of the board to be found in some intangible form somewhere within the general provisions of the law regulating the collection of revenue. The most that the Secretary says is, that he claims to exercise the power under the "general tenor" of that law. It is not usual to establish boards with extraordinary and very large powers under the "general tenor" of a law, vaguely implied, with no specific provision in the law creating such boards or authorizing the officers to perform specific duties. And my complaint is that here is a purely extra-legal commission created with powers almost equal to those of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or even the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as this subject is concerned.

The Secretary, it is true, says that this board is to exercise advisory supervision, or advisory powers; but he qualifies this by saying that its powers are for the most part advisory, admitting that there are some substantial, actual, real powers to be exercised beyond the mere giving of advice. Any gentleman who will read the order creating the board will see at once, as I said before, that all the officials of thirteen districts in the most populous part of the United States of America are to report to that board for their instructions; are to report to that board to ascertain what they are to do; are to be subjected to the decisions of that board in relation to seizures or anything else in the enforcement of the revenue laws.

I say again that this is most extraordinary power, not given anywhere by any specific provision of law; and that this Congress, jealous of its right to legislate for the country, ought not to look lightly upon an attempt on the part of any branch of the Government to assume large legislative powers of this kind; to create boards unknown to the law and to invest them with extraordinary and extensive powers such as are permitted to this board now under consideration.

The gentleman from Iowa argues that the Secretary has selected just the right kind of persons for his board—the Assistant Treasurer and the district attorneys—one in Brooklyn, one in New York, and one on the Jersey side of the river, associated perhaps with some other persons. Now, sir, all this is but an argument in favor of the thing itself; it does not touch the question whether the law authorizes that thing. But, sir, one word upon this point. Are district attorneys the very best men in the world to advise and direct seizures in all cases? Everything that these district attorneys do may be done, the Secretary claims, very properly, because they are trusted officers of the law, charged with the supervision of the enforcement of that law, and therefore they are proper persons to be selected for the duty. But then, it must be remembered—and I say this not with reference to any particular individual among these men; I say it with reference to the principle involved—it must be remembered that as everybody knows the more seizures these officers can make the more fish they drag to their nets. In their Pickwickian character as members of this board outside of the law, they are to do those things which shall increase their fees as district attorneys; so that although their pay as members of the board may be directly nothing, they may, acting in that capacity, increase very largely their compensation by driving fees into their offices through the course which they pursue as members of the board. I repeat, sir, I do not charge that they are doing this; I know nothing about it; but I say that such a board is capable of being thus perverted, and it is right that the law-making power should take under its supervision this whole subject, consider the pros and cons, and determine whether in connection with the enforcement of our revenue laws we require such boards to be established. If they are to be established they ought to be established by law.

In the unsettled condition of the country arising out of the war, and the large extension from necessity of powers in various new directions, there is far too great a tendency, as we all know, to departmental legislation. And when there is a glaring instance of it, as I conceive there is in this case, I submit with due deference to the opinions and motives of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the law-making power ought to be a little jealous of its privileges and rights, and should see that Secretaries of the Treasury do not make the law instead of confining themselves, as they ought to do, to its enforcement.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, a good many of the remarks which have been made have been such as to relieve me from going over the ground I intended, and hence I have not as much to say as if I had obtained the floor at first.

I believe that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is to refer to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee, I understand, is not to be appointed until some time next session. This investigation will then, if that motion be carried, be postponed till then. I offered a resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Rules a few days since, to raise a standing committee on this subject of internal revenue. It is a subject much greater, requiring more time, of more importance, covering a greater field than those referred to all the committees of the House of Representatives some ten or fifteen years ago. There are more things to be taken care of by a committee on internal revenue, pertaining to the collection of internal revenue, than in the whole business here some years ago; and I trust, therefore, that the Committee on the Rules will recommend the creation of a standing committee on that most important subject. If, however, the gentleman insists the investigation shall be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, I ask that the House shall direct the Speaker to appoint that committee immediately, so that the work may be begun at once. If the Committee on Internal Revenue be created, let that committee also be at once appointed. I will now move, if it be in order, that it be referred to such a committee as the Speaker of this House will appoint to take into immediate consideration the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury and all the matters involved in the internal revenue, including the detective system to which my resolution referred. If this be done at once, and report made to this House, I am confident it will result in saving to the Government vast sums of money, as well as much future trouble in reference to all these matters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to refer to a select committee, but the motion to refer to a standing committee has the priority.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was for the purpose of referring it to a select committee that I have risen. I move that it be referred to a select committee of five, or any other number as may be desired; that they shall consider everything relating to this subject and report by bill or otherwise. I again say that I do not wish to be made the chairman of that committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to refer the subject to the joint Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman moves that as a substitute for the select committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the serious attention of the House to my proposition.

Mr. ROSS. Has the Committee on Retrenchment been appointed?

The SPEAKER. It has, and is now transacting business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, a sufficient justification of the benefit of this commission appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury is to be found in the fact that since they assumed control in those respective districts the price of distilled spirits in the United States has advanced at least forty cents per gallon.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That will break down the Democratic party.

Mr. BARNES. Now, sir, anything which will give the revenues derived from the immense manufacture of this article of spirits in the United States to the people and the Government for the purpose of paying our debts and relieving us from taxation, instead of turning it into the pockets of those who are speculating upon the necessities and misfortunes of the Government, must be regarded as of the greatest benefit. The advantages which will result from the enforcement of the law will amount to millions of dollars. It is patent to every man in this House that as the duties have been increased upon spirits the revenue therefrom has decreased. I hear, sir, from what I understand to be good authority, that the revenue for the present fiscal year from distilled spirits at two dollars a gallon will not amount to more than $20,000,000, whereas at a much less price it amounted last year to a good deal more than that. Taking into consideration the large tax upon the Department, due to the fact of the vast numbers of subordinates of the Government employed for the purpose of attending to the detection of illegal distillation of this article, the amount seized and then released without any returns, added to the falling off in receipts, almost obliterates all revenue from this prolific source.

For the purpose of ascertaining what net revenue the Government derives from the distillation of spirits in the United States, I offered a resolution of inquiry this morning, knowing that it would require some time to get the information, and not expecting to receive it till next session. When Congress convenes in December all matters pertinent to the revenue will necessarily be investigated. The information here sought is a part of what is necessary upon which to form an opinion as to what should be the basis of a bill with reference to the amount of tax to be placed on this article and the manner of its collection.

I have it in my power now to say to this House, that under the old regime just before the appointment of this revenue board one lot of spirits which was seized in my district was released upon the payment by the manufacturer of $1,200. On the same day the same lot of spirits was again seized by another officer from another district and was again released upon the payment of $1,600. A day or two afterward it was again seized by a third officer, and was again released upon the payment of $2,200. Now, I desire to know, and I intend if possible that this House shall know, where that $1,200, $1,600, and $2,200, which the Government agents received to my knowledge, went. Whether the Government itself received the money, or whether it went to private and illegitimate account I do not pretend to know, but I do know the facts I have stated, and I undertake to say that most of the gentlemen residing in commercial districts are aware of the fact that this is but an example of the manner in which the revenues of the country are frittered away that should be derived from this most important article.

I believe there has been manufactured in the United States within the last year two hundred million gallons of spirits, while I believe the natural demand for consumption was little more than one hundred million gallons. The inducement to an excess of manufacture is found in the want of enforcement of the revenue law. It makes no difference what kind of restriction Congress may put on the business the law will be violated. As the law now stands it offers especial inducements to evade it.

I see at this time, so near the close of this session, no more beneficial way on the part of the Government than to allow the commission as it now exists the privilege of exercising the jurisdiction it has been allowed to assume under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

One word more. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who objected to the resolution of inquiry which I this morning offered, has withdrawn his objection, and I desire to have the resolution again reported to the House and passed.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the resolution of the gentleman from New York will be considered as adopted. The Chair hears none, and it is adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to withdraw my motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I differ with the gentleman from Ohio as to the effect of the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. It would seem that the creation of this board was merely as an advisory one, and it certainly will go forth to the country as a strange spectacle that in the American Congress there should be any objection urged to any measure leading to the correction of the revenue laws, or rather to prevent the damage which is done to the country by the violation of the law.

Now, it is a well-known fact that millions upon millions of dollars are taken from this Government by those who are defrauding it, by not paying the tax on whisky and tobacco. The newspapers have been full of charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, and of inquiries why he has not done something to correct these abuses. He has sought to do something in the way of correction by calling together public officers, sworn officers of the law, three or four district attorneys, whose duty it is to examine such cases, to report upon them and to recommend when seizures should be made. With this board is connected a deputy commissioner, who has power to make seizures, as was before done by the collector and assessor of each district. Heretofore these assessors and collectors could seize and could release as they chose. No power is taken from them by this action of the Secretary. Everybody in New York city knew that there were scores of distilleries costing from twenty-five to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and employing from five to twenty-five men each, making reports to the assessors and collectors of from one to three barrels of liquor distilled per month. Every one knew that it was a fraud except the collectors and assessors. Something must be done. The Secretary said to these men, the deputy commissioner of internal revenue and the three district attorneys, "With your consent I will call upon you to act as a board to see to the execution of this law." What powers were they clothed with? Not to make seizures, but to advise when seizures should be made. The collectors in these districts are not relieved from their duty.

Another thing: under the law as it now stands liquors placed in bond may be taken out for distillation and for other purposes upon bonds. Now, it is well known that hundreds of thousands of worthless bonds are lying in the offices of the district attorneys and revenue offices in New York city. Six hundred thousand dollars of such bonds were taken in one office in the State of New York in six months. The sureties on the bonds were not known, and the records did not show where the liquors had gone at all. In another collector's office there were $60,000 of these bonds, and in another $80,000. Now, no man would suffer $60,000 of his own property to rest upon security about which he knows nothing.

Sir, these frauds upon the revenue are committed, not so much by illicit distillation—that is a mere bagatelle—as by the open and legalized distillers, who return not a tenth part of the liquor distilled, and that known to the officers of the Government, whose duty it is to protect the Government but who are particeps criminis in these frauds.

I hope the House will stand by the Secretary of the Treasury in this matter for the purpose of saving the Government and gathering into the Treasury that which properly belongs there. I therefore move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. That motion cannot be made now, as I certainly did not yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Then I will make the motion at the proper time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I must be permitted to say with all due deference, that gentlemen have not talked exactly about the case before us. There is a great talk about advisory power, but there is a great deal more than advisory power exercised here. From the papers connected with this matter, I find this board sitting as a board resolving what seizures shall be made, how it shall be done, and under what circumstances.

Now, my objection is this: every collector and assessor has to give a bond, and you propose to put this whole matter into the hands of men who have given no bonds at all, and you prefer to substitute for the judgment of assessors and collectors and other revenue officers the decisions of this board, who are not under bonds, when seizures shall be made and when not made, and how the revenue shall be collected and how not. If the gentleman will look at the papers he will find the exercise of a good deal more than advisory power. How does the system work practically? Here is a collector who is charged by your laws with the performance of certain duties. He is a rascal not to be trusted. Here is another of the same sort, and another who has obtained his office because he swung round the circle and showed his devotion to bread and butter as a wholesome article of diet.

Instead of turning out such men, instead of putting in these positions pure and honest men, the Secretary keeps in office his brood of rascals, and then selects a board to supervise and watch them, that board not being provided for by law nor responsible under any bond for that which they decide to do.

How does the system work practically? One of these men, suspected of rascality or strictly honest, no matter which, is by law authorized to perform certain duties. Associated with him as members of a board are three or four other officers who have by law no such right to exercise specific duties. The members of this board vote upon a subject, and the three who do not possess power under the law vote down the one who by law is endowed with power. And then they act, not as a board, but in his name. Why, sir, if I am not misinformed, the deputy commissioner himself has been more or less disgusted with the course pursued by this board.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN WYCK] says that no one except those who sympathize with these robberies will make objection to this board. With due deference to the gentleman, let me say that I sympathize as little with these rascalities as any New Yorker upon the face of the earth.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said that I thought no one outside of Congress would object to this board, except such men as I spoke of.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, sir, I have received my information from men as honest as the gentleman from New York or myself or anybody else. Whether they be right or wrong, they give me facts. I could detail some of these. Take, for instance, one illustration of the workings of this system. I am informed—perhaps the gentleman knows whether the statement is true or not—that already one of these favored district attorneys has succeeded in getting a brother, a brother-in-law, and a nephew appointed as subordinates to this board to assist in carrying on this business. It is said that one of these three relatives, having been extremely poor, has within a few weeks become a man of considerable means. I do not vouch for this statement, but this is the information given to me, with names and facts, by good men, men in no way connected with these whisky frauds.

What is the proposition which I submit to the House? Simply to print this communication and refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means. In voting for this motion, it will be my expectation that the committee will look into the subject and report at as early a day as possible whether the law needs amendment so as to provide for the establishment of boards of this kind. And I call the attention of the House to the fact that the very disclosures made by gentlemen in their arguments upon this matter show that there has been a wheel within a wheel, a revenue system within a revenue system, established by the creation of a board utterly unknown to any statutory provision. If this House has respect for itself or for the laws of the country, it will not, I think, submit to have the power of the legislative department taken away, bit by bit, until the Executive Departments shall do just what they please in regard to matters of this kind.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to read the law under which, as I understand, this commission has been appointed?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand that the provision under which the power to appoint this commission is claimed—and I submit to the House that it is sufficient authority—is contained in a clause of section fifteen of the internal revenue act of March 2, 1867. It is in these words:

"And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to adopt, procure, and prescribe for use such hydrometers, weighing and gauging instruments, meters, or other means for ascertaining the strength and quantity of spirits subject to tax, or for the prevention or detection of frauds by distillers of spirits, and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to insure a uniform and correct system of inspection, weighing and gauging of spirits subject to tax throughout the United States."

Mr. SCHENCK. I have heard the law. I do not believe that these men are either meters or hydrometers.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not called them either. They are among "the other means" of preventing fraud.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then there must be other means under the rules established by the Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, there is a transfer of all power of legislation even to the extent of creating offices, a transfer from this branch of the legislative department of the Government to that at the other end of the avenue. It is a most latitudinarian construction of the law. It beats the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution all hollow in the way in which it is administered.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from Illinois represents more whisky than anybody else. Peoria is full of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the gentleman, then, will yield to me so I may say a word in reference to an interest which he declares I represent so largely.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is expected, should the House adopt his suggestion and refer this communication of the Secretary of the Treasury to any committee, that of itself will suspend the present powers of the Secretary of the Treasury? Would that control him till further action is taken by the House? What is the object of bringing the House to a vote now? Does it suspend the powers claimed and exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, or does it leave him to exercise them until the existing law shall have been amended?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have made no motion on that subject. I have brought this information before the House, and moved that it be referred to our proper organ—the Committee of Ways and Means. I have not myself proposed to do anything further than that. Whether any one else will or not it is not for me to say, but it will be for the Secretary, under the previous act of Congress, to say whether he is exercising doubtful powers and will continue to do so in the face of what may be done by Congress.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, before the House takes any action which will curtail the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury and throw any obstacle in the way of collecting the revenue on this article, I hope it will have full and complete information; for otherwise, instead of mending matters it will make them worse.

Now, sir, in my district there are a great many distilleries. In Chicago there are nearly as many more. In Dubuque there are several. In Cincinnati there are about as many more. In Lawrenceburg, Indiana, about as many more. This great interest, therefore, does not center in New York. The West manufactures more whisky when the frauds of distilleries can be checked than the East, put it all together. There was a time, sir, when twenty distilleries were running in the city of Peoria, paying $100,000 a day into the United States Treasury; but there is not one running to-day. Such is my information. The frauds in New York have put it beyond the power of the honest distillers of the West to make a single gallon. And the gentleman's own district of Ohio, the Dayton district, has some distilleries. They cannot run now. Why? Because the city of New York has made such an enormous amount of illicit whisky. This great western interest is now paralyzed. That is the evidence before the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury. They have pursued the illicit traffickers until they have found that New York is the great source and center of corruption and fraud, and now hope and expect that by the establishment of this board they can stop it. It is anticipated if they succeed that that branch of industry will be revived in the West and throughout the country, and that the revenues of the Government will be immensely increased.

Now, sir, I hope there will be no action taken by the House which will take from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue this power, rightfully and honestly exercised by them, in my opinion, under the law as it now stands.

If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] can convince me that the action he proposes will invigorate the industries of the West or any other part of the country I will go with him; but I cannot consent to go haphazard and interfere with the action of the Secretary and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in this important matter.

What we want is an honest administration of the revenue law. We want to put down illicit distillation. As long as the Government recognizes the manufacture of whisky as legitimate it should be our object to protect the honest manufacturer everywhere and pursue with relentless vigor every fraudulent dealer or manufacturer. I believe the Secretary of the Treasury is endeavoring to do that, and I am opposed to hampering him by any interference of ours at this time.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether the Secretary was engaged in that endeavor when he removed all the assessors and collectors of experience and tried integrity, and put in their places fellows without experience or character, political or moral?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am not aware that the Secretary "removed all the assessors and collectors of experience and tried integrity, and put in their places fellows without experience or character, political or moral." I have no sympathy with the Secretary of the Treasury politically, but so far as the practical administration of the revenue law is concerned I have seen no evidence of maladministration or corruption on the part of the Secretary or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. KELLEY. Did the gentleman ever hear of an honest, experienced officer being turned out to put in a bread-and-butter man of known bad character? If he did not he is the only member of this House that is ignorant of the reported occurrence of such a thing. This, in my judgment, was part of the Secretary's practical administration of the affairs of the Revenue Bureau.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have never heard of the case the gentleman presents. We have suffered some in our part of the country by the removal of officers, I admit. There was an excellent assessor removed in my district; but I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury had anything to do with it. I believe the President of the United States, on his own motion, directed the removal and the appointment of another man, against whom, however, I never heard one word, so far as his integrity and honesty were concerned.

Mr. SCHENCK. What member of the Cabinet, when serenaded, made a speech entirely indorsing the President and all his policy, and so demeaned himself as to make a dirty, blackguard attack upon the legislative department of the Government? Who was it but the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman has answered his own question. I did not indorse that speech, and it has nothing to do with the question before the House.

Mr. KELLEY. He also denounced the gentleman from Illinois himself as "a tinker." [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, sir, I admit that I was one of the one hundred and fifty members of Congress denounced as "Constitution tinkers" by the Secretary. But what has that to do with the collection of the revenue?

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order. Is there any rule of the House to prevent gentlemen from making blackguards of themselves on this floor? If so I would like to have it read. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If the point of order had been made when any words were spoken the Chair would have ruled upon it. It is made too late.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is no propriety in referring at this time to that speech. It was an impromptu affair, and I do not believe the Secretary himself would now indorse it. I do not indorse it by any means when I say I believe he is honestly endeavoring to do the best he can to suppress the illicit manufacture of whisky. Neither do I believe him to be a dishonest man because he made that speech.

Mr. KELLEY. I will say this, that he has so mismanaged the Treasury and the internal revenue department that the distillers in my district, from whom the Government does not get $10,000 a month, would regard it as a matter of economy to put up United States bonds as security for the payment daily, weekly, or monthly to the Government of $120,000 per month tax upon the capacity of their stills, if the leeches of the revenue department were taken off from them. They wish to be honest, but the agents of the Government keep whisky below two dollars per gallon in the market and will not let them give the Treasury its dues. This is equally true of other districts.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So it may be said with regard to many other districts. The Peoria distillers would willingly give $1,000,000 per month if they would be allowed to run their distilleries up to their full capacity. There is nothing whatever in this statement of the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. Can you keep down speculation and fraud by turning honest and experienced men out of office and substituting those that neither political party is willing to acknowledge and much less to indorse?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of course you cannot. But this has nothing to do with the question before us. I do not want honest men turned out; I want honest men kept in office. If all men were honest the question would be of easy solution. But the fact is you have as many illicit distillers, in proportion to the number engaged in that business, in your city as in any other, and in my opinion a similar board ought to be established there to protect the revenue. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue agrees with the Secretary in the necessity of establishing this board, and I have much confidence in his judgment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that he has but four minutes remaining of his time.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will yield to me to complete my sentence. I gave notice to the Secretary from the floor that he was then entering upon a career that would cost the Government $50,000,000. It has cost the Government sixty or eighty million dollars on distilled spirits alone.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What career does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. KELLEY. The career of turning out all the experienced and trusty men in the several revenue districts, and selecting their successors from those whom neither party will recognize, who have no principles that attach them to any party or constrain them to obey any code, but who are ready to follow any flag that opens an avenue to plunder.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I must say here that it is lamentable that no man can rise here and defend the action of any man who does not agree with us in politics unless he is at once assailed as sympathizing with him politically. I have heard too much of this. It is not right or just. Where the Secretary puts a man out of office on political grounds I oppose him. But when I agree with the Secretary in matters of finance, or in the administration of the revenue system, I do not wish it to be understood that I sympathize with him in his political opinions or indorse them.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let us end this matter. I wish it understood that it is not anybody's fault but that of the Secretary of the Treasury that he has such persons in office, and if the gentleman will read these letters he will see by the confession of Mr. Van Wyck that his subordinates are a set of rascals in his own opinion.

Mr. ROSS. I would ask the gentleman how they came to be confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know. They have confirmed a great many rascals that I would have had nothing to do with.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move that the communication be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the motion to lay on the table does not prevail, will not the motion to refer to a select committee have precedence?

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to a standing committee will have precedence.

The question was put on Mr. VAN WYCK's motion, and there were—ayes 68, nays 37.

Mr. BENJAMIN called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. VAN WYCK was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT OF ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House a document which has been sent to him for presentation to the House. To avoid the necessity of reading it, the Chair will state that it is a protest by one Senator and four Representatives, claiming to be members of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, against being prohibited from meeting in their official capacity by the military authority which now prevails in that State under the reconstruction law. These gentlemen met and inquired of the military authorities whether they should be permitted to exercise the privilege of adjourning from day to day, and compelling the attendance of absent members. The military officer commanding told them that under the order of General Ord the Legislature could not meet. These gentlemen have sent to the Chair their protest. It is for the House to determine what shall be done with it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BOYER. Is it too late to ask for the reading of the paper?

The SPEAKER. The Chair submitted to the House the question of the disposition of the paper, and he thinks it is too late now to have it read except by a suspension of the rules or unanimous consent. Is there objection to the reading of the paper?

Several members objected.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We did not understand the proposition of the Chair as he has just stated it. We understood him to say that before the reading of the paper he would state its contents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made an abridged statement of the contents of the paper for the purpose of dispensing with the necessity of reading it, supposing, of course, that any gentleman who desired the paper read at length would call for the reading in time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We did not so understand.

The SPEAKER. If there is any objection to the presentation of the paper, the Chair will withdraw it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to dispensing with the reading of the document.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, will withdraw the paper and present it under the rules to the Journal Clerk.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish to be understood as objecting to the reception of the paper. I simply ask that it shall be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to occupy unnecessarily the time of the House by the presentation of documents of this kind. He will withdraw the paper and present it under the rules.

Mr. BOYER. Nobody on this side objects to the presentation of the paper.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen on the left objected to the reading of the document, and gentlemen on the right stated that they understood it was to be read, which was not the understanding of the Chair, as he made a brief statement of its contents for the purpose of dispensing with the necessity of reading it. If there be no objection, it will be understood that the communication is referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. BOYER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will hand the paper to the Journal Clerk, under the rule.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Committee on the Judiciary, who are authorized to report at any time, have directed me to report back with an amendment Senate bill No. 137, entitled "An act for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia."

The bill, which was read, provides that in the District of Columbia no person shall be excluded from any office by reason of race or color, and that so much of any law as makes any such discrimination shall be repealed.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The word "white," wherever it occurs in the laws relating to the District of Columbia or in the charter or ordinances of the city of Washington or Georgetown, and operates as a limitation on the right of any elector of said District or either of said cities to hold any office or to be selected and to serve as a juror, be and the same is hereby repealed; and it shall be unlawful for any person or officer to enforce or attempt to enforce said limitation after the passage of this act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state that this amendment has been drafted in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] for the purpose of avoiding the repetition in our legislation of the phrase "race or color." The object of the amendment is simply to repeal or strike out in all the laws relating to this District, and in its charter and ordinances, the word "white." I move the previous question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the phraseology of this amendment. If I understood it correctly as read, it provides that the word "white" wherever it occurs shall be repealed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is the phrase of the law. It provides that wherever that word "white" occurs as a limitation of any right it shall be repealed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Suppose a law or ordinance says that no negro or mulatto shall sit upon a jury, what word "white" do you strike out?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The law does not read that way. It speaks of white persons. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to know whether any petitions have been presented asking for this legislation.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. JUDD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 20, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Daves, Dixon, Driggs, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Mercur, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Polesy, Price, Raum, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Woodbridge—90.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Kerr, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Prayn, Robinson, Stone, Van Aiken, and Van Trump—20.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barnum, Blaine, Brownwell, Cake, Chanler, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fox, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Hayes, Hill, Richard D. Hubbard, Huburd, Humphrey, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Miller, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Munger, Orth, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Randall, Ross, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Starkweather, or, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Van Wyck, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—60.

So the bill was passed.

During the vote,

Mr. ROBINSON stated that his colleague, Mr. CHANLER, was paired with Mr. NEWCOMB.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in the resolution passed yesterday in reference to impeachment, power was not given to print. I now move that the usual number of copies be printed for presentation to the House at its next session, under the resolution in reference to the impeachment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That the instruction heretofore given to the Judiciary Committee to cause the testimony in the matter of impeachment of the President to be printed and reported to the House on the first day of the next session of Congress, be so amended as to require that the said testimony be accompanied by a full index, showing the names of witnesses and subjects of their testimony, with reference to the pages.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot yield for that. The committee is having that done now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There can be no harm in letting it go upon the record.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is not necessary. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was adopted.

BOUNTY CLAIMS COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the select Committee on Soldiers and Sailors Bounty: Mr. WASHBURN of Indiana, Mr. PAINE, and Mr. GETZ.

ASSASSINATION COMMITTEE.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, which I do at the request of the committee:

Resolved, That the committee for the investigation of the assassination of the President be, and is, authorized to conduct the investigation by such sub-committees as the committee may appoint, and at such places as may be convenient, and such sub-committees shall be authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. ROSS. I think that the number of sub-committees should not be less than three.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROSS. I would like the gentleman to state whether he will not allow an amendment by inserting after "sub-committee" the words "of not less than three."

Mr. BUTLER. Three make a majority.

Mr. ROSS. I thought there were nine.

Mr. BUTLER. Only five.

Mr. ROSS. Say two, then. I do not think it is best for one man to be prowling around to get this testimony alone.

Mr. BUTLER. This resolution was agreed to by every member of the committee.

Mr. ROSS. That may be; but I think there had better be two men together when they are getting that kind of testimony. It should be done in the presence of a witness at least.

On suspending the rules, there were—ayes 64, noes 10; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers under the rule.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the House adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. MCCLURG: The petition of sundry citizens of African descent of Missouri, asking Congress to amend the law of March, 1867, as to allow claimants to collect their bounties without the intervention of the Freedmen's Bureau.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 19, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS ON THE TABLE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate certain communications from the House of Representatives. The first one is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan. What disposition will the Senate make of that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it has been decided once that that could not be considered under the resolution limiting the business of the session.

Mr. GRIMES. It was laid on the table once.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All of them have been laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These bills are all lying on the table and subject to the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They must lie there unless they are called up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Well, let them lie there. I did not know but that the Senate might wish to dispose of them. I thought it proper to call the attention of the Senate to them.

Mr. GRIMES. All those resolutions of thanks were laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that bill. It comes back from the House with an amendment. I should like to have the amendment read.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think we had better go through with the business on the President's table first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a resolution from the House in regard to certain judgments of the Court of Claims.

COTTON CASES IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 77) in regard to judgments of the Court of Claims in cotton cases was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES, and others. Let it be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

Whereas it is stated that the Court of Claims has rendered judgments to the amount of $3,000,000 in favor of parties claiming for captured or abandoned cotton: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be heroby instructed to withhold the payment of said judgments until further action by Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the proper reference of that resolution would be to the Judiciary Committee, and I propose to make that motion after a word or two. I know nothing of the facts, except as I hear them from some of the officers of the Court of Claims, and I am told—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred, no objection being made.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe the whole amount is but $120,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that resolution is referred, I think it proper to say a word in regard to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was what I was about to do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he was through.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the Chair to say that it was referred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is before the Senate, and I suppose it is open to discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer.

Mr. JOHNSON. All I intended was not to touch the principle which is involved in legislation of that description, but merely to correct what I understand to be an error of fact. I am told that the amount of judgments referred to in the resolution instead of being $3,000,000 does not exceed $119,000 or $120,000. I cannot imagine, if that be so, how that error could have crept into the resolution. The amount allowed by the Treasury, as I understand, in cases that the Secretary of the Treasury had the right to adjudicate, exceeds $1,000,000, and there is no complaint as to them. I know the judges of the Court of Claims sufficiently to be satisfied that they have in these judgments, as well as in every other judgment in a case that has been before them, decided with impartiality and ability. I say that not from any professional knowledge acquired by practicing in that tribunal, for no member of Congress can practice there, but from having read their decisions from time to time in important cases, and from my knowledge of their individual professional character. I believe also it is due to the solicitors of that court on the part of the United States to say that they are very able, certainly very industrious officers, and I believe they have collected all the evidence that could be collected in relation to all the cases that have been before that tribunal. The principle, however, upon which the resolution goes is a very dangerous one. We might as well abolish the court altogether if their judgments are to have no effect, but to be suspended whenever Congress thinks proper to suspend them. I believe in all these cases there is or will be an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was quite surprised when I saw this joint resolution upon the desk, to find that such a measure should have passed one of the Houses of Congress without consideration, and I made some inquiry and learned substantially the same state of facts that has been detailed by the Senator from Maryland. This joint resolution has evidently been passed by the House of Representatives under a very great misapprehension. There have been vast claims against the Government growing, not only out of these cotton cases, but out of various other matters connected with the war; and those claims have been settled in a Department here by clerks, often amounting to tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands, and even millions of dollars, without any judicial investigation, whatever, without any examination of witnesses, but simply on ex parte affidavits. Now we have established a Court of Claims with five judges, some of whom have been members of this body and are known probably to all the Senators. Others of them I happen to know personally; and I believe that you cannot find five men of greater integrity than the judges of the Court of Claims. Cases undergo judicial investigation there. We have counsel there, three solicitors, to investigate every claim that is presented. Depositions are taken. Commissioners are appointed under the direction of the court in different parts of the country before whom the witnesses whose testimony is to go before the court are examined and cross-examined. The cases are argued, deliberately considered, and passed upon by this court, composed of gentlemen of high legal ability and attainments and integrity. But for some reason or other there is raised an alarm that the Court of Claims is going to bankrupt the Treasury, and a resolution is passed on a newspaper paragraph that $3,000,000 are coming out of the Treasury, when many times three millions are taken out on the mere judgment of a clerk in one of these Departments, without any examination whatever. I do not know what gives rise to these misrepresentations. It looks to me a little as if there might be claims in the hands of parties who did not wish them to undergo this judicial investigation, who wish to get rid of this Court of Claims, and have an ex parte examination in the dark. All the business of this court is done before the public; its opinions are published; the testimony is public to everybody; and I regard it as a great safety to this Government.

I was very much surprised to find a resolution of this kind passing the House of Representatives. On inquiry it turns out that instead of any $3,000,000 of judgments being entered in favor of cotton claimants, the whole of them together amounts to about one hundred and ten thousand dollars, and that divided between seven or twelve persons. And then we have provided, the law provides, that appeals may be taken in all these cases, involving, I think, more than three thousand dollars, to the Supreme Court of the United States. I was unwilling, therefore, that a resolution of this character, with such a statement in the preamble, so utterly at fault, should be referred without correcting this misstatement, and correcting as far as I can a misapprehension that seems to prevail in the minds of some persons, and which is sought to be impressed on the minds of others, that the Treasury is in danger from the Court of Claims. There is not where the danger lies. That court is a protection to the Treasury and to the Government against dishonest claims.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I do not understand that any cotton claims are being adjudicated in the Treasury Department, nor that such claims have been examined and passed upon at the Treasury Department for a considerable time past. I think the Secretary of the Treasury declines acting upon those cases; and whenever his attention is pressed to them he says to the claimants that they must go to the Court of Claims. I think, therefore, there is some misapprehension in regard to the Treasury Department as well as in regard to the action which has been taken by this court.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me, I will say that was not formerly the case in the Treasury Department. It is only recently so. He is aware that the Department did take jurisdiction of these cases heretofore.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is very true. The Senator stated the fact as to the former practice of the Department, and it is certainly open to all the observations which he made concerning it.

I wish to make but one remark on the occasion of this joint resolution. It is very true that hasty action appears to be taken in the other branch of Congress, and frequently taken. I do not know that we can expect anything else in a House which does its business under the operation of the previous question, and where there is no opportunity for public debate. I think the general volume of our legislative action for several sessions past has received an injurious complexion from the fact that that branch of Congress acts without debate and without careful examination of the subjects presented, consequently when their measures are brought into the Senate we are obliged to commence their examination as if nothing had been done; an extraordinary labor and responsibility is imposed upon this branch of Congress which does not properly belong to it. Whether there can be any remedy or not remains to be seen. I have heretofore in argument endeavored to point out modes of reform which would eventually reach that House, and make its membership more perfect; and by that means, and perhaps some amendment to the rules, we may hereafter have better bills and better joint resolutions sent to us than appear to be coming at the present and have come at recent sessions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after three quarters of an hour spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

EQUAL RIGHTS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the Senate to take up the bill which was returned from the House this morning with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia. The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the word "white," wherever it occurs in the laws relating to the District of Columbia or in the charter or ordinances of the city of Washington or Georgetown, and operates as a limitation on the right of any elector of said District or either of said cities to hold any office or to be selected and to serve as a juror, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and it shall be unlawful for any person or officer to enforce or attempt to enforce said limitation after the passage of this act.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House with the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the supreme court of the District of Columbia sitting for the trial of crimes and misdemeanors be, and is hereby, authorized to order drawn from the jury-box provided for that purpose, and in the manner provided by law, the necessary grand and petit jurors for the June term of the criminal court for the year 1867.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will inquire whether that amendment is in order? I believe it relates to proceedings in courts in the District, the drawings of jurors, and the bill is for the repeal of the disqualification to the right of holding office. The amendment, it occurs to me, does not relate to the same subject at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose it is in order.

Mr. HARLAN. There is no incongruity that would amount to a barrier to the action of the Senate; and I will state to the Senate that there is a great necessity for the passage of an amendatory law on this subject. The criminal court now in session is unable to organize, as I understand, either a grand jury or a petit jury. In the trial now pending the empaneling of the jury was agreed to by the attorneys on both sides; otherwise the court would have been unable to try the case now in hand. I was informed by the chief justice of the court this morning that without some such action the court would be compelled to adjourn, and the criminal business could not be proceeded with, and consequently all parties now in prison would have to be retained until after next February. There is, therefore, a great necessity for some such amendment as this.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the House, as amended, was concurred in.

MAIL SERVICE TO CHINA AND JAPAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) authorizing extensions of the mail steamship service between the United States and China and Japan; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of that joint resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the resolution, so that we may know what it is.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution. It authorizes the Postmaster General to extend and improve the mail steamship service to Japan and China, authorized by the act of February 17, 1865, by establishing regular connections with such other seaports in China and Japan as will, in his judgment, promote the usefulness and efficiency of the mail service established by that act, provided such extensions and improvements of the service are made without additional expense to the Government.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will state that a similar bill was considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate and unanimously agreed to by the committee. There is no expense involved. It provides for the extension of the mail service to the new ports just about to be opened in Japan.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the Postmaster General has a right to extend this service to other ports under the bill passed in February last, but he thinks he has not, and this resolution allows him to extend it to other ports as fast as they are opened, provided it can be done without expense. I think it ought to pass. The British and French lines run to all these other ports and they will get the mail service unless we authorize this to be done.

Mr. HENDERSON. What are the ports?

Mr. POMEROY. There are three or four that have been opened lately.

Mr. RAMSEY. The new port of Osaka, the principal port just opened by the new treaty, is one. If we do not pass this proposition we shall get no American mails into these ports.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the effect of it is to allow them to stop at the intermediate ports without any additional subsidy.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is not to cost anything additional.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to considering this joint resolution at this time?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know if the rule we have adopted is considered as waived and we are going into general business. We are taking up measures here, and they are depending upon their merits. If the Senate has concluded to depart from the rule that has been adopted we can consider these questions.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think there can be no objection to a proposition so inexpensive as this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If there is no objection to it another Senator will rise, and there will be no objection to his bill, and we shall consider everything that a majority of the Senate is for. If we have come to that conclusion, if that is the opinion of the Senate, of course we shall pass this bill, and pass every other bill that it shall be found a majority of the Senate is in favor of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Any Senator can interpose an objection, and that will carry it over.

Mr. RAMSEY. Why would a Senator object to a measure of this character?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not object; but I say any Senator can object.

Mr. RAMSEY. This is an inexpensive proposition, and I am sure no Senator will object to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate is going on with general business I have nothing to say.

Mr. RAMSEY. Doubtless there are bills to which objection would be proper, but certainly not to one of this character.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it amounts to this: that every bill is to pass which Senators can go through the body and get gentlemen not to object to. It is just the kind of legislation we are getting through Congress and giving no consideration to. We have half a dozen bills and resolutions from the House of Representatives that are proposed to be considered here, though they have never been before any committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. This has been considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Has this bill been before any committee?

Mr. RAMSEY. Not this particular bill, but a bill in words and letters just like this, and reported upon by our committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well, that being the case I do not object if nobody else does.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SYMPATHY WITH CRETE.

Mr. SUMNER. Are reports in order? I lost my opportunity by the motion to go into executive session to make a report, which I was directed to make this morning by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to ask immediate action of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a joint resolution (S.

R. No. 63) declaring sympathy with the suffering people of Crete.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the action of the Senate upon the joint resolution at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was by unanimous consent read three times, and passed. It is as follows:

Resolved, &c. That the people of the United States, feeling a strong sympathy with the people of Crete, constituting a part of the Greek family, to which civilization owes so much, are pained by the report of the present sufferings of this interesting people; and they unite in the hope that this declaration, which they feel it their duty to make, will be favorably considered by the Government of Turkey in determining its policy toward Crete.

And be it further resolved, That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to communicate this resolution to the Government of Turkey.

BOUNTY TO MISSOURI TROOPS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Chair will proceed with the bills on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the matter which I propose to offer will not consume much time. I think it can be disposed of in a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution of which no notice has been given. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 64) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties was read twice by its title.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state that this is an exact copy of the joint resolution which was passed at the last session of Congress, but failed to become a law in consequence of its failure to reach the President during the session. I know it to be an exact copy of that resolution. If the Senate is disposed to violate its rule at all, I think this is a case as meritorious as any in which the rule can be disregarded. Senators will remember that I had the measure up the other day in another form, in the shape of a resolution requesting the officers of the two branches of Congress to sign a reënrolled copy of the resolution which was passed at the last session, and to represent it to the President. Senators will remember that that matter was discussed here, and a majority of the members seemed to come to the conclusion that the better form to accomplish the object would be to pass over again the resolution of last session, in the same language in which it was then passed, and have it presented to the President again. I ask that it be considered now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better go to the Military Committee. If they report it back I shall have no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Ohio was not present the other day when the debate to which I have alluded occurred, and I think he did not pay attention to my remarks a moment ago. I will state to him that this is an exact copy of a joint resolution passed by both Houses in March last, and presented to the President after the adjournment of Congress. The Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, [Mr. Ross,] laid the enrolled joint resolution in his desk after it was signed by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, and forgot that it was there, and the two Houses adjourned before its presentation to the President. It was presented to the President after the adjournment, and the President indorsed on the resolution a statement to the effect that he conceived that he had no authority to sign it, and he sent it to the office of the Secretary of State. Before the Senator from Ohio returned the question came up here on a proposition directing the officers of the two Houses again to enroll the joint resolution and send it to the President at this session; but a majority of the Senators seemed to be of opinion that the object might be better reached, and many of them thought it could only be reached, in this manner. I therefore present now an exact copy of the resolution passed at the last session, and desire to have it acted upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator if this measure was examined by any committee before its passage at the last session?

Mr. HENDERSON. It was reported from the Military Committee of the two Houses at the last session and examined thoroughly. It is a question that has been before the Senate for two years.

Mr. SHERMAN. If a bill in the same identical words has been reported by the Military Committee I do not insist on my motion to refer. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. WILSON. I think there is no need of referring the bill, and I think we ought to pass it. The Military Committee examined it carefully at the last session; it was the deliberate judgment of the committee and of both Houses of Congress that it should be passed; but by an accident it failed to become a law. I do not think we should take advantage of that accident. I hope the resolution will be put upon its passage at once.

Mr. GRIMES. If I recollect aright this question was settled in the early days of the present session, and I do not think we ought now to overturn what we did then. I must interpose an objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A question of order is now made under the resolution of the Senate. That question the Chair will refer to the Senate for decision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose a motion to refer is in order. The resolution has been read the first and second time, and if an objection is made to its consideration I think it had better be referred. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. They can report it back immediately if they choose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, no question of order being made on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the 16th instant calling for information as to whether means can be adopted to expedite the payment of bounties under the act of July 28, 1866; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 61) relative to letter-carriers, have instructed me to report it back; and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. RAMSEY. Increasing the pay of letter-carriers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be considered, objection being made.

RECESS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate take a recess—

Mr. SUMNER. Not quite yet. There is a little bill I want to introduce, to which there can be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I submit my motion, which is that the Senate take a recess for one hour.

Mr. SUMNER. I object; and it cannot be considered without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SUMNER. The usage of the Senate has always been to require the unanimous consent for the reception of a motion for a recess.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Never.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GRIMES. That has never been the rule.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to introduce a bill to which the Senate can have no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have the question of order settled; and that is not open to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that a motion for a recess is always in order when a gentleman can get the floor to make it.

Mr. GRIMES. When a question is pending before the House, then it is necessary that there should be unanimous consent in order to lay that business aside and take up a motion for a recess; but there being no business before the Senate the motion I made was perfectly in order, and the decision of the Chair is entirely correct.

Mr. SUMNER. The motion the Senator makes is in the nature of a resolution; and a resolution, if objected to, must lie over twenty-four hours.

Mr. GRIMES. So is a motion to adjourn or a motion to go into executive session in the nature of a resolution; and by parity of reasoning such a motion must lie over for twenty-four hours for consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. No; because our rules provide for the consideration of a motion to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Chair has decided the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. SUMNER. No, sir; but I ask the Senator from Iowa to withdraw his motion. I want to offer a bill that can be acted upon at once.

Mr. GRIMES. You can do it when we come back.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will not take a recess. There is a little bill that I have in my hands which I desire to introduce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa, that the Senate take a recess for an hour. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore again called the Senate to order at half past two o'clock.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill without any previous notice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. SUMNER. It is a bill to amend the several acts of Congress relating to naturalization. Let it be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which proposes to amend all the acts of Congress relating to naturalization, by striking out wherever they occur the words "being a free white person" and the words "free white" and the words "a free white person and," so that in naturalization there shall be no distinction of race or color.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the introduction of this bill without notice?

No objection being made, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 189) to amend the several acts of Congress relating to naturalization, and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the bill acted upon now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will not object. I will state that I have received a letter from Norfolk calling my attention to a very hard case of a colored person who has been an inhabitant, and in my opinion a citizen in all his rights, for more than twenty-five years, but he is unable to obtain naturalization because of the words of color in our naturalization laws. I think it is only reasonable that now we should put an end to that. In short, I wish to punch that word "white" out of the statute-book wherever it appears.

If the Senator from Vermont is disposed to keep it in, then I can understand that he would object to the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not disposed to keep it in—

Mr. SUMNER. I did not suppose the Senator was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My punch is not quite so case-hardened as that of my friend. But I have found from observation and experience in my short life that a bill of this kind requires to be examined by a committee to be sure that you are doing exactly what you suppose you are doing. I am as much in favor of the idea of the bill as my friend is. I think our Norfolk friend—and there are a good many others in the same category, I have no doubt—can wait until December, when this bill can be reported perfect by a committee. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senate will proceed with it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects. It cannot be considered now.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection to the reference.

Mr. SUMNER. But then the reference kills the bill for the present session.

Several SENATORS. Why can it not go over?

Mr. SUMNER. Senators ask why it cannot go over to December? Is it not a wrong thing in our statute-book? I say it is a wrong thing, and we ought to terminate it. I do not wish that it should go over to December. I do not wish that any wrong should go over to December. The moment I can I would put an end to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope it will not be done. I hope the Senate will act on it at once.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the yeas were seventeen.

Mr. SUMNER. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose the bill should not be referred to the Judiciary Committee, what is the consequence? It lies on the table, and cannot be acted on, being objected to.

Mr. SUMNER. Can it not be proceeded with now? It is before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. A single objection prevents the reading of the bill a third time to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. If there is that disposition, if Senators are determined to object to it—

Mr. SHERMAN. One Senator has objected to the bill. I do not care about it. I am simply asking the Senator what he wants?

Mr. SUMNER. I want to pass the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is impossible, because one Senator objects, and that prevents its passage to day.

Mr. SUMNER. If it is understood that Senators are determined that the bill shall not pass—

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care whether it passes or not.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill is in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the hands of any one Senator who objects.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate. If any one Senator objects to the bill, and takes advantage of his unquestioned senatorial privilege, he does it on his responsibility.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want my friend from Massachusetts to put me in the wrong; I know he would not intentionally.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He knows perfectly well that I am just as much in favor of a bill, and very likely of this bill, as he is; that Vermont is not a particle behind Massachusetts on this great question, not a single step. But we know, and it is our duty to act upon that knowledge, that it is exceedingly unsafe legislation to hurry through a bill that any one member introduces here on this or any other subject that involves a careful reëxamination of a series of statutes, because the chances are more than even that you will get something passed that you do not want, that does not hit the case, or that does something more than you expect it is to do. It is to prevent such results that we have committees. Now, therefore, my simple motion is that this bill shall go to a committee, so that there may be that examination which will make the bill perfect, if it is not now perfect, to answer the end that my friend from Massachusetts and myself both want to reach. That is my position.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. As I understand that Senators will positively object to the passage of the bill to-day, I submit, and make no objection to its going to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the call for them may be withdrawn by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and that call is withdrawn. The question now is on the motion to refer.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

RECONSTRUCTION—VETO.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. No. 128) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, with his objections thereto, the House of Representatives had proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the same, and had passed the bill by a vote of two thirds of the House.

ENROLLED BILL JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) authorizing extensions of the mail steamship service between China and Japan; and it was signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

INTER-OCEANIC TELEGRAPH CHARGES.

Mr. NYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire and report what measures, if any, can be adopted to prevent the practice of extortion upon citizens of the United States and the press by inter-oceanic telegraph companies.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of February 13, 1866, the report of Major Reynolds, United States Engineers, of his explorations of the Yellowstone and the country drained by that river.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the communication and its accompanying document lie on the table, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The accompanying document has not been brought into the room. It constitutes a very large box, as I am told.

Mr. HOWARD. It is a very valuable report. Mr. JOHNSON. It ought to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; I move to refer it to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant asking him to report whether any means can be adopted by the War Department to expedite the payment of bounties under the act of July 28, 1866.

Mr. WILSON. I move that that report lie on the table, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message from the President, in answer to the resolution of the 8th instant calling for copies of any correspondence on the files of the Department of State relating to any recent events in Mexico.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that message be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, subsequently reported back the message and documents, and moved that they be printed; and the motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe there is a concurrent resolution in regard to the time of adjournment lying on the table. I move that it be taken up.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not be taken up now. I hope it will not be proceeded with until after the consideration of the veto message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking up the resolution referred to?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a reason for taking it up now.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think we can take it up now. I wish to hear the veto message before I determine whether to vote to adjourn or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to occupy time about it. Let it stand for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not make the motion now.

RECONSTRUCTION—VETO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A communication has been received from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 19, 1867.

The President having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. No. 128) entitled "An act supplementary to 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867," with his objections thereto, the House of Representatives proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the same; and

Resolved, That the bill do pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

EDWARD MCPHERSON, Clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the message accompanies that resolution. I ask for the reading of the message.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that we take a recess for two hours. ["No, no."]

Mr. SUMNER. I ask if we had not better hear the message before we take a recess. We can hear the message by five o'clock, and then take a recess for two hours.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose that we take our dinners and hear the message afterward.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to make a suggestion in regard to the motion submitted by the Senator from Ohio, which I think had better be put to a vote before we proceed with the message. It is very doubtful whether there will be a quorum in the House of Representatives after six o'clock, and we ought to settle the time of adjournment now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the reading of the message.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; I will not insist upon calling up the adjournment resolution against the wish of the Senator from Ohio, who made that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the message.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the reading of the message, too.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be read.

The Chief Clerk commenced the reading of the message.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is impossible to hear.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we had better take a recess. It will take an hour to read the message.

Mr. SUMNER. Only half an hour. I think we had better hear it before a recess.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unless there is order it might as well not be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be less confusion in the Hall. Gentlemen must take their seats and preserve order.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the veto message. It is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I return herewith the bill entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto passed on the 23d day of March, 1867," and will state as briefly as possible some of the reasons which prevent me from giving it my approval.

This is one of a series of measures passed by Congress during the last four months on the subject of reconstruction. The message returning the act of the 2d of March last states at length my objections to the passage of that measure. They apply equally well to the bill now before me, and I am content merely to refer to them and to reiterate my conviction that they are sound and unanswerable.

There are some points peculiar to this bill which I will proceed at once to consider.

The first section proposes to declare "the true intent and meaning" in some particulars of the two prior acts upon this subject. It is declared that the intent of those acts was:

First, that the existing governments in the ten "rebel States" "were not legal State governments;" and

Second, "that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts and to the paramount authority of Congress."

Congress may, by a declaratory act, fix upon a prior act a construction altogether at variance with its apparent meaning, and from the time, at least, when such construction is fixed, the original act will be construed to mean exactly what it is stated to mean by the declaratory statute. There will be, then, from the time this bill may become a law no doubt, no question as to the relation in which the "existing governments" in those States, called in the original act "the provisional governments," stand toward the military authority. As those relations stood before the declaratory act, these "governments," it is true, were made subject to absolute military authority in many important respects, but not in all, the language of the act being "subject to the military authority of the United States, as hereinafter prescribed." By the sixth section of the original act, these governments were made "in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States."

Now, by this declaratory act it appears that Congress did not, by the original act, intend to limit the military authority to any particulars or subjects therein "prescribed," but meant to make it universal. Thus over all these ten States this military government is now declared to have unlimited authority. It is no longer confined to the preservation of the public peace, the administration of criminal law, the registration of voters, and the superintendence of elections; but "in all respects" is asserted to be paramount to the existing civil governments.

It is impossible to conceive any state of society more intolerable than this, and yet it is to this condition that twelve million American citizens are reduced by the Congress of the United States. Over every foot of the immense territory occupied by these American citizens the Constitution of the United States is theoretically in full operation. It binds all the people there, and should protect them, yet they are denied every one of its sacred guarantees.

Of what avail will it be to any one of these southern people when seized by a file of soldiers to ask for the cause of arrest, or for the production of the warrant? Of what avail to ask for the privilege of bail when in military custody, which knows no such thing as bail? Of what avail to demand a trial by jury, process for witnesses, a copy of the indictment, the privilege of counsel, or that greater privilege, the writ of habeas corpus?

The veto of the original bill of the 2d of March was based on two distinct grounds, the interference of Congress in matters strictly appertaining to the reserved powers of the States, and the establishment of military tribunals for the trial of citizens in time of peace. The impartial reader of that message will understand that all that it contains with respect to military despotism and martial law has reference especially to the fearful power conferred on the district commanders to displace the criminal courts and assume jurisdiction to try and to punish by military boards; that, potentially, the suspension of the habeas corpus was martial law and military despotism. The act now before me not only declares that the intent was to confer such military authority, but also to confer unlimited military authority over all the other courts of the State, and over all the officers of the State, legislative, executive, and judicial. Not content with the general grant of power, Congress, in the second section of this bill, specifically gives to each military commander the power "to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise, any civil or military office or duty in such district, under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from or granted by, or claimed under any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof."

A power that hitherto all the departments of the Federal Government, acting in concert or separately, have not dared to exercise is here attempted to be conferred on a subordinate military officer. To him, as a military officer of the Federal Government, is given the power, supported by "a sufficient military force," to remove every civil officer of the State. What next? The district commander who has thus displaced a civil officer is authorized to fill the vacancy by the detail of an officer or soldier of the Army, or by the appointment "of some other person." This military appointee, whether an officer, a soldier, or "some other person," is to perform "the duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed." In other words, an officer or soldier of the Army is thus transformed into a civil officer. He may be made a Governor, a legislator, or a judge. However unfit he may deem himself for such civil duties he must obey the order. The officer of the Army must, if "detailed," go upon the supreme bench of the State with the same prompt obedience as if he were detailed to go upon a court-martial. The soldier, if detailed to act as a justice of the peace, must obey as quickly as if he were detailed for picket duty. What is the character of such a military-civil officer? This bill declares that he shall perform the duties of the civil office to which he is detailed. It is clear, however, that he does not lose his position in the military service. He is still an officer or soldier of the Army; he is still subject to the rules and regulations which govern it, and must yield due deference, respect, and obedience toward his superiors.

The clear intent of this section is that the officer or soldier detailed to fill a civil office must execute its duties according to the laws of the State. If he is appointed a Governor of a State he is to execute the duties as provided by the laws of that State, and for the time being his military character is to be suspended in his new civil capacity. If he is appointed a State treasurer he must at once assume the custody and disbursement of the funds of the State, and must perform those duties precisely according to the laws of the State; for he is intrusted with no other official duty or other official power. Holding the office of treasurer, and intrusted with funds, it happens that he is required by the State laws to enter into bond with security, and to take an oath of office; yet from the beginning of the bill to the end there is no provision for any bond or oath of office, or for any single qualification required under the State law, such as residence, citizenship, or anything else. The only oath is that provided for in the ninth section, by the terms of which every one detailed or appointed to any civil office in the State is required "to take and to subscribe the oath of office prescribed by law for officers of the United States." Thus an officer of the Army of the United States detailed to fill a civil office in one of these States gives no official bond and takes no official oath for the performance of his new duties, but, as a civil officer of the State, only takes the same oath which he had already taken as a military officer of the United States. He is, at last, a military officer performing civil duties, and the authority under which he acts is Federal authority only; and the inevitable result is that the Federal Government, by the agency of its own sworn officers, in effect, assumes the civil government of the State.

A singular contradiction is apparent here. Congress declares these local State governments to be illegal governments, and then provides that these illegal governments shall be carried on by Federal officers, who are to perform the very duties imposed on its own officers by this illegal State authority. It certainly would be a novel spectacle if Congress should attempt to carry on a legal State government by the agency of its own officers. It is yet more strange that Congress attempts to sustain and carry on an illegal State government by the same Federal agency.

In this connection I must call attention to the tenth and eleventh sections of the bill, which provide that none of the officers or appointees of these military commanders "shall be bound in his action by any opinion of any civil officer of the United States," and that all the provisions of the act "shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents thereof may be fully and perfectly carried out."

It seems Congress supposed that this bill might require construction, and they fix, therefore, the rule to be applied. But where is the construction to come from? Certainly no one can be more in want of instruction than a soldier or an officer of the Army detailed for a civil service, perhaps the most important in a State, with the duties of which he is altogether unfamiliar. This bill says he shall not be bound in his action by the opinion of any civil officer of the United States. The duties of the office are altogether civil, but when he asks for an opinion he can only ask the opinion of another military officer, who, perhaps, understands as little of his duties as he does himself; and as to his "action," he is answerable to the military authority, and to the military authority alone. Strictly no opinion of any civil officer, other than a judge, has a binding force.

But these military appointees would not be bound even by a judicial opinion. They might very well say, even when their action is in conflict with the Supreme Court of the United States, "That court is composed of civil officers of the United States, and we are not bound to conform our action to any opinion of any such authority."

This bill and the acts to which it is supplementary are all founded upon the assumption that these ten communities are not States, and that their existing governments are not legal. Throughout the legislation upon this subject they are called "rebel States," and in this particular bill they are denominated "so-called States," and the vice of illegality is declared to pervade all of them. The obligations of consistency bind the legislative body as well as the individuals who compose it. It is now too late to say that these ten political communities are not States of this Union. Declarations to the contrary made in these three acts are contradicted again and again by repeated acts of legislation enacted by Congress from the year 1861 to the year 1867. During that period, while these States were in actual rebellion, and after that rebellion was brought to a close, they have been again and again recognized as States of the Union. Representation has been apportioned to them as States. They have been divided into judicial districts for the holding of district and circuit courts of the United States, as States of the Union only can be districted. The last act on this subject was passed July 23, 1866, by which every one of these ten States was arranged into districts and circuits. They have been called upon by Congress to act through their Legislatures upon at least two amendments to the Constitution of the United States. As States they have ratified one amendment, which required the vote of twenty-seven States of the thirty-six then composing the Union. When the requisite twenty-seven votes were given in favor of that amendment, seven of which votes were given by seven of these ten States, it was proclaimed to be a part of the Constitution of the United States, and slavery was declared no longer to exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction. If these seven States were not legal States of the Union it follows as an inevitable consequence that in some of the States slavery yet exists. It does not exist in these seven States, for they have abolished it also in their State constitutions; but Kentucky not having done so it would still remain in that State. But, in truth, if this assumption that these States have no legal State governments be true, then the abolition of slavery by these illegal governments binds no one, for Congress now denies to these States the power to abolish slavery by denying to them the power to elect a legal State Legislature, or to frame a constitution for any purpose, even for such a purpose as the abolition of slavery.

As to the other constitutional amendment having reference to suffrage, it happens that these States have not accepted it. The consequence is that it has never been proclaimed or understood, even by Congress, to be a part of the Constitution of the United States.

The Senate of the United States has repeatedly given its sanction to the appointment of judges, district attorneys, and marshals for every one of these States; and yet, if they are not legal States, not one of these judges is authorized to hold a court. So, too, both Houses of Congress have passed appropriation bills to pay all these judges, attorneys, and officers of the United States for exercising their functions in these States. Again, in the machinery of the internal revenue laws, all these States are districted, not as "Territories," but as "States."

So much for continuous legislative recognition. The instances cited, however, fall far short of all that might be enumerated.

Executive recognition, as is well known, has been frequent and unwavering.

The same may be said as to judicial recognition, through the Supreme Court of the United States. That august tribunal, from first to last, in the administration of its duties in banc and upon the circuit, has never failed to recognize these ten communities as legal States of the Union. The cases depending in that court upon appeal and writ of error from these States when the rebellion began have not been dismissed upon any idea of the cessation of jurisdiction. They were carefully continued from term to term until the rebellion was entirely subdued and peace reestablished, and then they were called for argument and consideration as if no insurrection had intervened. New cases occurring since the rebellion have come from these States before that court by writ of error and appeal, and even by original suit, where only "a State" can bring such a suit. These cases are entertained by that tribunal in the exercise of its acknowledged jurisdiction, which could not attach to them if they had come from any political body other than a State of the Union. Finally, in the allotment of their circuits, made by the judges at the December term, 1865, every one of these States is put on the same footing of legality with all the other States of the Union. Virginia and North Carolina, being a part of the fourth circuit, are allotted to the Chief Justice. South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida constitute the fifth circuit, and are allotted to the late Mr. Justice Wayne. Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas are allotted to the sixth judicial circuit, as to which there is a vacancy on the bench.

The Chief Justice, in the exercise of his circuit duties, has recently held a circuit court in the State of North Carolina. If North Carolina is not a State of this Union the Chief Justice had no authority to hold a court there, and every order, judgment, and decree rendered by him in that court were coram non judice and void.

Another ground on which these reconstruction acts are attempted to be sustained is this: that these ten States are conquered territory; that the constitutional relation in which they stood as States toward the Federal Government prior to the rebellion has given place to a new relation; that their territory is a conquered country and their citizens a conquered people, and that in this new relation Congress can govern them by military power.

A title by conquest stands on clear ground. It is a new title acquired by war. It applies only to territory, for goods or movable things regularly captured in war are called "booty," or if taken by individual soldiers, "plunder."

There is not a foot of the land in any one of these ten States which the United States holds by conquest, save only such land as did not belong to either of these States or to any individual owner. I mean such lands as did belong to the pretended government called the confederate States. These lands we may claim to hold by conquest. As to all other land or territory, whether belonging to the States or to individuals, the Federal Government has now no more title or right to it than it had before the rebellion. Our own forts, arsenals, navy-yards, custom-houses, and other Federal property situate in those States we now hold, not by the title of conquest, but by our old title, acquired by purchase or condemnation for public use with compensation to former owners. We have not conquered these places, but have simply "repossessed" them.

If we require more sites for forts, custom-houses, or other public use we must acquire the title to them by purchase or appropriation in the regular mode. At this moment the United States, in the acquisition of sites for national cemeteries in these States, acquires title in the same way. The Federal courts sit in court-houses owned or leased by the United States, not in the court-houses of the States. The United States pays each of these States for the use of its jails. Finally, the United States levies its direct taxes and its internal revenue upon the property in these States, including the productions of the lands within their territorial limits; not by way of levy and contribution in the character of a conqueror, but in the regular way of taxation under the same laws which apply to all the other States of the Union.

From first to last, during the rebellion and since, the title of each of these States to the lands and public buildings owned by them has never been disturbed, and not a foot of it has ever been acquired by the United States, even under a title by confiscation, and not a foot of it has ever been taxed under Federal law.

In conclusion, I must respectfully ask the attention of Congress to the consideration of one more question arising under this bill. It vests in the military commander, subject only to the approval of the General of the Army of the United States, an unlimited power to remove from office any civil or military officer in each of these ten States, and the further power, subject to the same approval, to detail or appoint any military officer or soldier of the United States to perform the duties of the officer so removed, and to fill all vacancies occurring in those States by death, resignation, or otherwise. The military appointee thus required to perform the duties of a civil office, according to the laws of the States, and as such required to take an oath, is for the time being a civil officer. What is his character? Is he a civil officer of the State or a civil officer of the United States? If he is a civil officer of the State, where is the Federal power under our Constitution which authorizes his appointment by any Federal officer? If, however, he is to be considered a civil officer of the United States, as his appointment and oath would seem to indicate, where is the authority for his appointment vested by the Constitution? The power of appointment of all officers of the United States, civil or military, where not provided for in the Constitution, is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with this exception: that Congress "may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." But this bill, if these are to be considered inferior officers within the meaning of the Constitution, does not provide for their appointment by the President alone, or by the courts of law, or by the heads of Departments, but vests the appointment in one subordinate executive officer, subject to the approval of another subordinate executive officer; so that, if we put this question and fix the character of this military appointee either way, this provision of the bill is equally opposed to the Constitution.

Take the case of a soldier or officer appointed to perform the office of judge in one of these States, and as such to administer the proper laws of the State. Where is the authority to be found in the Constitution for vesting in a military or an executive officer strict judicial functions to be exercised under State law? It has been again and again decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that acts of Congress which have attempted to vest executive powers in the judicial courts or judges of the United States are not warranted by the Constitution. If Congress cannot clothe a judge with merely executive duties, how can they clothe an officer or soldier of the Army with judicial duties over citizens of the United States, who are not in the military or naval service? So, too, it has been repeatedly decided that Congress cannot require a State officer, executive or judicial, to perform any duty enjoined upon him by a law of the United States. How, then, can Congress confer power upon an executive officer of the United States to perform such duties in a State? If Congress could not vest in a judge of one of these States any judicial authority under the United States by direct enactment, how can it accomplish the same thing indirectly by removing the State judge and putting an officer of the United States in his place?

To me these considerations are conclusive of the unconstitutionality of this part of the bill now before me, and I earnestly commend their consideration to the deliberate judgment of Congress.

Within a period less than a year the legislation of Congress has attempted to strip the executive department of the Government of some of its essential powers. The Constitution and the oath provided in it devolve upon the President the power and duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. The Constitution, in order to carry out this power, gives him the choice of the agents, and makes them subject to his control and supervision. But in the execution of these laws the constitutional obligation upon the President remains, but the power to exercise that constitutional duty is effectually taken away.

The military commander is, as to the power of appointment, made to take the place of the President, and the General of the Army the place of the Senate; and any attempt on the part of the President to assert his own constitutional power may, under pretense of law, be met by official insubordination. It is to be feared that these military officers, looking to the authority given by these laws rather than to the letter of the Constitution, will recognize no authority but the commander of the district and the General of the Army.

If there were no other objection than this to this proposed legislation it would be sufficient. While I hold the chief executive authority of the United States, while the obligation rests upon me to see that all the laws are faithfully executed, I can never willingly surrender that trust or the powers given for its execution. I can never give my assent to be made responsible for the faithful execution of laws, and at the same time surrender that trust and the powers which accompany it to any other executive officer, high or low, or to any number of executive officers. If this executive trust, vested by the Constitution in the President, is to be taken from him and vested in a subordinate officer, the responsibility will be with Congress in clothing the subordinate with unconstitutional power and with the officer who assumes its exercise.

This interference with the constitutional authority of the executive department is an evil that will inevitably sap the foundations of our Federal system, but it is not the worst evil of this legislation. It is a great public wrong to take from the President powers conferred on him alone by the Constitution; but the wrong is more flagrant and more dangerous when the powers so taken from the President are conferred upon subordinate executive officers, and especially upon military officers. Over nearly one third of the States of the Union military power, regulated by no fixed law, rules supreme. Each one of the five district commanders, though not chosen by the people or responsible to them, exercises at this hour more executive power, military and civil, than the people have ever been willing to confer upon the head of the executive department, though chosen by and responsible to themselves. The remedy must come from the people themselves. They know what it is, and how it is to be applied. At the present time they cannot, according to the forms of the Constitution, repeal these laws: they cannot remove or control this military despotism. The remedy is, nevertheless, in their hands; it is to be found in the ballot, and is a sure one, if not controlled by fraud, overawed by arbitrary power, or from apathy on their part too long delayed. With abiding confidence in their patriotism, wisdom, and integrity, I am still hopeful of the future, and that in the end the rod of despotism will be broken, the armed heel of power lifted from the necks of the people, and the principles of a violated Constitution preserved.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1867.

MR. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the extraordinary and as I think indefensible position assumed in that message might well call for a reply. I think most of the positions assumed, and indeed all of them so far as they go to deny the authority of Congress to pass this bill, are untenable; but there is an indisposition in the Senate to have its time occupied with the discussion of the message, and if it be the pleasure of the Senate to vote upon it at once, I shall forego any remarks that, under other circumstances, and if the Senate were to continue in session, I should be inclined to make. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to take the vote I shall not trespass on its time. ["Question," "Question."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall this bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President? The question will be taken by yeas and nays, so as to determine whether two thirds vote for the bill or not.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Johnson, and Patterson of Tennessee—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Guthrie, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, and Williams—17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two thirds of the Senators present having voted to pass the bill, it is now a law notwithstanding the veto of the President.

Mr. SPRAGUE subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to have my name recorded in the affirmative on the final passage of the supplementary reconstruction bill. I was necessarily absent from my seat when the final vote was taken, and I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to record my vote.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to accommodate the Senator, but under our rules it cannot be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules the vote of a Senator not present at the time cannot be recorded, even by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Then I will state that if present I would have voted for the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 63) declaring sympathy with the suffering people of Crete.

The message also announced that the House had concurred with the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) concerning the government of the Army of the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RECONSTRUCTION EXPENSES—VETO.

The message also announced that the President of the United States, having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 71) to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States, with his objections thereto, the House of Representatives proceeded, in pursuance with the Constitution, to reconsider the same, and passed the same, two thirds of the House agreeing thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the message just received from the House of Representatives. The message of the President will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

For reasons heretofore stated in my several veto messages to Congress upon the subject of reconstruction, I return without my approval "the joint resolution to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and appropriating for that purpose the sum of $1,000,000.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 19, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is this the measure which makes an appropriation of $1,000,000, in addition to what has been heretofore appropriated? ["Yes."]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, and Patterson of Tennessee—4.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Guthrie, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Williams—17.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two thirds of the Senate having voted to pass the joint resolution notwithstanding the objections of the President, it is a law.

REMOVAL OF DISTRICT COMMANDERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) concerning the government of the Army of the United States; and it was read the first time. It provides that no district or department commander shall be relieved by the President from the command heretofore assigned to and now exercised by him, without the advice and consent of the Senate, unless the change of command be recommended by the General commanding the Army.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we may proceed with that at once.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to the consideration of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. So do I.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the very key of the whole structure of reconstruction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has had its first reading, and objection being made, it goes over under the rules.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to know from the Chair if one objection carries it over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be read more than once to-day, objection being made.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House resolution for adjournment, and I desire to offer a substitute for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, adopted by the House of Representatives on the 11th instant:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on the day of July instant, the adjournment shall be to Wednesday, the 13th day of November next, at noon, and the two Houses shall then reassemble without further order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to amend the resolution by striking out all after the resolving clause and inserting as a substitute:

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall at twelve o'clock, meridian, of the 20th day of July instant adjourn their respective Houses, to meet on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that I understand the other House has adjourned to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow, and they will have to act on this amendment if it is sent back.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will name four o'clock, or any other hour that will be satisfactory.

Several SENATORS. Say two o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will say two o'clock. That will give plenty of time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on taking up the resolution. Is there any objection?

Mr. HENDERSON. I object—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The motion is in order to take up the resolution. A resolution of adjournment does not require unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a peculiar resolution, and I supposed it to be excluded by our rule or I should have laid it before the Senate long ago.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not legislative business.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no objection to taking up the resolution, but I wish to state an objection to its passage now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the resolution is before the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio this difficulty in the way of the adoption of the resolution: the other House has not yet acted on our Indian bill—

Mr. FESSENDEN. And there is not the slightest possibility of their doing so.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then, if there is no possibility of that, we ought to pass the House bill repealing the provision which prohibits the making of any Indian treaties by the President or the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Several SENATORS. We will take that up and pass it presently.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well.

Mr. POMEROY. We ought not to adjourn until Monday or Tuesday. There is enough executive business to keep us two or three days.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We can pass the bill referred to by the Senator from Missouri before two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. But there will be no train for any Senator to get away by until five or six o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a train at half past four.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can pass the bill of the Senator from Missouri in five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senate will take up that bill now I shall be satisfied.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As soon as this is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a resolution before the Senate, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "that" and insert—

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, at two o'clock p. m. on the 20th day of July instant, adjourn their respective Houses, to meet on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not say "without day?"

Mr. SHERMAN. Because it has been suggested that the act of the last Congress may have disturbed to some extent the operation of the former provisions as to our meeting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the amendment by substituting instead of the "first Monday of December next" the "second Wednesday of October next."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. On that question I have a word to say. Pardon me if I speak frankly. I cannot help it. How Congress, after listening to the message of to-day, which is only the logical consequence of other messages, can quietly vote to go home and leave this post of duty until next winter, passes my understanding. To me it is incomprehensible. The message from beginning to end was of defiance. It is needless to quote its precise language. Its defiant tone still fills this Chamber, and will soon fill the whole country. As I listened to this appeal, which was calculated to revive the dying rebellion, I felt that one of two things must be done; its author must be removed from the executive chair, or Congress must continue in permanent session to watch and counteract him. Such is the alternative. One failing, the other must be done.

Now, sir, when I thus insist, let it be understood that I am not unmindful of any of my responsibilities in this Chamber. Other duties may devolve upon me hereafter. For the present I speak as a Senator, bound in the discharge of his public duties to do what he can for the public good. As a Senator I must be plain; nor can I be constrained by the possibility that hereafter I may be called to judge the President. I am called to judge him now. The proposition that Congress should go home compels me to judge him.

Unquestionably it belongs to the other House to initiate the proceedings which shall set the President at your bar. But until then it is the right and the duty of every Senator to express himself freely with regard to his conduct; nor can there be any limit to this latitude. It is as broad as human thought. No future duty can be a straight-jacket now. Because the President may be impeached the Senate is not obliged to be silent with regard to him. Our Constitution is guilty of no such absurdity. Until a Senator is sworn as a judge on the trial of impeachment, according to the requirement of the Constitution, he is a Senator, free to criticise any public functionary from the President to the humblest officer; and if either has so acted as to deserve removal, there is no reason why he should not say so. This is only according to the Constitution and common sense.

Now, since Andrew Johnson is still President and he is not yet set to your bar, I insist that you shall stay in your seats in order to encounter the evil which must proceed from him just so long as he continues in power. You should meet him here constantly and not leave the field to him.

For this reason, simply and briefly stated, I object to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If I had powers of persuasion I would use them all to induce you to remain as a guard to the Constitution and a constabulary force for the rebel States. Possibly you may not like the office. But I doubt if any of us can be better employed anywhere than in contributing to the success of reconstruction and in preserving the peace throughout that distressed region of country. Sitting in your seats here, you are a mighty police, at the call of general or citizen, and you are also a terror to that evil-doer, the President.

Senators wish to leave. So do I. Nobody can wish to leave more than myself. I suffer much from these heats. I long to be at home; but I feel that it is my duty to be here. All that I have felt before is now intensified by the menace of this veto message. Hereafter no Senator can say that he did not know what to expect. He will not be taken by surprise. Here is distinct and open notice that the President will do all in his power to thwart your legislation and to arrest a just reconstruction. There he stands, a constant impediment to peace, and an ally to the rebellion. And yet knowing these things, you propose to go home and leave him undisturbed master till winter.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the views of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I am surprised that he offers this amendment. He proposes to adjourn to the 16th of October; and I propose to adjourn to the first Monday in December. If his mind is full of fears and apprehensions, if he sees any way in which the President will overthrow the liberties of the country and place the lives of citizens in the South in danger, he certainly ought not to contribute by his vote or by his motion to an adjournment of Congress even for a day. The House of Representatives propose to adjourn in the ordinary way. They are through with their business. We have confined ourselves by a rule which prevents us from passing any measure that does not receive the unanimous approbation of the body. We are through with our business. We know that to remain here after the business which called us together has been disposed of will make probable the passage of bills that ought not to be passed. We are through with the ordinary business of the country. The session of Congress for a day after that business has transpired can be of no public benefit.

The House of Representatives have proposed to adjourn to the middle of November. I should be very willing to comply with the desire of the House if there was any practical good to result from it; and if the House of Representatives really think it is important for us to come here in the middle of November, I for one will be glad to do so. My own judgment is that nothing can be gained by coming two weeks earlier than the usual time. The departmental reports are usually made up to the first Monday of December, and have been time out of mind. To come here two weeks sooner would probably only anticipate the making of the ordinary annual reports. By law those reports are made on the first Monday of December. They will not be made any sooner because we have changed the day of adjournment. Therefore, we gain nothing by coming here before the usual time. If, however, there is anything in the condition of the country unusual or unnatural that in the opinion of the House of Representatives ought to call us here two weeks earlier, I have not the least objection to come; but I must be allowed to express my opinion in the first place that there is no such occasion, and therefore I think we ought to adjourn to the usual time.

Now, it is not right, it seems to me, for me to discuss another proposition named by the Senator from Massachusetts. He says that the President must be removed from office.

Mr. SUMNER. Or Congress must stay here to watch him. I put the alternative proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. If Congress must stay here to watch him we ought to vote down the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts. We ought to insist that he either take one position or the other. Now, it does seem to me a very strange thing that a judge by whose vote alone the President can be removed should declare that he must be removed. We cannot remove the President of the United States until after another political body has declared that he should be impeached, and that body have their proposition before us to adjourn until the middle of November. Now, shall we, the judges, who can only act after the indictment is found, after the grand inquest has been held, decide beforehand that the President ought to be removed before the House of Representatives have laid any indictment, when a committee of that House have declared that the case has not yet arisen for an indictment, and when the House has itself passed a resolution to adjourn until the middle of November? It seems to me this will strike the people of the country with some surprise, and I think we should not add to that surprise by following the lead of the Senator from Massachusetts. If the House of Representatives desire to present an impeachment of any officer of the Government, I am perfectly willing to stay and try him. No such case is presented.

The only question now before us is, whether we shall adjourn to the time proposed by the House of Representatives, the middle of November, or whether we shall adjourn to the first Monday in December. That is a question of very small moment in which I have no feeling, because I should be perfectly willing to come back here in the middle of November if the Senate thought there would be occasion for it; and if, after we have expressed our views, the House shall insist on a session in the middle of November I am perfectly willing to yield. Certainly I see no occasion for us to come here in the middle of the elections, when several of the principal States in the Union will be engaged in canvassing, when many of our political friends will be upon the stump before the people, when the very issues we are now and have been discussing will be before the people, when the great State of New York and the State of Illinois and many of the western States, and many States in the East will be holding their elections. Is it worth while for us to come here from that arena to again discuss these matters here? I think not. My impression is that we ought to adjourn to the usual time; at least until after all the elections are held in all the States, which will be after the first Monday of November.

Mr. WILSON. The House of Representatives by a decisive majority fixed upon the 13th day of November as the day of meeting. I hope the Senate will concur with the House in fixing that day, and therefore I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will not be agreed to. As to what we have heard in this message to-day, I regard it as the most trifling piece of rhetoric I have ever heard for a long while. It will not have the slightest effect North or South. While men are writing such things, that people are settling their own destiny, and nothing can be done at Washington to prevent it, and it will be right and for the country, and I have no anxiety in regard to it or anything that can be done. But the House of Representatives by a large vote have fixed upon this day, the 13th of November, and I hope that we shall agree with the House; that these amendments will be voted down. I remember when—

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that I have no desire at all to vary the time fixed by the House; but the form of the resolution as sent to us is not adapted to the changed condition because the blanks would have to be filled. The language I adopted is the ordinary form of an adjournment and to be followed. As to the time fixed I adopted the suggestion of Senators all around me. The Senate can very easily put in the very time fixed by the House without any trouble.

Mr. WILSON. It will be remembered that the House took this vote at a time when it was quite full. A large number of members have gone home since that time. The House now is a very small body, with but a few over the number necessary for a quorum. Perhaps tomorrow it will be smaller than it is to-day. Therefore I do not think we ought to differ from the deliberate judgment of a large majority of that body, and I hope we shall agree to the time fixed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not know what disposition exists in the House at this time. I know that one of the members of that branch, in conversation, states to me that in his opinion, if the Senate send this resolution back to them amended, as now proposed by the Senator from Ohio, they would very promptly and cheerfully concur in it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Several have said so to me.

Mr. BUCKALEW. How the fact may be I do not know. One thing is certain; if the House do not desire this change to be made they can say so, and then we shall have an authentic expression of their opinion and can act upon it.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] who first spoke, maintains his usual position at the end of this session. I do not remember any occasion when that member supported a resolution of adjournment. I do not remember an occasion when he did not vote for reassembling when the opportunity was afforded him at an early date. In fact I suspect that, if the truth were known, the Senator from Massachusetts would be prepared with business the whole three hundred and sixty-five days of the year, and that if we consult his views we should make a French revolutionary assemblage of the two Houses of Congress; we should be in permanent session without vacation and without recess.

But, sir, what I desired to say in rising, as our proceedings are published and go to the people of this country and throughout the world and are recorded for history, was this: that in my opinion the Senator from Massachusetts forgets his audience and forgets the place where he speaks, in the remarks which he now submits to us, in an alternative form to be sure, but yet conveying pretty expressly and clearly his judgment and opinion upon a very grave question. I must be permitted to say, and that without any feeling of unkindness, without assuming to myself the function of a critic upon a gentleman whose position is as independent as my own, that I consider language of that sort to be a gross impropriety in this presence, in this Chamber, and that it is of evil example, and that out of respect to our political institutions and the Constitution of the country under which we assemble, and to the reasonable and just opinions of the American people, whose servants and servitors we are, we should withhold ourselves from the expression of judgment upon a question which is not here and which cannot come here unless it be brought here by the House of Representatives, over whose action we have no control.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, there is just the point. The Senator says the question is not here; in other words, that this is not the time to discuss the President. He is mistaken; this is the very time to discuss the President. It is here on the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, who now gravely moves that we leave our seats, and from this time forward till December abdicate all guardianship of the public interests. To such a proposition there is but one natural and logical reply. It is that we must not abdicate, so long as Andrew Johnson is in the executive chair. If he is President, we must remain at our posts, precisely as Grant remained before Richmond.

Mr. President, if another person wielded the executive powers of the nation—if there was anybody in that high office mindful of the Constitution as interpreted by the Declaration of Independence, and disposed to carry forward the acts of Congress adopted by such triumphant majorities, then I could vote with Senators to go home. But unhappily it is not so. Anything but this. Our President is a public enemy, the successor in spirit and opinion of Jefferson Davis, through whom the rebellion is once more set on its legs. Who can doubt this? Does any Senator, accustomed to vote with the Union party and to sustain the Union cause, question this simple statement of fact? Does he believe it overdrawn? Let him answer, if he does. Let him say where my language goes by a hair's breadth beyond the exact truth. [Here Mr. SUMNER stopped, as if for an answer and then proceeded.]

Because we have the successor of Jefferson Davis in the presidential chair therefore Congress must stay. That is my argument in a nutshell. A volume or an oration could not make it plainer than it is when I simply state it.

The more I think of this duty the more commanding it seems. The President is the Executive; you are the Legislative. His influence is great; but yours is greater. If you choose to say so you can be the masters. You can apply the corrective to his mischief. Surely here is a motive. Ten States are now exposed to his malign influence, all of which may be arrested by your presence here. Let it be known that you are to continue in your seats, and every Union man throughout the rebel States will feel stronger. He will be conscious at once of a panoply, which the President and the rebel tail of which he is the head cannot penetrate.

There are your generals, also, who, as soon as you are gone, may be his victims. The telegraph may flash to you, in the comfort of your homes, that the gallant Sheridan, as true in government as he was skillful in war, has been driven from his post by an enemy with whom he cannot contend. It may flash to you the removal of Pope, who has shown such talent and thoroughness in the organization of his district; and also the removal of Sickles, who has carried into his new duties such varied experience and patriotic purposes. All this may occur, for the President is vindictive and malignant in his assaults upon the upholders of Human Rights. Is it not worth your care to provide against such calamity? But you propose to go home and leave all, whether citizens or generals, a prey to the President. I protest against it.

Mr. CAMERON. I am in favor of adopting the resolution of the House of Representatives, but for somewhat different reasons from those which have been assigned. In the first place I think an earlier meeting in the autumn than usual would be better for the country and better for the comfort and convenience of members of Congress. I have long thought that it would be better to meet here in October, if our elections would allow us to do it; but it seems they do not. By the 13th of November, however, all the elections will have taken place; and by meeting at that time we shall, in point of fact, add more than a month to our session in the pleasant part of the year.

Mr. JOHNSON. Only two weeks and a half.

Mr. CAMERON. I say more than a month, and I am right. The custom now is to meet on the first Monday in December, and to do no business then, because the Christmas holidays come on so soon; and all of us get ready to go home. It is very natural that we should desire to go home to our families at Christmas. The consequence is that no business is done here until after the first Monday in January. Now, if you meet on the 13th of November you will have a full month of pleasant weather in which to transact the ordinary business of the country. It would be much better than remaining here a month in August, or July, or June even. The custom of meeting in December and having a three months' session one year and a long summer session the next is, I think, injurious to members of Congress, and not advantageous to the country. For this reason I propose to meet the earliest day I can in the autumn, and I shall vote for the resolution as it came from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe that the amendment now names two o'clock to-morrow as the hour for final adjournment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to substitute four o'clock in place of two o'clock. I regret exceedingly that the Senate is disposed at this time to adjourn the present session; but if we are to adjourn to so late a period as the middle of November I would prefer the first Monday of December. I think we ought not to adjourn at all without passing the joint resolution that came from the other House to-day. At present, however, I content myself with moving to substitute four o'clock for two o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see any objection to substituting four for two o'clock. I have no preference as to the hour. The only object I have is to fix the hour of adjournment some time before the trains leave, so that there will be a possibility of gentlemen getting off by the evening trains.

Mr. JOHNSON, and others. Say three o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told that a train leaves at half past four, and several Senators suggest three o'clock as the proper hour.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; I will compromise on three.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will accept that modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is modified by substituting three o'clock for two o'clock.

Mr. NYE. Do I understand that the vote on this amendment determines the question of adjourning to November or December?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, which proposes an adjournment to December.

Mr. NYE. And that amendment fixes December as the time for our meeting? ["Yes."]

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wants a decisive vote, as there is no use in wasting time on a question of this kind, he can move to amend my amendment by inserting the 13th of November instead of the first Monday of December, and have the yeas and nays taken on that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not take them on this amendment, and let those who want to meet on the 13th of November vote against the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; that will do. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Davis, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Edmunds, Howard, Howe, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Stewart, Wiley, and Williams—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. SUMNER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. Let the resolution be read as it now stands amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, at three o'clock p. m. on the 20th day of July instant, adjourn their respective Houses, to meet on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise merely to say that I think it unsafe for Congress to adjourn until the first of December. I am well satisfied in my own mind that our attendance here will be needed before that time; and I draw this conclusion from the extraordinary tone of the message which has been sent to us to-day. I see in that message the same defiant, revolutionary spirit which has marked all the messages of the present incumbent of the presidential chair on the subject of reconstruction. I am quite satisfied that it is his determination, by force or fraud, by any means within his reach, to defeat the great ends which Congress have in view by their reconstruction acts; and I think it is our bounden duty to be in such an attitude as will enable us, so far as practicable, to carry out that policy firmly and unflinchingly, let what will come.

By a remark which I have just heard drop from the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY], that Senator, I learn, seems to infer that with my feelings I ought to vote against any adjournment. That does not follow at all. We can adjourn to some intermediate time, which will put us in a position to check and thwart the action of the executive department should we see fit to do so. But if we now adjourn until the first Monday of December, we give him the space of four months and a half within which to operate, and, so to speak, to checkmate us and our legislation. I think it unsafe to adjourn so long.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14, as follows:—

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Harlan, Howard, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Guthrie, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Stewart, Willey, and Williams—16.

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now ask leave to be allowed to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs the little bill to which I referred a short time ago, and I wish to have the Senate consider it at once. It is highly important that it should be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to report a bill and have it considered at this time. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 137) amendatory of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask that it be put on its passage at once.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to repeal the concluding portion of section six of an act approved March 29, 1867, in the words following:

"And all laws allowing the President, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to enter into treaties with Indian tribes are hereby repealed; and no expense shall hereafter be incurred in negotiating a treaty with any Indian tribe until an appropriation authorizing such expenditure shall be first made by law."

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSENGERS AND PAGES.

Mr. NYE. I desire to submit a resolution, and to give notice that I shall call it up tomorrow:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized to retain during the coming recess the special messengers and pages now in his employ.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 19, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BOYER. I ask consent to make a brief personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOYER. Yesterday I objected to the reference of a certain communication sent to the House through the Speaker by a Senator and five Representatives of the Legislature of Arkansas. As it is reported by the Associated Press it would appear as if the objection had been a captious one. But I did not intend to object to the reception of the communication by this House, or to its reference to the Committee on Reconstruction, provided the communication would be permitted to be read to the House. My efforts to procure the reading of the communication were ineffectual, and it was on that account that I objected to its reference to the Reconstruction Committee, well knowing that after it had once passed into that receptacle it would be the last that we were likely to hear of it. I thought the communication was of such a character, and came from such a source as to entitle it at least to be read for the information of the House for which it was designed.

I beg leave to disclaim any disrespect to the Speaker in objecting as I did to his proposition. It could not be my intention to do so with the feelings which I entertain toward him, and in view of the well-known fact that he has been repeatedly thanked by the unanimous vote of this House for the impartial manner in which he has presided over its deliberations. But I do think, as I trust the House will so even now consider it, that the communication referred to ought to be read for the information of the House.

It is well known to all that this House has been in the habit of listening to communications received from private individuals in the form of letters, telegrams, &c., addressed to this body or to individual members of it, which favor the plans of the majority of Congress for the reconstruction of the Union. I did not at the time I objected know what were the contents of the particular communication referred to from the members of the Legislature of Arkansas; but coming as it did from the Representatives of a State, I thought it was entitled to a respectful hearing on the part of members of this House. Therefore it was that I objected to its reference, without a reading, to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. In response to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair will state that he received the communication by mail, signed by one Senator and five Representatives claiming to be members of the General Assembly of Arkansas. The Chair could present it in two ways; either by handing it to the Journal Clerk, under the rule, or bringing it before the House. The reading of the paper would have opened the whole question of reconstruction for debate in the House. It had then been engaged for a long time discussing an executive communication presented by the Speaker. The Chair, in giving a brief statement of the contents of the protest, said if there was no objection it would be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, supposing that the gentlemen who signed it would prefer to have it presented to the House in that way. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objected, as he had a right to do, and the Chair did not of course except to such objection, and he then presented the paper, like other members, under the rules.

EXPULSION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

No objection was made.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to have read what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"THE EXPULSION OF INNOCENT MEN FROM CONGRESS.—Mr. Lowe, in a recent discussion in the English House of Commons, said: 'My honorable friend, the member for Reading, said that a majority in America had never been known to abuse its power. I will take one instance, which is just as good as a thousand. Certain things became necessary for the Republican party, which could not be carried without a majority of two thirds of Congress. Everybody knows that members who were innocent men were expelled from the Legislature in order to obtain the necessary Republican majority.'"

Mr. DAWES. The extract which I have sent up to the Clerk is from the National Intelligencer of this morning. So far as anything may be said in a partisan newspaper touching the character of the Republican party of the United States, I do not deem it worth while to take any notice of it, because before the American people the Republican party has vindicated itself, and certainly needs no word of defense from me, but a statement of the character which has been read at the Clerk's desk, made in the British Parliament, and apparently uncontradicted, I do deem worthy of some notice. The charge in the paper is that it having become necessary in the opinion of the Republican party of the country to carry certain measures that required a two-thirds vote, innocent members were expelled from Congress in order to secure a two-thirds majority.

I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to show that it was impossible that this thing could be done, for, under the Constitution of the United States, no man can be expelled from Congress without a vote of two thirds, and that therefore it would be impossible for the Republican party to obtain thereby the necessary majority, for they must first have that necessary majority before the expulsion can take place. Since the existence of the Republican party there have been only two members, so far as I remember, expelled from the House. Those men were expelled for active participation in the rebellion against the Government of the United States, and in expelling them there was no such thing as party division. I wish to say farther, that if the member of Parliament who made this statement intended to make a broader charge, and to say that members of the House of Representatives or of Congress had been unseated upon the report of the Committee of Elections, or otherwise, in order to obtain thereby a two-thirds majority he was mistaken, and the record will demonstrate that fact. I deem it proper, having been connected with the Committee of Elections, in a responsible position, almost during the whole life of the Republican party, to contradict the charge, and to make the simple statement of fact that since the adoption of measures requiring a two-thirds vote have become necessary in order to save the Government of the United States there has always been a Republican majority far exceeding the requisite two-thirds majority, and no man has been unseated from this House upon the report of the Committee of Elections whose unseating in any way affected the majority. At no time since it has been necessary to adopt measures requiring a two-thirds vote has the Republican party been in want of votes to meet the emergency. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the expulsion of Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks;] the refusal of a seat to Mr. Baldwin, of Michigan, when he was justly entitled to admission; the expulsion of a Senator from New Jersey in the other branch of Congress, in order that a two-thirds majority might be insured.

Mr. DAWES. Technically speaking those were no expulsions. Those were votes of the House or the Senate that the gentlemen referred to were not legally elected. I was not commenting upon the merits of those cases. It does not become the House of Representatives to review its action on such questions for the satisfaction of the British Parliament. But, sir, I was showing, as I think I did show, that our action could not have been for the purpose specified by the member of the British Parliament, that is, to obtain a two-thirds vote; for without the votes of the individuals who have been named by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] the two-thirds power of this House was already with the Republican party, so as not to be affected by the action of the House on those cases.

Mr. ROSS. Perhaps that may not have been known at the time. I would suggest that some men on the other side of the House are very weak-kneed and have not much blood in their veins; consequently it became necessary to turn out some members on this side in order to insure a two-thirds majority.

Mr. DAWES. The Lord has the country in His keeping, and has ever furnished means and power sufficient to meet every attack upon it.

Mr. PRUYN. It seems to me that before formal notice is taken in this way by the House, or any member of it, of proceedings in the British Parliament it might be well to understand distinctly and clearly what was said and done on the occasion referred to. In the Intelligencer, in which the statement is published this morning, I observed no authority given for it; nor does the statement refer to the committee of which the gentleman from Massachusetts is chairman. Assuming that the quotation is correct, I infer that the member of the Parliament named intended to refer to a great general principle which had governed the conduct of the House, not in the matter of an actual expulsion by a vote of the House of any large number of members, but in what ended in the same thing—the refusal of the House to permit representation from such parts of the Union as were not in accord politically with the majority of the House. The result is the same in either case, whether there was an actual expulsion or an unwillingness or refusal to permit persons from certain States to occupy seats. This, I suppose, was the view intended to be taken of this matter by the gentleman referred to. He did not, I presume, design to speak by way of censure upon the action of the committee of which the gentleman is chairman.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I have not the same facilities as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] for knowing what the gentleman in the British Parliament intended to say. I am compelled to take what he did say as an indication of what he meant. I think I have given to the statement all the attention that is due from the American House of Representatives to so groundless a charge made in the British Parliament. Therefore I do not care to pursue the question further.

TRIBUTE TO MR. LINCOLN.

Mr. JUDD. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Whereas about a year since a stone commemorating the virtues of Mr. Lincoln was transmitted by the people of Rome to the President of the United States, bearing a Latin inscription, of which the following is a translation: "The citizens of Rome dedicate this stone, taken from the tomb of Servius Tullius, to Abraham Lincoln, a President for the second term of the United States of America, by which the memory of either brave defender of liberty may be joined to that of the other;" and whereas this beautiful memorial has been allowed to remain in the cellar of the White House, where it now lies surrounded with the usual rubbish of such a place: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives. That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to cause the same to be sent to this body, that it may be given a conspicuous place in the national Capitol.

And be it further resolved. That in case it cannot be found till after the close of the present session the Commissioner of Public Buildings be directed to institute a search for the same, and in case it be successful that he cause the block to be placed in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, to the end that this beautiful tribute to the memory of our late President may be preserved to the nation.

There was no objection; and the preamble and resolution were accordingly received.

The SPEAKER. There is now no Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Mr. JUDD. I will modify the resolution in that respect, and say it shall be referred to the officer who has charge of the public buildings.

The SPEAKER. He is an officer of the Engineer corps.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, without detailing any of the facts relating to this matter, without impugning anybody or anything, I will only say that the facts stated in that preamble and resolution are true. I think it is due to the nation that stone from the Liberals of Rome to commemorate the deeds of Abraham Lincoln should have a proper space in our archives.

The preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. JUDD moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. NOBEL presented the memorial of William F. Switzer, contesting the right of Hon. George W. Anderson to a seat from the ninth congressional district of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

ASSASSINATION COMMITTEE.

The question in order, as unfinished business, was a motion made yesterday by Mr. BUTLER to suspend the rules to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved. That the committee for the investigation of the assassination of the President be, and is, authorized to conduct the investigation by such subcommittees as the committee may appoint, and at such places as may be convenient; and such subcommittees shall be authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. ROSS. I objected to that resolution yesterday supposing there were nine members on the committee. I wanted a sub-committee to consist of at least three; but as there are only five on the committee I withdraw my objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROSS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LINCOLN. I ask unanimous consent of the House to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is rumored and believed that frauds and peculations are being committed in the office of the Paymaster General: Therefore,

Be it resolved. That a committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to investigate the workings of the Paymaster General's office and all transactions connected with the pay department, with a view to detect the errors and frauds therein, with power to employ a clerk and stenographer, and to send for persons and papers, with the privilege of holding their sessions during the recess of the session of Congress, and in such number and places as said committee shall deem best for the public interest, with the privilege of reporting at any time they may be prepared to do so.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. LINCOLN. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROSS. I do not think there are members enough on all these committees.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 38.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. VAN TRUMP were appointed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the rules be suspended, will it be in order to move an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will if the previous question be not demanded and seconded.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 29.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to say a word.

Mr. LINCOLN. I cannot yield, but demand the previous question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If we cannot be heard I hope that the resolution will be voted down.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to put a question to the Chair. Does not this resolution assume that these frauds have been committed?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to know whether this House is ready to vote for a resolution—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LINCOLN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire only to make a suggestion. The gentleman is probably in possession of some facts which induced him to offer a resolution of this kind to the House. Now, without calling the previous question and bringing members of the House to vote in the dark, which will probably result in the loss of his proposition, which may be founded upon something rendering investigation proper, I appeal to him to explain to the House why he offers a resolution of this kind, not confining himself to the general allegation that it is rumored and believed that there are frauds and peculations. I have no doubt the House would be willing to order an investigation if it can be founded upon the statement of any member of the House showing probable cause. I have no doubt under these circumstances those whose conduct is proposed to be investigated would be perfectly willing the investigation should take place. But it seems to me it is proper for the gentleman to disclose to the House some of the reasons why he offers the resolution.

Mr. LINCOLN. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for the purpose of saying a word in explanation. Charges and allegations have been made that there are transactions connected with the paymaster's office that need investigation. Several gentlemen in connection with myself have for three or four months been looking into matters connected with the operations of that office, and we have in our possession papers and facts which lead us to believe that the transactions of the bureau ought to be investigated. There are allegations that have been made and to be made that clearly need investigation. I do not propose here to reiterate the charges, or make specifications. I will only say this: that there are persons connected with that department and in this House who are cognizant of facts, who have evidence before them which satisfies them that this investigation is demanded.

Mr. PRUYN. Do I understand the gentleman to say members of this House?

Mr. LINCOLN. There are members of the House who have seen letters and heard statements which lead them to believe that the investigation is demanded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. LINCOLN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me it is improper for us to appoint special committees on outside hearsay statements. I do not know that any member of the House can vouch for the responsibility of the charges by stating by whom they are made or in what paper he finds them, or who writes communications embodying them. They are based, as I understand, on mere rumor, without disclosing to the House the names of the persons who give currency to them. That, I apprehend, is not sufficient for the appointment of a committee of investigation. All these special committees are empowered to employ a clerk and stenographer, and to travel over the country doing business which the committees of this House are adequate to perform; it seems to me, in a great many instances now. I would like to know of some basis or other for the appointment of a committee of investigation into the affairs of that bureau; for in all my business transactions with it or with its head I have found none that is conducted with more wisdom or diligence than that of the pay department of the Government. I would like to have something that is tangible, some basis for our action. It is said a clerk has made some statements, and that somebody else has written a letter; but who the clerk is and who wrote the letter the Lord only knows. Let us know who make the charges.

Mr. LINCOLN. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I know nothing about this matter. Like the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH], I have always had the highest opinion of the pay department and its management. But I understand from gentlemen that there is good cause for this investigation, and I call upon my colleague, [Mr. COBB], who has investigated this matter, to make a statement to the House of his knowledge on the subject. I certainly do not wish to vote for a resolution that shall cast any reflection upon any department of the Government unnecessarily, and if there are any facts in addition to those stated I shall be glad to hear of them.

Mr. COBB. I did not design to say a word upon this subject, nor should I have done so had I not been called upon by name by my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURN]. I have not prepared any remarks, and I was not aware until a moment ago that this resolution was to be offered. But I will state that some time last winter I was called upon by a gentleman who formerly served with me in the Army, and has since been acting as a claim agent in this city, to go with him and hear an investigation before the Second Auditor of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller in regard to certain claims that had been filed in the pay department, and had been transferred to the Second Auditor for settlement. They were the claims of certain colored soldiers. I heard the investigation and the evidence and arguments before those two officers, and that investigation disclosed a state of things which led me to wonder why the gentlemen connected with the pay department have rested so long without an investigation at the hands of Congress, or some competent tribunal of the Government, so that the facts vindicating them may be spread before the country. It is no friendship toward the officers of this department for gentlemen here to attempt to stifle investigation.

I cannot now enter into a particular account of this matter, but will briefly state that these claims were of those filed in the pay department by the late Jacob Lowanthall, claim agent, of this city. In the course of this investigation it was pretty clearly proved that a large number of claims had been paid to Lowanthall, as agent for colored soldiers, upon papers made out in this city and never seen or signed by the soldiers whose claims they purported to be, and the evidence left a painful impression upon my mind that at the time of their payment these claims were known to be forgeries by some connected with the pay department. It seemed from evidence read at that investigation that papers purporting to be from each man of several colored regiments mustered in and mustered out at New Orleans, and not a man of whom had ever been further north than that city, had been presented by Lowanthall, and which purported to have been executed before one J. Trubner Lovejoy, a notary public of New York, but which were really fraudulently executed on Pennsylvania avenue, in this city, in the office of these claim agents. These claims were paid by the pay department when, to say the least of it, there were circumstances or appearances of suspicion about it sufficient to have put the disbursing officers on their inquiry.

I will only add that gentlemen may remember the account of this matter that was published some time last winter in the New York Times. I read that account when the facts as elicited were fresh in my memory; and so far as that account purports to give the facts as brought out in the said investigation it is true and fair, and gives the same much fuller and more perfectly than I can at this time.

Mr. Speaker, like other gentlemen here, I have great respect for the officers of this department, but I do think that an investigation should be made into these facts.

Mr. LINCOLN. I yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. After the statement we have heard from the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB,] I shall withdraw all objection to the appointment of the committee. I never oppose the appointment of investigating committees where distinct charges are made, and it would seem that that is the case now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the gentleman from New York will modify his resolution. I do not believe that it is according to parliamentary custom to introduce a resolution of this character, committing the House to an expression of a belief in the guilt of the person mentioned in the resolution. I hope the gentleman will strike out the words "and belief."

Mr. LINCOLN. I will do that; and I wish to say a single word in explanation. Since February last I have been giving attention to this subject in connection with other gentlemen; and I have in my possession documents which I believe will establish all that has been stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB.] I did not see fit to make specific charges here; but I assure the House that there are now in the possession of certain parties in this city papers which will show that in that department claims have been paid which ought not to have been paid, and that the parties paying them understood this fact perfectly well. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. LINCOLN moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF SOLDIERS' BOUNTIES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution which I am directed to offer by the select Committee on the Subject of the Payment of Soldiers' Bounty Claims:

Resolved, That the Committee on Soldiers' Bounty Claims be authorized to inquire generally into the cause of the delay in the payment of said bounties, with power to examine witnesses and send for persons and papers.

I am instructed by the committee to ask this additional power, satisfied that they can probe this thing to the bottom, and show clearly the cause of the delay in the settlement of these claims.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and adopted.

TAXATION OF GIFT ENTERPRISES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the facts and reasons upon which an order was issued on the 3d day of June, 1867, by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, exempting George W. Thomas from the payment of special tax or other duty on what said Thomas pretended to be a charitable enterprise.

If the House will permit me to occupy a few moments, I will state my reason for offering this resolution. It is not designed to reflect in the least upon the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I have offered it simply with the view of obtaining the information indicated, so that at the next session of Congress we may strike out a very mischievous provision of the present law giving a species of governmental toleration to raffling, gambling, and lotteries, when conducted, as the phrase is, "for charitable or religious purposes." I understand that in the case mentioned in the resolution there has been granted to this man Thomas an exemption from the tax ordinarily imposed by the law, on the ground that this is a "charitable enterprise." I desire to obtain a statement of the reasons upon which has been based the conclusion that this is a "charitable enterprise." By Thomas's programme or circulars, which he is scattering all over the country, it appears that this scheme is indorsed semi-officially by the Government, and on this ground the attention and encouragement of the benevolent are claimed for it. I want to know on what grounds this Government has been committed to a lottery, a gambling operation, designed really to put money in the pocket of this man Thomas. He would not dare to open his lottery office in the city of New York or the city of Chicago. Such men have been driven out of those cities and the other money-centers of the North. The police have scourged all such persons into apparent submission to the laws. They have come here, where there is found a sort of city of refuge for such lottery dealers and gamblers.

General Howard, it appears, has consented to act as the distributor of $150,000, which it is proposed to place in his hands. I can very easily see how, by certain letters and descriptive representations, General Howard may have been induced to consent to act in this capacity, as I can also understand why this man Thomas should seek to obtain for his scheme the apparent sanction of a name which is with all good and true men a tower of strength, and might induce many to scan less carefully the character and operations of the design. But, sir, if General Howard, after having seen the programme issued by this man Thomas, and in which the sanction of his name is publicly claimed, sits by and suffers this violation of law and good morals to be perpetrated with his tacit approval, then he implicates himself with those who devise and carry out this unlawful and immoral scheme. And, sir, if the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, after he shall have seen this programme, shall still suffer the name of the Government and the seal of his office to be used to exempt this man Thomas from the payment of tax in the prosecution of this scheme, he then becomes a participant in its criminality, if criminal it be.

Now, sir, this man Thomas started a lottery scheme in the city of New York which was the father of all the other schemes since flooding the country. He then proposed to raise some money for a "Home for the Orphans of the War." He proposed to raise $250,000, one half of which sum was to be donated to the object proposed, the remainder to be invested in presents for distribution to those who should purchase tickets. He raised nearly four hundred thousand dollars, and probably gave about one hundred thousand dollars or less to the "Home" referred to; the larger part of the remaining $300,000 he put into his own pocket. In this manner presents were given said to be worth dollars which were not worth so many cents. So great was the indignation throughout the country the result was that swindlers of a like kind were driven from the city of New York, and this man Thomas dare not open this second lottery and swindling scheme in that city. But, sir, he next started the picture dodge. He is to give a man a picture probably worth about ten, twenty-five, or fifty cents. He has an office in this city where he claims to have the pictures exposed, as Peter Funks generally do. He has probably some artistic specimens which he exhibits for people to look at. He now proposes to raise $500,000, of which $150,000 for the destitute in the South is to be placed in the hands of General Howard; $150,000 in money is to be drawn as prizes, thus giving the character of a lottery to the project. I have the programme in my hand. It is a lottery pure and simple which has been denounced and made illegal by every Christian community as antagonistic to good morals. Three hundred thousand dollars is to be disposed of in this way, and the remaining $200,000 principally is to go into the pocket of Thomas. It is to be conducted I presume as the New York scheme, so at least has been claimed; and I want to say that that scheme was a fraud, a cheat, and a swindle. I want, sir, that some expression shall go forth from this House, inasmuch as it seems to be indorsed by men in whom we all have confidence. It is for that reason I have made this statement—that this branch of the Government shall brand any attempt to violate the letter or spirit of the law against gambling, no matter how careful the originators may be to conceal the design under specious pretexts or behind honorable names.

The fact of all this effort to sugar-coat and gild this crime only intensifies the guilt and makes the criminal more deserving reprobation. To bestow prizes cannot be done in any lawful manner by even "five prominent citizens," as he claims. The very proposition is in contempt of the law and an outrage to the moral sentiment of the nation. Gaming and lotteries with the sanction of religious societies under the guise of aids to the church, covered oftentimes with the mantle of charity to the sick and needy, have done far more of evil to all classes, ages, and even sexes, to promote and encourage the spirit which leads to the dice-box and faro table than all the open lotteries and public gaming-tables in the country.

The resolution was adopted.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a report made under act of Congress by Captain, now Major General, A. A. Humphreys on the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi river and the protection of the alluvial lands from overflow. The large part of this report is purely scientific, and probably not interesting to the general public. There are three chapters, one on the Mississippi river below the mouth of the Missouri river, one on the method of protection against overflow of the Mississippi river, and one on the delta of the Mississippi river, which contain practical facts gathered during five years of incessant labor by Captain Humphreys, that will furnish to every member of this House information essential to enable him to vote intelligently upon the question of protecting the alluvial lands of the Mississippi river against overflow. It is information we must have, for the question of the Mississippi levees is one that we must meet and decide at an early day. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to submit a resolution authorizing the printing of those three chapters, together with one map and the introductory matter, making in all about two hundred pages, which will cost a mere nominal sum. I should like to ask for the printing of the whole book, except for its size and the expenditure that it would require.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be ordered to be printed for the use of the House the usual number of copies of the introductory letter, chapters Nos. 2, 6, and 7, and plate No. 2 of the report on the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi river and the protection of the alluvial regions against overflow, made under acts of Congress by Captain, now Major General, A. A. Humphreys, of the engineer department of the United States Army.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I think that resolution ought to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PILE. This is only for printing the usual number which it is customary to print without reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. There are maps to be printed, which are costly. I make the motion to refer.

Mr. PILE. I cannot yield for that purpose. The map is a small colored plate; and if that is the only ground of objection I will leave that out. I do not think it is essential, though important to the understanding of these three chapters.

Mr. PIKE. What will the work cost?

Mr. PILE. I cannot say exactly, but the expense will be small.

Mr. PIKE. The original report most of the members present have received and read. I certainly examined it some years ago with great care, and possessed myself of some material facts in the case. What the special object is now in having it printed or rather reprinted I do not know, nor what the cost would be.

Mr. PILE. In answer to the gentleman from Maine, I will say that I inquired at the engineer's department and the War Department and ascertained that but a few copies of the work were printed, and those by order of the War Department, and paid for out of the contingent fund belonging to that Department. I further learned that there are no copies now for distribution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. This is a work I have never seen until recently, when I saw it in the hands of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE,] and I presume it has not been seen by ten members of this House. It is very important. It contains information upon which we shall be called upon to act speedily in regard to the great question of leveeing the Mississippi river. I hope there will be no objection to the printing.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes ten members of the House will read it after it is printed?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I certainly hope they will. It is important enough to arrest the attention of every member of this House who has the welfare of the country at heart.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It will be more than is usually the case in regard to Congressional documents if five members read it.

Mr. WARD. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri, as no one is able to give us the cost of this publication, and as we shall probably not need this information until the Committee on Printing or some committee can investigate the case and determine whether it should be printed or not, that he give way for a motion to refer it to the Committee on Printing. If the gentleman will not yield for such a motion I trust the House will vote down the previous question in order that the motion can be made.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to oppose the suggestion of the gentleman from New York. As there is no Committee on Printing now organized I hope the House will take this resolution into its own hands and pass it.

Mr. WARD. I understand that committee is organized.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It seems to me it is not organized when the members of it are all absent.

The SPEAKER. Only one member of the committee is now present. The committee has been appointed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am aware it was appointed at the March session. But, sir, how much is involved in this resolution in the way of expenditure? Not more than $150. The cost will not exceed ten cents per copy.

A MEMBER. You cannot get it printed for that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think we can. The cost, at all events, is so small that it should not weigh a feather against the printing of a document which will impart so much information to a great many people in the country who cannot otherwise obtain it.

Mr. PILE. The information contained and compressed within the three chapters I propose to have printed has already cost for its collection a number of thousands of dollars. It has cost the labor of two of the most efficient engineers of the Government for five consecutive years. It relates to a district of country embracing over thirty-five thousand square miles, which, if protected from the overflow of the Mississippi river, has agricultural capacity unequaled by any other equal area on the face of the globe or that the sun has ever seen in the six thousand years that he has been turning his face toward it.

Now then, if after the expenditure of all this money and labor for the collection of this information for the use of the country, we do not need to have it printed, knowing that we shall need the information contained in these chapters at an early day at the next session of Congress, I am greatly in error, and I am surprised that any gentleman should object to the expenditure of the paltry sum required to place this information in the hands of the members of this House, in order that they may be able to vote intelligently upon the question that will be presented to us early in the next session. And in reply to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] I wish to say that I do not at all entertain the reflection upon the industry, intelligence, and conscientiousness of this House made by him, but hope and believe that gentlemen, knowing that they must meet this question, will not do so without reading the information contained in the chapters that I propose to have printed. I think the intimation that they will not read it is out of place, not to say disrespectful to members of this body. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. I have not objected to this resolution. I simply ask that the resolution shall be referred to the Committee on Printing, so that the House in passing it may know what expense they are about to incur. One gentleman says that this document will cost only ten cents a copy, and another gentleman who professes to know something of the printing business says that it will cost a dollar a copy. Let us have information from the Printing Committee of this House. It is said that the committee is not organized. I understand that there is one member of the committee present, and he can confer with the Superintendent of Public Printing and can make an estimate of the cost of this printing in a few minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am inclined to go for the printing asked for here; but my attention is particularly attracted to this matter from the fact that I propose to follow it with a proposition to print another small document from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to the retention of Rear Admiral Goldsborough on the active list, and it involves a correspondence exceedingly interesting to those connected with the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy, or rather the Assistant Secretary, has suggested that the Department would be exceedingly glad to have five hundred copies of this document. It will be a saving of composition and press work to have the work done now when it is going through the press in the Public Printing office. I would suggest that by unanimous consent we authorize the Speaker to appoint a temporary Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he learns that the only member of the Committee on Printing who has been in attendance here has been called home by the illness of his wife, and that now there is no member of the committee here.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask, then, that by unanimous consent the Chair shall appoint a temporary Committee on Printing.

No objection was made; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. CLARKE of Ohio, GETZ, and TROWBRIDGE.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SCHENCK then, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the two executive documents relating to the retention of Rear Admiral Goldsborough on the active list of the Navy be printed for the use of this House, except five hundred copies of the same, which shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Navy.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. DRIGGS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas it is reported that great damage has been sustained to the crops and other property on the shores of the Mississippi and its tributaries by the overflowing of their banks and the destruction of the levees; and whereas appeals are made to the Government by the inhabitants of some of the States lately in rebellion for aid to repair the damage thus created; and whereas it is the anxious desire of Congress that all portions of the country shall receive a just share of its protection and fostering care, and to that end looks with earnest solicitude for the return of the inhabitants of those States to unswerving loyalty to the Government against which they rebelled, by accepting in good faith and carrying out without obstruction the laws of Congress in their case provided; and whereas neither Congress nor the loyal people of the country desire to withhold from any portion of the inhabitants under our flag any of the rights or benefits to which all loyal citizens are entitled: Therefore,

Resolved, That Congress desires the immediate restoration by a full and perfect return to allegiance of all the States lately in rebellion; and that as soon as this is done, and true and undivided Union men are returned to Congress, that the States and such members will be admitted to full communion in the Government, and the benefits of legislation extended to all the States without distinction.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire whether, under the rule adopted by the House, that resolution should not be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction?

The SPEAKER. It should be, unless the resolution is introduced by unanimous consent or the rules are suspended for its introduction by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will ask the gentleman whether he will not let this resolution go to the Committee on Reconstruction, under the rule, or whether he desires to have it acted on at the present time?

The SPEAKER. It cannot be presented except by unanimous consent or by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Who offered this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. DRIGGS.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why, sir, it is the grandest joke I ever heard, coming from that side of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the introduction of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I think that the preamble and resolution sufficiently explain themselves—

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a question of order. Is this resolution debatable? Does not the rule require that everything relating to reconstruction shall go to the committee on that subject without debate?

The SPEAKER. This resolution has been received by unanimous consent, and is now before the House for its consideration. But the Chair will state that the rule during the present session is precisely the reverse of that stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.] Under the rule at the present session matters relating to reconstruction can be brought before the House for consideration, while all other matters must be laid on the table or referred without debate. The rule which has heretofore prevailed was changed at this session.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It appears to me that this resolution refers not only to reconstruction, but to "all other matters," so that I think, under the rule as stated by the Chair, it should be referred without debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the granting of unanimous consent as being equivalent to a suspension of the rules for the purpose of considering the resolution.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I am not in the habit of rising to discuss every question that comes before the House; and I do not desire to discuss this proposition. I trust that it will commend itself to the favorable consideration of members. I call the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will yield to hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to inquire whether this resolution, if it be adopted, will permit Congress to rebuild the levees on the Mississippi river; or if the gentleman thinks that we shall not be permitted under this resolution to rebuild those levees, then I desire to ask whether it is not an imposition upon the southern people to intimate to them that that will be done in case they do certain things. For one, I do not wish to be committed at the present time to the rebuilding of those levees; nor do I wish to intimate to those people that if they do certain things we will rebuild the levees.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will answer the gentleman's first question. This resolution will permit Congress, when these States and their people shall have returned to perfect loyalty, to extend to them equal beneficial legislation. That question being answered, I answer the second question by saying that the resolution does not propose any imposition upon the southern people. It simply proposes to extend to them equal legislation when they shall return to loyalty.

Mr. COVODE and several other members addressed the Chair.

Mr. DRIGGS. I cannot yield further. I insist on the call for the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to inquire of the Speaker whether, if the previous question be not sustained, it will not be in order to refer the resolution?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question be not sustained a motion to refer will be in order.

The question being taken on sustaining the previous question, there were—ayes 30, noes 53: no quorum voting.

Mr. DRIGGS. As there seems to be a desire that this resolution shall be referred, I am willing to consent to its reference; and I withdraw my demand for the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] has not been induced to consent to the reference of the resolution by any idea that we on this side of the House are opposed to it. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. SCOFIELD was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. How long?

Mr. MUNGEN. I ask for two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNGEN. The point I rise to, sir, is this: I understood the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] in his discussion, or in the remarks which fell from his lips in regard to the printing of certain chapters of a scientific work—

A MEMBER. Humphrey's Report.

Mr. MUNGEN. Well, sir, he stated that the sun had been shining for six thousand years upon the Mississippi river. Inasmuch as no one questioned the statement then, I propose to raise the question now. I may in my ethnological views be in error, but I wish that the gentleman may be geographically correct. I ask, therefore, that his statement shall be specially submitted to the committee. If it is to go as a fixed fact, then all of our geographies must stand out of the road. I hope the matter will be decided by reference to some scientific board. [Laughter.]

Mr. PILE. I ask for three minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. PILE. The gentleman is so absorbed in his ethnological investigations that he did not hear, or hearing did not understand, what I said. I said for about six thousand years the sun had been shining. I did not say it had been shining precisely that length of time. I ventured no opinion on that subject, not having investigated it so minutely. I did not consider it essential to the resolution I proposed. I hope the gentleman will be appointed a committee of one to inquire in reference to all the heavenly bodies, with power to report by bill or otherwise. [Laughter.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the call of committees for reports.

COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on the Rules, submitted an adverse report on the following resolution; which was laid on the table:

Resolved, That an additional standing committee of nine members, to be known as the Committee on Internal Revenue, be appointed as the other standing committees of this House are appointed, to which shall be referred all such matters as pertain to the internal revenue department of the United States.

EDUCATION.

Mr. BANKS, from the same committee, reported the following resolution, and demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That an additional standing committee of nine members, to be known as the Committee on Education, be appointed as the other standing committees are appointed, to which shall be referred all such matters as pertain to the educational interests of the United States.

Mr. BAKER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment of explanation.

Mr. BANKS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BAKER. I desire that the House shall be advised of the existing condition of its committees in order that they may vote intelligently and understandingly upon the very singular, and to me unaccountable, report now presented from the Committee on the Rules. On the 21st day of March last this House adopted a rule that there should be raised a committee of nine members on the subjects of education and labor, to which committee all resolutions, reports, and matters relating to education and labor should be referred. Now, what propriety, what consistency, what logic of reason there is in establishing a second committee on education is more than I am able to say. We might as well have here a duplicate of our Committee on the Pacific Railroad, we might as well have a duplicate of the Judiciary Committee, or of the Committee of Ways and Means. There is already a committee provided for taking cognizance of and action on this whole matter of education; and to show I am correct I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read our procedure on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.

"Mr. BANKS. The Committee on the Rules, to whom was referred the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] for the appointment of a standing committee on labor, respectfully report that as the recent establishment of a Department of Education seems to render necessary the organization of a committee on that subject, they propose the adoption of the following rule, upon which I call the previous question:

"RULE.—There shall be appointed at each Congress a Committee on Education and Labor, to consist of nine members, to whom shall be referred all petitions, bills, reports, and resolutions on those subjects, and who shall from time to time report thereon."

"The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the rule was adopted."

"Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the rule was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table."

"The latter motion was agreed to."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, one more remark and I am done. It is entirely apparent, then, that we have a committee already provided, having explicit charge of all the matters that are proposed to be conferred upon a committee yet to be raised, so that if the committee now proposed shall be appointed, then we shall have in this House two committees having charge and jurisdiction of the same subject-matter, making conflicting reports thereon. As I stated, I am not able to see what logic or reason there is for offering this resolution. There may be some sort of logic in it that I do not comprehend, but I take it that unless there be some bearing of the resolution which has escaped my attention, and to which I would pay attention very respectfully if it is disclosed, the House will, as a matter of course, reject this report.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Illinois labors under a misapprehension as to the effect of this resolution. It is simply to divide a committee which was appointed at the last session, which embraces two subjects, that of labor and that of education. It was the desire of the gentleman from Illinois at the last session that the committee on labor should be a distinct committee, and the gentlemen who were interested in the subject of education desired that that should also be a distinct committee. The effect of the resolution now reported is to comply with the views of those gentlemen in both respects; it is to divide the Committee on Labor and Education into two committees, leaving that on labor standing as provided last session, and providing for another independent committee on the subject of education. If the House should agree to the resolution now reported, the Committee on the Rules will then report to the House a rule which will remove all difficulty arising out of the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois. I trust he will not make objection to it. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and the question being taken on the adoption of the resolution, there were—ayes 31, noes 48; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BANKS and BAKER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 28, noes 60.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

Mr. BAKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated as the next business in order the call of the committees for reports.

The committees were called and no reports were made.

INDIAN WAR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate bill No. 186, to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WINDOM. I should be very glad if it were the pleasure of the House to consider this bill at once. It is a most important bill, but I am afraid to ask to have it considered now without having it printed. On the other hand, I am fearful to let it go over lest Congress should adjourn without acting upon it. If we should go home without acting upon this subject this Government will incur an expense of some hundred million dollars.

Mr. PILE. I simply desire to say that I think the bill ought to be printed, so that the House can see it. But I think some measure of this kind ought to be passed, even if we should have to sit ten days beyond the time we have expected to stay.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the bill be printed, together with an amendment which I submit.

The bill and amendment were accordingly ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by W. G. MOORE, his Private Secretary.

Also a message returning with his objections bill of the House No. 123, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

Also, a message notifying the House that he had this day approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 107) to establish certain post roads;

An act (H. R. No. 108) for the relief of certain soldiers and sailors therein designated;

An act (H. R. No. 180) supplementary to an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," passed March 2, 1867; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 69) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to admit to examination Maurice Rice Evans for admission to the Naval Academy in September next.

MAXIMILIAN AND SANTA ANNA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with that part of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant which requests me to transmit to the House of Representatives any official correspondence or other information relative to the capture and execution of Maximilian, and the arrest and reported execution of Santa Anna in Mexico, I inclose herewith a report from the Secretary of State, from which it appears that the correspondence called for by the House of Representatives has already been communicated to the Senate of the United States.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 18, 1867.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, the foregoing message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RUSSIAN TREATY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message of the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a copy of a treaty between the United States and His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, the ratifications of which were exchanged in this city on the 20th day of June last.

The instrument provides for a cession of territory to the United States in consideration of the payment of $7,200,000 in gold. The attention of Congress is invited to the subject of an appropriation for that payment, and also to that of proper legislation for the occupation and government of the territory as a part of the dominion of the United States.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 6, 1867.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, the foregoing message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 5th of July, requesting the President to inform "the House what States have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, June 16, 1866," I transmit a report from the Secretary of State.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 9, 1867.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

WASHINGTON, July 9, 1867.

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed July 5, 1867, requesting the President to inform the House "what States have ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, June 16, 1866," has the honor to report, first, a copy of the concurrent resolutions of inquiry:

[Concurrent resolution received at Department of State, June 16, 1866.]

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss of emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

CONVENTION WITH VENEZUELA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a copy of a Convention between the United States and the republic of Venezuela, for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic. The ratifications of this Convention were exchanged at Caracas on the 10th of April last. As its first article stipulates that the commissioners shall meet in that city within four months from that date, the expediency of passing the usual act for the purpose of carrying the convention into effect will, of course, engage the attention of Congress.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 5, 1867.

Mr. BANKS. I move that that communication be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an answer to the resolution of the House requesting all the official correspondence between the Department of State and Hon. Lewis D. Campbell, late minister to Mexico; which, on motion of Mr. BANKS, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPUBLIC OF MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with so much of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant as requests information in regard to certain agreements said to have been entered into between the United States, European, and West Virginia Land and Mining Company and certain reputed agents of the Republic of Mexico, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State and the papers accompanying it.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 10, 1867.

The message and the accompanying documents were, on motion of Mr. BANKS, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PARDONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Attorney General, additional to the report submitted by him December 31, 1866, and March 2, 1867, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of December 10, 1866, requesting "a list of names of all persons engaged in the late rebellion against the United States Government who have been pardoned by the President from April 15, 1865, to this date: that said list shall also state the rank of each person who has been so pardoned, if he has been engaged in the military service of the late so-called confederate government, and the position, if he shall have held any civil office under said so-called confederate government; and shall also further state whether such person has at any time prior to April 14, 1861, held any office under the United States Government, and if so, what office, together with the reasons for granting such pardon, and also the names of the person or persons at whose solicitation such pardon was granted."

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 8, 1867.

The message and accompanying documents were, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTARY RECONSTRUCTION ACT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House a message from the President of the United States, returning with his objections to the House in which it originated the bill (H. R. No. 123) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

The Clerk read the message, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I return herewith the bill entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto passed on the 23d day of March, 1867," and will state as briefly as possible some of the reasons which prevent me from giving it my approval.

This is one of a series of measures passed by Congress during the last four months on the subject of reconstruction. The message returning the act of the 2d of March last states at length my objections to the passage of that measure. They apply equally well to the bill now before me, and I am content merely to refer to them and to reiterate my conviction that they are sound and unanswerable.

There are some points peculiar to this bill which I will proceed at once to consider.

The first section proposes to declare "the true intent and meaning" in some particulars of the two prior acts upon this subject. It is declared that the intent of those acts was:

First, that the existing governments in the ten "rebel States" "were not legal State governments;" and

Second, "that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts and to the paramount authority of Congress."

Congress may, by a declaratory act, fix upon a prior act a construction altogether at variance with its apparent meaning, and from the time, at least, when such construction is fixed the original act will be construed to mean exactly what it is stated to mean by the declaratory statute. There will be then, from the time this bill may become a law no doubt, no question as to the relation in which the "existing governments" in those States, called in the original act "the provisional governments," stand toward the military authority. As those relations stood before the declaratory act, these "governments," it is true, were made subject to absolute military authority in many important respects, but not in all; the language of the act being "subject to the military authority of the United States, as hereinafter prescribed." By the sixth section of the original act these governments were made "in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States."

Now, by this declaratory act it appears that Congress did not, by the original act, intend to limit the military authority to any particulars or subjects therein "prescribed," but meant to make it universal. Thus over all these ten States this military government is now declared to have unlimited authority. It is no longer confined to the preservation of the public peace, the administration of criminal law, the registration of voters, and the superintendence of elections; but "in all respects" is asserted to be paramount to the existing civil governments.

It is impossible to conceive any state of society more intolerable than this, and yet it is to this condition that twelve million American citizens are reduced by the Congress of the United States. Over every foot of the immense territory occupied by these American citizens the Constitution of the United States is theoretically in full operation. It binds all the people there, and should protect them, yet they are denied every one of its sacred guarantees.

Of what avail will it be to any one of these southern people when seized by a file of soldiers to ask for the cause of arrest or for the production of the warrant? Of what avail to ask for the privilege of bail when in military custody, which knows no such thing as bail? Of what avail to demand a trial by jury, process for witnesses, a copy of the indictment, the privilege of counsel, or that greater privilege, the writ of habeas corpus?

The veto of the original bill of the 2d of March was based on two distinct grounds, the interference of Congress in matters strictly appertaining to the reserved powers of the States, and the establishment of military tribunals for the trial of citizens in time of peace. The impartial reader of that message will understand that all that it contains with respect to military despotism and martial law has reference especially to the fearful power conferred on the district commanders to displace the criminal courts and assume jurisdiction to try and to punish by military boards; that, potentially, the suspension of the habeas corpus was martial law and military despotism. The act now before me not only declares that the intent was to confer such military authority, but also to confer unlimited military authority over all the other courts of the State, and over all the officers of the State, legislative, executive, and judicial. Not content with the general grant of power, Congress, in the second section of this bill, specifically gives to each military commander the power "to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise any civil or military office or duty in such district, under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from or granted by, or claimed under any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof."

A power that hitherto all the departments of the Federal Government, acting in concert or separately, have not dared to exercise is here attempted to be conferred on a subordinate military officer. To him, as a military officer of the Federal Government, is given the power, supported by "a sufficient military force," to remove every civil officer of the State. What next? The district commander who has thus displaced the civil officer is authorized to fill the vacancy by the detail of an officer or soldier of the Army, or by the appointment "of some other person." This military appointee, whether an officer, a soldier, or "some other person," is to perform "the duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed." In other words, an officer or soldier of the Army is thus transformed into a civil officer. He may be made a governor, a legislator, or a judge. However unfit he may deem himself for such civil duties he must obey the order. The officer of the Army must, if "detailed," go upon the supreme bench of the State with the same prompt obedience as if he were detailed to go upon a court-martial. The soldier, if detailed to act as a justice of the peace, must obey as quickly as if he were detailed for picket duty. What is the character of such a military-civil officer? This bill declares that he shall perform the duties of the civil office to which he is detailed. It is clear, however, that he does not lose his position in the military service. He is still an officer or soldier of the Army; he is still subject to the rules and regulations which govern it, and must yield due deference, respect, and obedience toward his superiors.

The clear intent of this section is that the officer or soldier detailed to fill a civil office must execute his duties according to the laws of the State. If he is appointed a Governor of a State he is to execute the duties as provided by the laws of that State, and for the time being his military character is to be suspended in his new civil capacity. If he is appointed a State treasurer he must at once assume the custody and disbursement of the funds of the State, and must perform those duties precisely according to the laws of the State; for he is intrusted with no other official duty or other official power. Holding the office of treasurer, and intrusted with funds, it happens that he is required by the State laws to enter into bond with security, and to take an oath of office; yet from the beginning of the bill to the end there is no provision for any bond or oath of office, or for any single qualification required under the State law, such as residence, citizenship, or anything else. The only oath is that provided for in the ninth section, by the terms of which every one detailed or appointed to any civil office in the State is required "to take and to subscribe the oath of office prescribed by law for officers of the United States." Thus an officer of the Army of the United States detailed to fill a civil office in one of these States gives no official bond and takes no official oath for the performance of his new duties, but, as a civil officer of the State, only takes the same oath which he had already taken as a military officer of the United States. He is, at last, a military officer performing civil duties, and the authority under which he acts is Federal authority only; and the inevitable result is that the Federal Government, by the agency of its own sworn officers, in effect assumes the civil government of the State.

A singular contradiction is apparent here. Congress declares these local State governments to be illegal governments, and then provides that these illegal governments shall be carried on by Federal officers, who are to perform the very duties imposed on its own officers by this illegal State authority. It certainly would be a novel spectacle if Congress should attempt to carry on a legal State government by the agency of its own officers. It is yet more strange that Congress attempts to sustain and carry on an illegal State government by the same Federal agency.

In this connection I must call attention to the tenth and eleventh sections of the bill, which provide that none of the officers or appointees of these military commanders "shall be bound in his action by any opinion of any civil officer of the United States," and that all the provisions of the act "shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents thereof may be fully and perfectly carried out."

It seems Congress supposed that this bill might require construction, and they fix, therefore, the rule to be applied. But where is the construction to come from? Certainly no one can be more in want of instruction than a soldier or an officer of the Army detailed for a civil service, perhaps the most important in a State, with the duties of which he is altogether unfamiliar. This bill says he shall not be bound in his action by the opinion of any civil officer of the United States. The duties of the office are altogether civil, but when he asks for an opinion he can only ask the opinion of another military officer, who, perhaps, understands as little of his duties as he does himself; and as to his "action," he is answerable to the military authority, and to the military authority alone. Strictly no opinion of any civil officer, other than a judge, has a binding force; but these military appointees would not be bound even by a judicial opinion. They might very well say, even when their action is in conflict with the Supreme Court of the United States, "That court is composed of civil officers of the United States, and we are not bound to conform our action to any opinion of any such authority."

This bill and the acts to which it is supplementary are all founded upon the assumption that these ten communities are not States, and that their existing governments are not legal. Throughout the legislation upon this subject they are called "rebel States," and in this particular bill they are denominated "so-called States," and the vice of illegality is declared to pervade all of them. The obligations of consistency bind the legislative body as well as the individuals who compose it. It is now too late to say that these ten political communities are not States of this Union. Declarations to the contrary made in these three acts are contradicted again and again by repeated acts of legislation enacted by Congress from the year 1861 to the year 1867. During that period, while these States were in actual rebellion, and after that rebellion was brought to a close, they have been again and again recognized as States of the Union. Representation has been apportioned to them as States. They have been divided into judicial districts for the holding of district and circuit courts of the United States, as States of the Union only can be districted. The last act on this subject was passed July 23, 1866, by which every one of these ten States was arranged into districts and circuits. They have been called upon by Congress to act through their Legislatures upon at least two amendments to the Constitution of the United States. As States they have ratified one amendment, which required the vote of twenty-seven States of the thirty-six then composing the Union. When the requisite twenty-seven votes were given in favor of that amendment, seven of which votes were given by seven of these ten States, it was proclaimed to be a part of the Constitution of the United States, and slavery was declared no longer to exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction. If these seven States were not legal States of the Union it follows as the inevitable consequence that in some of the States slavery yet exists. It does not exist in these seven States, for they have abolished it also in their State constitutions; but Kentucky not having done so it would still remain in that State. But, in truth, if this assumption that these States have no legal State governments be true, then the abolition of slavery by these illegal governments binds no one, for Congress now denies to these States the power to abolish slavery by denying to them the power to elect a legal State Legislature, or to frame a constitution for any purpose, even for such a purpose as the abolition of slavery.

As to the other constitutional amendment having reference to suffrage, it happens that these States have not accepted it. The consequence is that it has never been proclaimed or understood, even by Congress, to be a part of the Constitution of the United States.

The Senate of the United States has repeatedly given its sanction to the appointment of judges, district attorneys, and marshals for every one of these States; and yet, if they are not legal States, not one of these judges is authorized to hold a court. So, too, both Houses of Congress have passed appropriation bills to pay all these judges, attorneys, and officers of the United States for exercising their functions in these States. Again, in the machinery of the internal revenue laws, all of these States are districted, not as "Territories," but as "States."

So much for continuous legislative recognition. The instances cited, however, fall far short of all that might be enumerated.

Executive recognition, as is well known, has been frequent and unwavering.

The same may be said as to judicial recognition through the Supreme Court of the United States. That august tribunal, from first to last, in the administration of its duties in banc and upon the circuit, has never failed to recognize these ten communities as legal States of the Union. The cases depending in that court upon appeal and writ of error from these States when the rebellion began have not been dismissed upon any idea of the cessation of jurisdiction. They were carefully continued from term to term until the rebellion was entirely subdued and peace reestablished, and then they were called for argument and consideration as if no insurrection had intervened. New cases occurring since the rebellion have come from these States before that court by writ of error and appeal, and even by original suit, where only "a State" can bring such a suit. These cases are entertained by that tribunal in the exercise of its acknowledged jurisdiction, which could not attach to them if they had come from any political body other than a State of the Union. Finally, in the allotment of their circuits, made by the judges at the December term, 1865, every one of these States is put on the same footing of legality with all the other States of the Union. Virginia and North Carolina, being a part of the fourth circuit, are allotted to the Chief Justice. South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida constitute the fifth circuit, and are allotted to the late Mr. Justice Wayne. Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas are allotted to the sixth judicial circuit, as to which there is a vacancy on the bench.

The Chief Justice, in the exercise of his circuit duties, has recently held a circuit court in the State of North Carolina. If North Carolina is not a State of this Union the Chief Justice had no authority to hold a court there, and every order, judgment, and decree rendered by him in that court were coram non judice and void.

Another ground on which these reconstruction acts are attempted to be sustained is this: that these ten States are conquered territory; that the constitutional relation in which they stood as States toward the Federal Government prior to the rebellion has given place to a new relation; that their territory is a conquered country and their citizens a conquered people, and that in this new relation Congress can govern them by military power.

A title by conquest stands on clear ground. It is a new title acquired by war. It applies only to territory; for goods or movable things regularly captured in war are called "booty," or if taken by individual soldiers, "plunder."

There is not a foot of the land in any one of these ten States which the United States holds by conquest, save only such land as did not belong to either of these States or to any individual owner. I mean such lands as did belong to the pretended government called the confederate States. These lands we may claim to hold by conquest. As to all other land or territory, whether belonging to the States or to individuals, the Federal Government has now no more title or right to it than it had before the rebellion. Our own forts, arsenals, navy-yards, custom-houses, and other Federal property situate in those States we now hold, not by the title of conquest but by our old title, acquired by purchase or condemnation for public use, with compensation to former owners. We have not conquered these places but have simply "repossessed" them. If we require more sites for forts, custom-houses, or other public use, we must acquire the title to them by purchase or appropriation in the regular mode. At this moment the United States, in the acquisition of sites for national cemeteries in those States, acquires title in the same way. The Federal courts sit in court-houses owned or leased by the United States, not in the court-houses of the States. The United States pays each of these States for the use of its jails. Finally, the United States levies its direct taxes and its internal revenue upon the property in these States, including the productions of the lands within their territorial limits; not by way of levy and contribution in the character of a conqueror, but in the regular way of taxation under the same laws which apply to all the other States of the Union.

From first to last, during the rebellion and since, the title of each of these States to the lands and public buildings owned by them has never been disturbed, and not a foot of it has ever been acquired by the United States, even under a title by confiscation, and not a foot of it has ever been taxed under Federal law.

In conclusion, I must respectfully ask the attention of Congress to the consideration of one more question arising under this bill. It vests in the military commander, subject only to the approval of the General of the Army of the United States, an unlimited power to remove from office any civil or military officer in each of these ten States, and the further power, subject to the same approval, to detail or appoint any military officer or soldier of the United States to perform the duties of the officer so removed, and to fill all vacancies occurring in those States by death, resignation, or otherwise. The military appointee thus required to perform the duties of a civil office, according to the laws of the State and as such required to take an oath, is for the time being a civil officer. What is his character? Is he a civil officer of the State or a civil officer of the United States? If he is a civil officer of the State, where is the Federal power under our Constitution which authorizes his appointment by any Federal officer? If, however, he is to be considered a civil officer of the United States, as his appointment and oath would seem to indicate, where is the authority for his appointment vested by the Constitution?

The power of appointment of all officers of the United States, civil or military, where not provided for in the Constitution, is vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with this exception: that Congress "may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." But this bill, if these are to be considered inferior officers within the meaning of the Constitution, does not provide for their appointment by the President alone, or by the courts of law, or by the heads of Departments, but vests the appointment in one subordinate executive officer, subject to the approval of another subordinate executive officer. So that if we put this question and fix the character of this military appointee either way, this provision of the bill is equally opposed to the Constitution.

Take the case of a soldier or officer appointed to perform the office of judge in one of these States, and as such to administer the proper laws of the State. Where is the authority to be found in the Constitution for vesting in a military or an executive officer strict judicial functions to be exercised under State law? It has been again and again decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that acts of Congress which have attempted to vest executive powers in the judicial courts or judges of the United States are not warranted by the Constitution. If Congress cannot clothe a judge with merely executive duties, how can they clothe an officer or soldier of the Army with judicial duties over citizens of the United States who are not in the military or naval service? So, too, it has been repeatedly decided that Congress cannot require a State officer, executive or judicial, to perform any duty enjoined upon him by a law of the United States. How, then, can Congress confer power upon an executive officer of the United States to perform such duties in a State? If Congress could not vest in a judge of one of these States any judicial authority under the United States by direct enactment, how can it accomplish the same thing indirectly by removing the State judge and putting an officer of the United States in his place?

To me these considerations are conclusive of the unconstitutionality of this part of the bill now before me, and I earnestly commend their consideration to the deliberate judgment of Congress.

Within a period less than a year the legislation of Congress has attempted to strip the executive department of the Government of some of its essential powers. The Constitution and the oath provided in it devolve upon the President the power and duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. The Constitution, in order to carry out this power, gives him the choice of the agents, and makes them subject to his control and supervision. But in the execution of these laws the constitutional obligation upon the President remains, but the power to exercise that constitutional duty is effectually taken away.

The military commander is, as to the power of appointment, made to take the place of the President, and the General of the Army the place of the Senate; and any attempt on the part of the President to assert his own constitutional power may, under pretense of law, be met by official insubordination. It is to be feared that these military officers, looking to the authority given by these laws rather than to the letter of the Constitution, will recognize no authority but the commander of the district and the General of the Army.

If there were no other objection than this to this proposed legislation it would be sufficient. While I hold the chief executive authority of the United States, while the obligation rests upon me to see that all the laws are faithfully executed, I can never willingly surrender that trust or the powers given for its execution. I can never give my assent to be made responsible for the faithful execution of laws and at the same time surrender that trust and the powers which accompany it to any other executive officer, high or low, or to any number of executive officers. If this executive trust, vested by the Constitution in the President, is to be taken from him and vested in a subordinate officer, the responsibility will be with Congress in clothing the subordinate with unconstitutional power and with the officer who assumes its exercise.

This interference with the constitutional authority of the executive department is an evil that will inevitably sap the foundations of our Federal system, but it is not the worst evil of this legislation. It is a great public wrong to take from the President powers conferred on him alone by the Constitution; but the wrong is more flagrant and more dangerous when the powers so taken from the President are conferred upon subordinate executive officers, and especially upon military officers. Over nearly one third of the States of the Union military power, regulated by no fixed law, rules supreme. Each one of the five district commanders, though not chosen by the people or responsible to them, exercises at this hour more executive power, military and civil, than the people have ever been willing to confer upon the head of the executive department, though chosen by and responsible to themselves. The remedy must come from the people themselves. They know what it is, and how it is to be applied. At the present time they cannot, according to the forms of the Constitution, repeal these laws; they cannot remove or control this military despotism. The remedy is, nevertheless, in their hands; it is to be found in the ballot, and is a sure one, if not controlled by fraud, overawed by arbitrary power, or from apathy on their part too long delayed. With abiding confidence in their patriotism, wisdom, and integrity, I am still hopeful of the future, and that in the end the rod of despotism will be broken, the armed heel of power lifted from the necks of the people, and the principles of a violated Constitution preserved.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1867.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be entered at large on the Journal, in accordance with the requirement of the Constitution.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that we may as well proceed at once to take the vote upon this question. I am not aware that there is any desire to discuss the subject. It has been so often discussed that I presume we all understand the argument of the President and the argument against him. If there should be no desire to discuss it on our side, I shall make no remarks; for I do not wish to take any advantage of other gentlemen by offering remarks myself and then precluding others from the same privilege. If there be any such desire, and gentlemen will indicate it, I do not know but that a few minutes might very well be spent in the discussion of the subject.

Several MEMBERS. Call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I prefer myself that the previous question should be called, and the bill passed and sent to the other branch of Congress, that they may decide upon it and be enabled to tell us when we can go home, so that the committee of this House, so diligently engaged in providing for the impeachment of the President, may complete their work in the shortest possible time. Therefore, unless some objection be made, I shall call the previous question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will do so.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I will not occupy much of the time of the House; yet I think this message so extraordinary in some of its declarations that it ought not to go to the country and the world without some expression of the effect which it has produced upon at least one mind here. The language of this document convinces me of that of which indeed I had but little doubt before, that from the oppression which, through the instrumentality of this man, has rested upon twelve million people, and which has been only temporarily removed by the measures against which the President in this document vainly protests, there is no relief except in the assertion of that great power which resides in this House alone, and for the neglect to exercise that power the people of the country will hold us to a strict account. Posterity, not intimidated by the fears which seem to control us, will render its stern verdict against us if we hesitate to arraign the President for the crimes and misdemeanors of which he is guilty before the country and the world. These charges are of the gravest official character, and it is only by a constitutional and judicial inquiry that we can ascertain whether the provision of the Constitution which gives the power of impeachment to this House now is and forever is to be a dead provision.

It is in vain that you seek by legislation to protect the freedmen of the South, to institute loyal governments in that region, or to infuse justice into the public policy of ten States, while the executive authority of the country, the command of the Army and the Navy, the power of nominating to office are in the hands of Mr. Johnson.

If he be not guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors then the country must endure the evils from which there are no constitutional means of escape. If, however, he be so guilty, and we do not inquire into the facts and then impeach and arraign the delinquent, then does he, without relieving himself in any degree, compel us to bear an equal weight of guilt.

The President of the United States in the veto message before us uses this language:

"Within a period less than a year the legislation of Congress has attempted to strip the executive department of the Government of some of its essential powers. The Constitution and the oath provided in it devolve upon the President the power and the duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. The Constitution, in order to carry out this power, gives him the choice of the agents, and makes them subject to his control and supervision. But in the execution of these laws, the constitutional obligation upon the President remains, but the power to exercise that constitutional duty is effectually taken away. The military commander is, as to the power of appointment, made to take the place of the President, and the General of the Army the place of the Senate, and any attempt on the part of the President to assert his own constitutional power may, under pretense of law, be met by official insubordination. It is to be feared that these military officers, looking to the authority given by these laws, rather than to the letter of the Constitution, will recognize no authority but the commander of the district and the General of the Army."

If there were no other objection than this to this proposed legislation it would be sufficient. While I hold the chief executive authority of the United States, while the obligation rests upon me to see that all the laws are faithfully executed, I can never willingly surrender that trust, or the powers given for its execution.

I can never give my assent to be made responsible for the faithful execution of laws and at the same time surrender that trust and the powers which accompany it to any other executive officer, high or low, or to any number of executive officers.

If this executive trust, vested by the Constitution in the President, is to be taken from him and vested in a subordinate officer, the responsibility will be with Congress in clothing the subordinate with unconstitutional power, and with the officer who assumes its exercise."

In this paragraph he speaks of the bill he now vetoes in connection with the acts of the 2d and the 23d of March, which Congress passed over his vetoes, and thus made them the supreme law of the land. He declares that he will never willingly surrender the power of the Chief Executive of the country, that it rests with him alone to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and that he will never consent to their execution through any other instrumentality or agency. Holding his version of the Constitution to be the supreme law and binding on him, he will set at defiance these laws of the Congress of the United States, as well as the bill which now waits upon the Speaker's table for the constitutional sanction of a two-thirds majority, which will make it the law of the land. The Constitution has made it his duty to see that the laws of the land are faithfully executed, and what Congress by its constitutional prerogative declares to be the law is the law to him, as it is to the humblest citizen of the Republic, until by the Supreme Court of the United States it has been decided otherwise. He has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, a leading provision of which is that the President shall see that the laws are faithfully executed, but Congress in its discretion may confide their execution to other officers of the Government. If, however, there be any bearing in this document it is that he will not execute this law though we may pass it by the constitutional two-thirds majority, which is the substitute for the executive signature, and which makes it as much a law as though he had willingly given it his assent.

Once for all, sir, I say for myself, and upon the public records, that a man who by the exercise of unconstitutional authority for twelve or or eighteen months encouraged war and rapine and bloodshed throughout ten or eleven States of the Union, that a man, who by his authority alone has, as appears by the public record, declared that he would set at naught your laws which enact that no man shall be appointed to office or receive the pay or emoluments of any office until he had taken the oath prescribed by the law of 1862; that the man who deliberately, upon forethought, intentionally sets aside that law and appointed men to office, and by illegal processes procured for them compensation for services in those offices, knowing when he appointed them that they could not take the oath without adding perjury to the other crimes then resting upon their souls, at once provokes and demands the exercise of the highest and gravest duty of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentlemen to yield to me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not at this moment. I will say what I have to say and then leave the matter in the hands of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go over the arguments contained in this veto message. But we are sentinels here on the watch-tower of freedom. We see the principles of liberty assailed through the President. Vain appeals he makes to the people to sustain him in the struggle. The people will stand by the constitutional authorities of the country; but whether we stand or fall in this contest it is our duty to resist these usurpations. It is true we can endure these violations of law, of the Constitution, and of right for eighteen months more. England might have endured James II, and the American colonies might have endured George III, but for themselves and their posterity they demanded the constitutional rights of freemen, and those rights they secured. We have witnessed gross executive usurpation for a period of twenty-four months, usurpations which set at defiance the laws of the land and constitutional authority of Congress, while we sit here questioning whether we will devote a few months' time to the examination of the great charges already publicly made against this offender of the law, Constitution, and of the Union of the States. While we debate here our constitutional powers are wrested from us. While we consider and delay, precedents are established by which other men not worse than this man will find authority for invading public rights in other years and in other ages. Our duty as we love our country, as we contemplate the judgment that posterity will pass upon us, is clear. That duty is to investigate fairly, fully, faithfully, and without delay the charges that are made against the Executive of the country. If in the judgment of the House the charges are sustained, then let us proceed to arraign him deliberately and promptly, prosecuting the alleged offender according to the forms established by law and precedent. If Mr. Johnson's constitutional term be shortened by the judgment of the Senate for a day only liberty will be preserved to the country, and mankind through centuries will bless that people whose Representatives had the courage to arraign a usurper of power, to demand justice for the weak and the oppressed, to preserve the Constitution with its original vigor unimpaired, to protect liberty, and to transmit popular rights to other ages.

Mr. RANDALL. Will my colleague yield?
Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. For how long?

Mr. RANDALL. Only a moment.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that I intrude upon the House, but I desire to say to that Massachusetts impeacher that I have no faith in the bluster about impeachment of which we hear so much. You do not mean impeachment, gentlemen, for you do not dare to do it.

The SPEAKER. There is too much noise in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. My only purpose was to ask the gentlemen on the other side to impeach the President if they are ready.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield.

Several MEMBERS. Oh no; let us have the vote.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts fifteen minutes.

Mr. PRUYN. I would like to be allowed a few minutes also.

Mr. BUTLER. I would not ask the House to pause in what we all understand to be our primary duty if the message which we have just heard did not seem to me to require an observation, first, upon its tone, and secondly, as to some of its assertions of fact.

I do not propose dealing with the general argument, but I do protest in the name of this House and the people against the executive calumny of the Congress of the United States in the declaration in an official paper, which by the Constitution we must enter upon our Journal, that Congress has fastened by its action a despotism upon twelve million people of this country more intolerable than was ever conceived of to be borne by any other people. I give the exact words of the message:

"It is impossible to conceive any state of society more intolerable than this, and yet it is to this condition that twelve million American citizens are reduced by the Congress of the United States."

Either that is true or it is false. If true, we are unworthy of our places here; if false, the man who makes the charge ought not to hold his place a single hour longer than the necessary steps can be taken to remove him from it.

I agree that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has just uttered a truth in his remark that we dare not impeach the President; we dare not do our duty in this respect. With shame and confusion of face I for one confess the truth and justice of that accusation to the country. The question is, How soon shall we be ready to do our duty? How soon shall we meet this disturber of the peace of the country in the manner pointed out by the Constitution? When shall we say to him, as did the orator of Rome to a like conspirator against the Government, Quousque tandem abutere nostra patientia, Catalina? How long shall we remain here idle and patient to be charged with enacting laws that work despotism in this country?

But, sir, passing from this, in the little time given me I desire to call attention to one or two assertions of fact in this message; and I do it not because they are now made for the first time by the President, but because never in this place, so far as I know, have they been met and the proof demanded.

The charge of the message is that this Congress has declared these rebel State governments illegal with one breath while we have sustained them as valid with another; and the President instances several occasions where we have spoken of these former States in our legislation as States and then proceeds to argue that therefore we have affirmed their legal existence as States in the Union. The answer is that this has been done only as a matter of convenience in reorganizing these forfeited governments and in restoring their rights lost in war. The President claims further that Congress has recognized these States as existing by sending propositions of constitutional amendment to be ratified by them. I pray the judgment of this House. Show me any law, any phrase of a law, wherein Congress has directed any one of the propositions of constitutional amendment to be ratified by one of these States. We sent out amendments to be ratified by the States of the United States, and his Secretary of State, to support the executive policy and to strengthen his construction that these rebel unconstructed States are loyal States in the Union, sent the constitutional amendment in regard to the abolition of slavery for ratification to those so-called States, erected by executive order and by no other power whatever, and then argues that Congress is concluded by this expedient from denying their legal existence.

Again, the President says that we have provided for and the Senate has confirmed the appointment of judges for these States, and therefore Congress has recognized them as States in the Union. I once more take issue on the fact. We have provided for judges and district attorneys of the United States in certain districts theretofore declared and defined by law, and not for any State judges whatever.

Our legislation has been for United States officers and not for State officers.

Again, we are told that the Supreme Court has recognized these States in assigning their circuits by choosing the boundaries of these States as designations of their limits. But this was done for convenience of designation only.

Again, it is said that the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized these States by holding a court by its Chief Justice in the State of North Carolina. He held a court in the territorial district assigned to him without any reference to the question whether the State of North Carolina was in existence or not, and it would have been equally his duty to have held that court whether the State of North Carolina as a State had legal existence or not.

And among the first opinions that the Chief Justice delivered in that circuit show conclusively that he by no means recognized the State of North Carolina except as a State which had been in rebellion, and had not yet been brought back into the Union; whose laws enacted by the State were void, and whose people had forfeited all their rights to act as a State organization. Nor has there been any such recognition by the Supreme Court, because they have allowed cases to be placed or remained on their dockets from the various district and circuit courts held either before or since the war within the limits of those States. Those courts made judgments which were to be revived on appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States, and in none of those questions of appeal had the question arisen as to the existence of those States. The State of Mississippi, indeed, undertook to bring a bill in equity against the officers of the United States, and thereupon the Supreme Court of the United States made a formal adjudication, so far as anything was decided, that the State of Mississippi, as a State of this Union, had no standing in the Supreme Court of the United States, and so far from sustaining the assertions of this message that decision was entirely opposed to them.

One further observation and I shall have met all I now desire to answer in this message. The President declares that no part of these southern States ever became the property of the United States by conquest. I cannot for one allow that statement to go unchallenged. Every foot of land, whether it originally belonged to the United States or others, and which by the power of its arms was repossessed by the United States from the armed control of its public enemies, belongs to the United States as a conquest; and to say that title by conquest only pertains to personal property is to ignore the entire law of nations. While it has not been usual in conquering nations, to assume a proprietary right in the property of the conquered either real or personal, I think I may challenge the President to point out in the entire body of writers on public law or the rights of war of a single line in which there is any denial that the right of property may be thus acquired. I ask the consideration of the House whether or not this right of conquest is not a perfect one, to be exercised, in the judgment of the conqueror, in mercy or clemency or in justice or a full assumption of right? We have chosen in our conquered territory not yet to take into our possession the property or lands, with certain exceptions, which the valor of our soldiers has won; but the right to so do still remains to us; and justice may yet compel us to exercise that right for the safety and well-being of the country.

Having brought to the attention of the House these misstatements of facts and wrong conclusions of law, I am ready for one to vote this bill shall become a law, notwithstanding the objections of the President, and leave the President to determine whether he will execute it or refuse to do so, as he threatens; and then see whether the House of Representatives will bring him, for this and his former violations of the Constitution and usurpation of power, before the Senate for trial, according to the mode, and the only mode, pointed out by the Constitution to relieve the country of a bad and unscrupulous ruler.

Mr. BOYER. Will my colleague yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; I will give the gentleman that time.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, it is a most extraordinary exhibition that we have witnessed this day in the House of Representatives of the United States. Because the President has returned in the ordinary manner a bill with his objections to this House, gentlemen on the other side think themselves justified in denouncing him as a fit subject for impeachment and removal from office. Yet it is in the exercise of his clear constitutional power and duty that the President has returned this bill with his reasons for not affixing to it his signature.

The construction put upon the veto message by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who first addressed the House, must surely strike every member here as one in nowise justified by anything in the language of the document itself. The President has not in his message said or intimated that he will forcibly resist this or any other act of Congress after it has become a law under the forms prescribed by the Constitution; nor has he said by implication even that he would be unwilling to execute it. He has declared, however, that he will not willingly surrender the constitutional powers which are vested in him as President of these United States. Is he for that to be denounced? Has he not taken an oath to obey the Constitution of the United States, and so far as he is able to "preserve, protect, and defend" it? Yet for no other reason than because he assigns constitutional objections to a bill which has been passed by this House he is made a subject of fierce denunciation, as if he had thereby been guilty of a crime. Under these circumstances perhaps silence best becomes those opposed to the impeachment of the President. Let the speeches of the two gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. BUTLER] go before the country as additional evidences of the malice and intolerance of those who are clamoring for impeachment. I am sure that those speeches, when read by the people of the country, must be a convincing proof, if indeed further proof is needed, of the desperate attempt to grasp at any excuse for the purpose of removing the last obstacle to the progress of the Radical majority toward the complete subversion of the Constitution of the country and the perfection and intrenchment of despotism, not only in ten States of this Union, but throughout them all.

Mr. PRUYN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yield me five minutes? [Cries of "Question! Question!"]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield ten minutes to my colleague, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. PRUYN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania decline to yield to me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania as indicating whether he would or would not yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize most deeply with the eloquent utterances of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] on this question. There is a time, it seems to me, when forbearance ceases to be a virtue. There is a time when timid counsels, which betray like treason, must cease to govern the Legislative Assembly of this nation. I think that this time has now arrived. For the first time in our history the Chief Executive Magistrate of this nation strides into its great council chamber and flings his mace, in the way of defiance, at our very feet.

When is this controversy to end? What is now the issue? We stand wide as the poles asunder upon a question of vital magnitude, on which the people have again and again passed directly and indirectly at the ballot-box; and we are now referred again by the defiant language of the President to the very tribunal whose verdict has been so often rejected. Are we prepared to adjourn now, with an utterance of this sort placed upon our records; with the declaration publicly and solemnly made that the President of the United States, the minister of our will, will not execute that which he has declared in constitutional form? Will he execute it in any event? From the experience of the past—and if we are ever to be wise we must derive instruction from that school—what have we to expect? What is the remedy? The President of the United States, charging us again with a violation of the fundamental law of the state, proposes a renewed appeal to the same tribunal that has already again and again pronounced its verdict, which he has again and again disregarded.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I do not wish to be interrupted now.

Mr. ROSS. I only wanted to ask whether the people have ever passed upon this military despotism which we are getting up now.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. But, sir, there is another remedy. It has been industriously disseminated throughout the length and breadth of the land that the charges depending here against the Executive Magistrate are merely frivolous. This opinion has found utterance here, and I am sorry to say on both sides of the House, while the men who hold the opposite view, and who might, I suppose, be entitled to claim a more charitable construction, at least on the part of their friends, are denied the privilege of declaring the reasons which have led them to the conclusion at which they have arrived. I desire to say now, in their behalf, that they will be fully prepared, whenever they are allowed the opportunity, to show to this House and to the nation that there is a case and a very grave one to demand their attention. It is not for me to say now what that case is; I cannot do so without a violation of confidence as a member of the committee charged with this question; but I must be allowed to declare by way of protest against the suggestions and insinuations that have been so freely indulged in, that there is a state of facts developed before them on which they will be able to go confidently before this House and before the American people; that there is a case in which it will be found that the highest acts of tyranny that distinguished the reigns of the Tudors and Stuarts have been rehearsed and reiterated by the present Chief Magistrate of a republican nation.

I do not speak for others, but I desire to say now for myself, Mr. Speaker, as a professional man, educated to some extent in the great principles of free government, and to some extent, I think, familiar with the progress of constitutional liberty in England from its early and rude beginnings in the great Charta which was wrested by the barons of England from King John at Runnymede, down to its glorious consummation in the revolution of 1688, and the Bill of Rights which followed and confirmed it, that there is no case, in my judgment, and I say it with all proper deference to the opinions of others, in the parliamentary history of England which will be found to comprehend as many enormities, as many high political misdemeanors, as many invasions of the great maxims of liberty, as will be found in the present one; and I desire to say further, knowing what I say, and in full consciousness of the force of what I utter, but not speaking for my colleagues who agree with me in opinion, that I stand ready to make good all I have here said, whenever this House will afford me the opportunity, against all comers.

It is proper, however, that I should add there are great public interests, aside from the mere question of impeachment, dependent on facts evolved in the course of this examination, of which I do not feel myself at liberty to speak. It may be that they would show that these great interests require that Congress should not separate until they are provided for. I cannot say, of course, precisely why it is without revealing more than it belongs to me to speak of; but it seems to me that the time is near, with an issue on your hands which you are required to meet between yourselves and the Executive who sets your laws at defiance, when you will see the necessity of looking to these interests and be compelled to have recourse to the last and the only true and effective remedy, by deposing the minister who defies your will and setting up another in his place who will respect your authority.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I have about twenty minutes left, which I desire to occupy myself.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman yields to gentlemen on this side, there will be no objection to extending his time.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will yield for three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to accept three minutes if I cannot get any more.

Mr. PRUYN. I do not think there will be any objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio three minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have said, sir, that I was willing to accept three minutes of time, which is not enough to make any argument in the case, and the most I expect is to be able to record my declaration.

The Secretary of the Treasury some time ago in his speech delivered to a mob of this city, said—I leave it to him after reflection to say with how much propriety—that he regarded Congress, the law-makers of the country, as a "set of tinkers." Sir, I have been sometimes almost inclined to think we have wasted our time in tinkering. We have passed one law after another in our effort to carry out a system of restoration of the rebel States, which we all so much desire, and those laws have been rendered nugatory, have been ineffectual, broken down and made inoperative by hostility both to us and to the policy we pursue upon the part of the Executive of the nation. He stands as an obstruction in the pathway which the law-making power of this country seeks to pursue, in order to restore peace to an entire and unbroken Union.

I have said before what I now repeat, that all your attempts by acts of legislation are as nothing almost while that obstruction remains; that though you may think to dig little canals around it or to burrow under it or to climb over it, your expedients are all unavailing. The only true remedy is to remove the obstruction; to put out of the way and degrade from his office the Executive of the United States, who stands before the country and the world defying your attempts to bring about that peace and restoration which by your legislation you are endeavoring to obtain.

Sir, I do not know what proofs may have been produced before the Committee on the Judiciary, but I do know this: that without looking into the record which has been made by their investigation, there is spread upon the public journals of this country in the shape of documents to which the name of the President is attached, enough of history to satisfy me that he has assumed a position of hostility to a coordinate branch of the Government and to the proper rule in this country, which amounts to a great political crime, for which he might be, and if we are true to our duty ought to be, degraded from the office he holds.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I will say a few words and then call the previous question. Let me say at the outset that I agree precisely with the eloquent speech of my amiable colleague across the way, [Mr.

RANDALL,] that you cannot impeach the President of the United States; and I say to our friends on this side who are urging that measure that they are urging it in vain. The vote the other day upon my motion clearly shows that. Without attempting to go into disclosures, I undertake to say that there are unseen agencies at work, invisible powers operating everywhere in this country which when called upon can and will protect a man of that kind from all danger. I have taken some pains to look into the position of this House and of the Senate and am quite sure that there is power enough, first to prevent the voting of impeachment here, and secondly, if impeachment were voted, to prevent conviction elsewhere.

I have said this much, hoping we shall hear no more of any attempt to urge impeachment, a vain and futile thing, on the panoply of soldiers dressed in armor which surround the White House.

Now, sir, a single word with regard to the condition of the country. The President starts by asserting what, if true, makes out all the rest of his argument legitimately. He says that the Constitution of the United States is theoretically operative in the conquered southern States. If that were true, then all we have been doing is rank usurpation, and all he has been doing is legitimate action. I deny that the Constitution is theoretically or actually in operation in any one of those States any more than it is in a Territory.

Let me say here—and I am sorry to say it—that not all of our statesmen, profound as they are, not all our judges, even the most learned of them, seem to have looked sufficiently deep into the law of nations to understand the true condition of a conquered people. And yet how long would it take to refute all that has been said and all that can be urged against our absolute power over these provinces as conquered belligerents, whose whole property we own and may dispose of as we please? A slight examination, if his Excellency will begin and patch up his knowledge upon this subject, will be sufficient. One page of Grotius, one half chapter or lecture of Rutherford, one page of Vattel, and even less from that last, best, and tersest of publicists, Sargent Wildman, must convince every man who will give up his prejudice in regard to the States being of a mongrel character, part in and part out of the United States. That being the case, all the rest of reconstruction is as easy as any problem in Euclid.

Now, sir, while I could hope that all our people would examine this matter thoroughly before they pass upon it, yet I cannot deny that we are in some measure responsible both through our statesmen, publicists, and judiciary, for the errors under which the White House is laboring, and that we are without the same excuse that he has. Many of our people have relied upon Blackstone and upon Wheaton. They have made it their business to study ancient and modern publicists while the occupant of the White House was engaged in a very laudable business not much calculated to instruct that end of the human frame. [Laughter.] Therefore I make allowance and indulgence for the error of that amiable gentleman, and I trust that my friends will not consider me arrogant in suggesting as I have done the study of the authorities on this subject, with the view of ascertaining the true position of our country and the building up of our nation so that it may last through all time. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for about five minutes. I do not think that I shall occupy even that time.

Mr. PRUYN. I have already made a like request.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that two members of the Judiciary have already been heard.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If the House will not object, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] and then five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] It is only fair that I should do so, if I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. That will require an extension of five minutes to the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Is there objection?

Mr. LOAN. I object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the previous question be not sustained, will not further debate be in order?

The SPEAKER. Two thirds can suspend the rules, to enable the debate to continue.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will yield me the floor now, I will renew his demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; I will move to suspend the rules to enable me to yield first, five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] and then five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

The question was taken, and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.]

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, as I was not in attendance on this House at the time the discussion took place in regard to this bill, I do not know what arguments were urged in its favor, or what reasons were given why it should not pass. I propose, therefore, to say nothing about the merits of the bill in general, but to notice some of the very extraordinary things which have developed themselves in the very unexpected debate which has just taken place. And let me begin first with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I agree with him entirely as to those first principles which lie at the foundation of international law to which he has referred, and I agree with him that the authors that he has named are authorities not to be disregarded, but whose opinions are conclusive on the question before the House. But the difficulty in regard to the question before us is this: in the Thirty-Eighth Congress the gentleman announced what I believed and the country believed to be a startling position, that by reason of the proclamation of the President the war had become a war between nationalities, that henceforth it was a struggle between two great nations, and that the conquering party had a right to do with the conquered what it pleased. That was in the face of the solemn declaration of Congress, almost unanimously passed after the first battle of Bull Run, that it was not a war between nationalities, that it was a war to enforce the provisions of the Constitution, acknowledging all the rights of the States, and declaring that as soon as the struggle should be terminated, these States should be restored to their relations to the Union.

In regard to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] we know that this subject of impeachment has been so thoroughly embodied in his mind that upon no occasion does he fail to present it to the House.

We are here called upon to discharge a solemn duty under the Constitution—to declare whether, notwithstanding the reasons which the President of the United States has assigned against the passage of this bill, it shall become a law. Instead of considering this question the gentleman from Massachusetts has favored us with the reasons why, in his opinion, the President should be impeached. Some of those reasons, I believe, he has attempted to draw from the language of the message which has been read to-day. But, sir, how does that message close? After the President has said to this House and to the world that this act is an outrage upon the Constitution and a violation of the great principles of liberty, what does he tell you? To what does he appeal? He appeals to the ballot-box. Is the gentleman from Massachusetts afraid of that? He may well be; for it will tell a story utterly at variance with the views which the gentleman entertains.

Now, sir, a part of that speech would have been very proper in a political electioneering contest; a part of it would have suited very well the era of the French Revolution. But it does not befit the temper of our times, if there be left any respect for the principles of constitutional liberty, that a gentleman occupying the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts should come in here and under such circumstances promulgate and urge the views which he has presented to the House to-day.

Now, sir, who is to judge of the constitutionality of an enactment? The executive is one of those branches of Government that are to pass upon the acts of this Congress. Where does the gentleman get his idea that the action of Congress in passing an act makes it the supreme law of the land? There is no such declaration to be found in the Constitution. There is no authority for such a position. The Constitution simply declares that if a law be passed "in pursuance" of the Constitution, then it shall be the supreme law of the land. Who is to judge of that?

The SPEAKER. The five minutes of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] have expired. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. PRUYN. I am very sorry that I am not permitted to finish the presentation of the thought I was endeavoring to express.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to occupy one moment of the time of the House on this question until it seemed to be rendered necessary by the singular course which has been pursued by two of my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee, and by some of the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

I will not pretend to be conversant with all the law and all the history of England and of this country relative to impeachment, though I have studied both with some care. It may be, sir, that I do not understand the subject as perfectly as my learned colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] I do not pretend to be infallible. He has asserted that he knows all of law and history concerning this subject; and when a man thinks he knows all concerning any subject he will never learn anything more. He has given us his conclusion upon this case in a style excited and positive. I do not intend, sir, to enter upon the discussion of the merits of this case at all. This is not the right time, nor can the subject be properly entered upon until the evidence shall have been presented to the House for its consideration. When the House of Representatives charged the Committee on the Judiciary with the investigation of this case, I did not understand that it was for the purpose of having it disposed of as a partisan on question.

I understood that so far as the reference of the subject imposed an obligation upon me as a member of the committee, it was to investigate fearlessly and faithfully the subject, not merely as a member of the Republican party, but as a member of the Law Committee of the House of Representatives. I have pursued the investigation with that view and in that spirit, and I affirm here to-day that no amount of political pressure shall turn me aside from a conscientious discharge of the duty thus imposed. I will be controlled by the law and the facts, and by nothing else. [Applause.] I have no sympathy with the course of political conduct which has been pursued by the President of the United States. He is not entitled to my sympathy or respect in this regard; but, sir, he is entitled to have the charges made against him determined according to law, and to have the case decided as the facts and the law warrant and demand. The lowest criminal may demand this, and the President is entitled to the benefit of this rule.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has said that there are secret influences at work in this matter. Sir, it is very easy for any man to cast suspicion upon others when it becomes necessary to do so in order to carry by force of party organization anything which he may desire to invest with success. I do not know to what influences the gentleman referred. The gentleman says that secret influences will not only control the action of members of this House, but will control the judgment of members of the Senate sitting as a high court of impeachment under the solemnity of their oaths as judges. Sir, is every man to be denounced because he cannot look upon questions just as some other men view them? Is every man to be hounded down because he will not surrender the right of private judgment and follow men regardless of law and the directions of conscience? Have we come to that, sir?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I now demand the previous question, and ask for the vote.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to the passage of House bill No. 123, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,'" passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867, notwithstanding the objections of the President to the contrary? By the Constitution the vote must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 25, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. During the call the following statements were made:

Mr. PERHAM announced that his colleagues Mr. LYNCH and Mr. PETERS were paired with Mr. FOX, of New York, and that if present they would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. MARSHALL stated that his colleague, Mr. BURR, was detained at his room by severe indisposition, and that if present he would vote in the negative.

Mr. CHURCHILL stated that his colleague, Mr. HULBURD, was paired with Mr. TABER, and that if present he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. ROBINSON announced at the request of his colleague, Mr. CHANLER, that if present he would vote no.

Mr. PLANTS said: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SHELLABARGER, made an arrangement to pair with my other colleague, General MORGAN; and as it requires two votes for one on this question, I agreed to be the other. I would have voted in the affirmative, and so would Mr. SHELLABARGER.

Mr. MORGAN. And I would have voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER then announced that two thirds having voted in the affirmative the bill had, notwithstanding the objections of the President, again passed and would, with the President's objections, be transmitted to the Senate for like consideration.

COMMITTEE ON PAY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed the following as the Committee on the Pay Department: Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. SCOTFIELD, Mr. COBB, Mr. BUCKLAND, and Mr. HOLMAN.

EQUAL RIGHTS.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 37, for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of said amendment as follows: Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the supreme court of the District of Columbia, sitting for the trial of crimes and misdemeanors, be, and is hereby, authorized to order, drawn from the jury-box provided for that purpose and in the manner provided by law, the necessary grand and petit juries for the general term of the criminal court for the year of our Lord 1867.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Unless that is concurred in there will be no way by which the criminal court of this District can until the coming year have grand and petit juries. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SYMPATHY WITH CRETE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House joint resolution of the Senate No. 63, declaring sympathy with the suffering people of Crete; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BANKS. I desire action on that resolution now.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the people of the United States feel a strong sympathy with the people of Crete, constituting a part of the Greek family to which civilization owes so much; that they are pained by the report of the present sufferings of those interesting people, and they unite in the hope that this declaration, which they feel it their duty to make, will be favorably considered by the Government of Turkey in determining its policy toward Crete.

Sec. 2. And be it further Resolved, That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to communicate this resolution to the Government of Turkey.

Mr. BANKS. I presume there will be no objection to this.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. HOLMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 28) authorizing extensions of the mail steamship service between the United States and China and Japan; when the Speaker signed the same.

GOVERNMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a joint resolution concerning the government of the Army of the United States.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That no district or department commander shall be relieved from the command heretofore assigned to and now exercised by him without the advice and consent of the Senate, unless the change of command be recommended by the General commanding the Army.

Mr. ROSS and Mr. RANDALL objected. Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. NIBLACK. On that I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 24, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonitz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polesley, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Kerr, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Stone, Van Auker, and Van Trump—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Bromwell, Burr, Cake, Chanler, Cornell, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Laffin, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Peters, Pile, Pomeroy, Price, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Taber, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—50.

So the rules were suspended.

During the roll-call,

Mr. HAYES stated that his colleague, Mr. BINGHAM, had just left on account of sickness.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by W. G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, returning to the House of Representatives with his objections thereto the joint resolution of the House to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States.

RECONSTRUCTION APPROPRIATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the message of the President, just received, which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

For reasons heretofore stated in my several veto messages to Congress upon the subject of reconstruction, I return without my approval the joint resolution to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States, and appropriating for that purpose the sum of $1,000,000.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1867.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to the passage of this bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 22, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koonitz, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polesley, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—100.

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Barnes, Boyer, Brooks, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Holman, Kerr, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Neall, Pruyn, Robinson, Ross, Stone, Van Aiken, and Van Trump—22.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Bromwell, Burr, Coker, Chanler, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Ella, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Griswold, Harding, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Laffin, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Morgan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Peters, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stewart, Taber, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—48.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the resolution was passed, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

During the roll-call, Mr. PLANTS said: Upon the question of reconstruction my colleague, Mr. SHELLABARGER, agreed with myself to pair with our colleague, Mr. MORGAN. That was the only vote on which we anticipated the necessity of a pair of two to one. But I wish to extend the pair to this vote.

GOVERNMENT OF THE ARMY—AGAIN.

The House then resumed the consideration of the joint resolution concerning the government of the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the joint resolution by inserting after the word "relieved" the words "by the President," and I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall adjourn their respective Houses on Saturday, the 20th day of July, 1867, at 12 o'clock, meridian.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this is a privileged question. The House has already adopted a concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment until the 13th of November, leaving a blank for the day on which the adjournment shall take place. The Chair states this fact that it may be within the knowledge of the House. The resolution now offered proposes an adjournment without day.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is what I desire. I am opposed to a meeting in November.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I think we had better not dispose of this question until to-morrow. There are some important matters yet to be acted upon.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to ask the Chair whether this resolution is not inconsistent with that already passed by the House providing for a reassembling of Congress in November.

The SPEAKER. That is the fact; but there is nothing in the rules preventing the House from sending to the Senate several resolutions on this subject. It has sometimes happened that three or four resolutions of this kind have been passed by the House, until finally the Senate has taken up one and acted upon it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to inquire whether the Chair wishes to be understood as saying that in case we adopt the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] and the Senate should concur in both our resolutions, there would then be an adjournment until December.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot suppose it possible that the Senate will adopt both resolutions. It would not be respectful to the Senate to entertain such a supposition.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman has not the floor to make that motion; I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. DRIGGS. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to amend his resolution so as to fix three o'clock to-morrow afternoon as the time for adjournment. It seems to me this is preferable, in case any legislation should require to be perfected to-morrow.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I was about to say that if there is any legislation necessary to be done, we can hold a session this evening, or can meet earlier than usual to-morrow morning. An adjournment to-morrow at noon will be very convenient to members who desire to get away. I think that we ought to adopt this resolution this afternoon, and send it to the Senate.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] is still entitled to the floor, if he claims it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield the floor. I am willing to leave this matter to the decision of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of Horatio Ames for compensation for eleven wrought iron guns manufactured for the Navy Department, and asking that his system of fabrication be inquired into.

By Mr. JULLIAN: The petition of the Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, praying the location of the Indian tribes of the United States on a tract of land of sufficient size, under the superintendence of a competent and humane person, with a view to their education and their protection in all their rights.

By Mr. LOAN: The petition of C. M. Commes-ser, asking for a pension.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 20, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

SELECTION OF OFFICERS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 143.

Mr. JOHNSON. What bill is that?

The CHIEF CLERK. "An act to regulate the selection of officers in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that read for information?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is read for information.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill at length. I cannot understand it from its title.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. It provides that it shall be the duty of the mayor of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, the Board of Aldermen, and the Board of Common Council thereof, to assemble in joint convention, at the City Hall, on the first Monday in August in each year, and select by ballot all officers whose appointments are now authorized by the charter or by any law of the United States or act or ordinance of the city, or which may hereafter be authorized thereby; and that when so assembled they may abolish any of the offices now established, or change the duties connected therewith, or the compensation thereof, as they may deem proper or necessary for the interests of the city; but no person is to be regarded as incompetent to hold any office or be disqualified therefor on account of his race or color.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is enough for my purpose. That changes the charter of the city very materially, and I am not prepared to say whether the change is or is not a wise one. I object to the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the bill be proceeded with. It is within the control of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. How?

Mr. SUMNER. Because it is on the table, and it is called up.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not understand it so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland raises a question of order under the resolution adopted by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be referred to the Senate for decision. The question is, Is it in order to proceed with the consideration of this bill?

Mr. POMEROY. I am anxious to proceed with this bill; but I cannot say that it is in order under the rule. I thought a motion would be made to suspend so much of the rule as interferes with proceeding with this bill. I am anxious to proceed with it; but I cannot vote that it is in order under the resolution of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I move to suspend the rule so far as this bill is concerned. I believe that motion is in order.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. I make that motion, to suspend the rule for the purpose of taking up this bill from the House.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I raise the question of order, whether that motion is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done except on one day's notice, I suppose, to suspend the rule.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the rule.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, adopted by the Senate on the 5th instant:

Resolved, That the legislative business of this session be confined to removing the obstructions which have been, or are likely to be, placed in the way of the fair execution of the acts of reconstruction heretofore adopted by Congress, and to giving to said acts the scope intended by Congress when the same were passed; and that further legislation at this session on the subject of reconstruction, or any other subject, is not expedient.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to make a remark on that rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is debatable.

Mr. SUMNER. I submit the question whether that rule is applicable to bills that come from the House of Representatives? Is it not to be confined to measures originated in the Senate? Where a bill has been matured in the House and has passed that body and has found its way to this Chamber, I submit that that rule is not applicable. It is not applicable surely in express terms. You make it applicable only by interpretation. I submit that a rule like that should not be extended by interpretation and made applicable to cases not expressly embraced by its language.

Mr. JOHNSON. The very purpose of the rule would be defeated if it bears the interpretation contended for by the honorable member from Massachusetts. It would place it in the power of the House to force upon us to do what we say ought not to be done, looking to the interests of the public. Our resolution is that we ought to perform no business except such as is connected with the question of reconstruction. It will not be pretended that this has anything to do with the question of the reconstruction of the States.

Mr. GRIMES. It is the reconstruction of the city.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is the reconstruction of the city, and the city was not within the original reconstruction acts of last March. We might as well pass a law to reconstruct the city of Baltimore, and insist that that does not fall within the limitation in the rule. So far from the business that comes from the House being included by interpretation within the meaning of the rule, it seems to me that no interpretation of that rule can exclude that or any other business from the operation of the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, whether it is still in order, applicable to this subject. I will state here that when the rule first came up the Chair supposed the resolution of the Senate would not embrace bills sent here from the House, and so ruled, but he was overruled in that.

Mr. HARLAN. I will only say that thus far the Senate has not applied that rule to business that has been sent to the Senate from the House.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes, it has.

Mr. GRIMES. The resolutions of thanks went over in that way, three of them at one time.

Mr. HARLAN. I am informed by my colleague that I am in error in the statement I have made.

Mr. GRIMES. The votes of thanks to the three generals went over on that ground; and if that were not the rule we should either be subject to the control of the House of Representatives or be compelled to come to the conclusion that the business sent to us from the House of Representatives was not legislative business and included in that general term embraced in the resolution. I think we decided correctly that the business of passing bills is legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, whether the motion to take up this bill is in order under the rule.

The question being put, it was decided in the negative.

ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Secretary be directed to request the House to return the resolution of adjournment passed last evening.

Mr. CONKLING. Why?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will give my reason in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I am told that it has not yet gone to the House; it is still before us.

Mr. CHANDLER. It was ordered to go to the House, I believe; it was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not yet been sent.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then all the better. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which that resolution was passed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Did the Senator vote with the majority?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know on which side the Senator from Michigan voted?

Mr. CHANDLER. I voted against it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I do not suppose it is competent for the Senator to move a reconsideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move that the Secretary be directed not to communicate the resolution to the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONKLING. That is not in order, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not know but it is. The resolution is before us. It is under the control of the Senate. In the opinion of the Chair the motion is in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is there not a rule making it the duty of the Secretary to communicate the action of the Senate to the House, and can you set that aside by a motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not think there is any written rule on the subject.

Mr. GRIMES. There is a standing order of the Senate, which is a rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I am informed by the Clerk that there is a standing order that all that is done here shall be communicated to the House. It is not written down among the rules, but that is the order of proceeding of course. I am not ready to say that it is not in order to move to suspend sending a thing there. I do not know of any rule that it would violate, though it would violate the practice and order of proceeding.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the Clerk read the rule.

The Chief Clerk read the 12th Joint Rule, as follows:

"12. When a bill or resolution which shall have passed in one House is rejected in the other, notice thereof shall be given to the House in which the same shall have passed."

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe my motion is in order, and I wish to say a few words upon it, and I will say them now before the vote is taken. I notice that the self-same parties who are now in favor of adjourning until December are the same parties who were in favor of adjourning in the month of April last until December. It is, I believe, identically the same vote. I do not know that there is any change. In the month of April there was a contest for more than two weeks over the question of a final adjournment, or an extra session. There seemed to be a determination on the part of some gentlemen on this side of the Chamber in connection with the whole of the other side, to prevent an extra session of Congress in any event; and the Conservative Senator from Maine informed us that if there was any necessity for another session of Congress the President would call us together. I then informed the Conservative Senator from Maine that the only conceivable occasion for an extra session that I could see would be the refusal of the President to execute a law which he himself declared unconstitutional, and that I did not believe the President would call an extra session of Congress to enforce a law which he himself refused to enforce. After a contest of more than two weeks we finally passed a sort of a resolution for another session of Congress; but it was so fixed by the Conservative Senator from Maine and his friends as to appear to be utterly impossible that we could get a meeting of Congress, to wit, that if on the first roll-call there was not a majority of both Houses of Congress present this session of Congress should fail.

I really hoped, then, that the Conservative Senator from Maine was right, and that there would be no necessity for another session of Congress. I hoped that I was mistaken, and that the President would in good faith execute this law, and that no session of Congress would be called for. But, sir, unfortunately I was not mistaken, but the Conservative Senator from Maine was. He had then full confidence in the President that he would call an extra session of Congress if it was needed, and I suppose he has full confidence now that if an extra session of Congress is needed the President will call it. I have seen nothing since then that has diminished my confidence in the President. I have just as much confidence in him to-day as I had in April or as I had in December last. He has done no act which has diminished my confidence in him in the slightest degree; and I presume he has done no act which has diminished the confidence of the Conservative Senator from Maine. I presume he has the same confidence in him now that he had then, as I have. Then, sir, I merely dreaded the contingency, I feared that it would be necessary to call an extra session, and when asked by one of the friends of the Senator from Maine—I forget whether it was in caucus or in the Senate—what my evidence was, I had none. I had an internal conviction that an extra session would be necessary; but still I had no evidence. But now, sir, there is no doubt. The President, in his defiant and rebellious message, has declared to us that he will not execute our law, substantially, in terms. We know that he will not do it.

Sir, when we first captured the monster there was one thing for us to do, and only one; but instead of doing that we undertook to surround him with nets, to hem him in, to bind him with nets of zephyr. The very moment we left he thrust his paw through. The net was a mere web of zephyr. Now we have met here, and what have we done? We have patched up the net. It is the same net; but we have patched up the hole. It is not a bit stronger now than it was in April; but we have mended up the hole. That is all that we have done. And now this Congress seem to hope that the same animal that thrust his paw through the net when it was new will not thrust it through again when it is merely a patched net. He leaves us in no doubt whatever about that. He is more bold than he was then; he is more defiant; he is more specific. He says:

"Within a period of less than a year the legislation of Congress has attempted to strip the executive department of the Government of some of its essential powers. The Constitution and the oath provided in it devolve upon the President the power and the duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. The Constitution, in order to carry out this power, gives him the choice of the agents, and makes them subject to his control and supervision. But in the execution of these laws the constitutional obligation upon the President remains, but the power to exercise that constitutional duty is effectually taken away."

"The military commander is, as to the power of appointment, made to take the place of the President, and the General of the Army the place of the Senate; and any attempt on the part of the President to assert his own constitutional power may, under pretense of law, be met by official insubordination. It is not to be feared that these military officers, looking to the authority given by these laws rather than to the letter of the Constitution, will recognize no authority but the commander of the district and the General of the Army."

That is exactly what we meant. There is no doubt about it at all. We meant just that and nothing else.

"If there was no other objection than this to this proposed legislation it would be sufficient. While I hold the chief executive authority of the United States, while the obligation rests upon me to see that all the laws are faithfully executed, I can never willingly surrender that trust or the powers given for its execution."

And he never will willingly surrender that power. He tells us so. He does not intend to execute your law; and yet you propose, after having mended your net, to go away and leave him with the absolute power for four months and a half to remove your commanders and to nullify your laws.

Mr. President, I hope that this resolution will not be carried to the House, and I hope that no such resolution will pass this body. I hope this Congress will not adjourn until it has resolved, in some contingency and at an early day, to meet again. I hope that that will be the resolution of this body.

The House yesterday by an almost unanimous vote passed a vote which would render this reconstruction act effective. It lies upon our tables. If we could pass that bill I should feel more satisfied to leave the matter in the hands of the President; but, sir, a single objection carried it over yesterday, and it could only be read once; and I fear it will not be passed before we adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to a question of order. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I wish to dispatch business. I submit that yesterday a resolution was passed amending a resolution from the House on the subject of adjournment; and an order was passed, as will appear by the Journal, instructing the Secretary to communicate that amendment to the House of Representatives. I understand that it has not been done. I desire to have the order of the Senate executed, and then it will be perfectly in order for the Senator from Michigan to move that it be returned from the House; but I submit that it is not in order to refrain from executing an order of the Senate under an apprehension that it may be rescinded. It will be time enough when it is rescinded to act according to the vote rescinding it; but until it is rescinded I submit that it is the duty of the Secretary to carry out the order of the Senate, as it appears on the Journal. I ask that the order with regard to it from the Journal may be read.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will move to rescind that order so far as this resolution is concerned. I believe that motion will be in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly the Senator can move to rescind it; but in the mean time, until the vote is taken, the order must be executed. That is the point I submit, that the order of the Senate must be executed. It will then be competent for the Senator from Michigan to move to rescind the order or to have the resolution brought back from the House; but it is not competent for one Senator to get up and stop the execution of an order of the Senate by a motion. That is my point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the standing order.

The CHIEF CLERK. The order which follows immediately the action of the Senate on the resolution of the House is as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the amendment to said resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, I submit that it is the duty of the Secretary to carry out that order, and then the Senator from Michigan can make any motion he chooses on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question that it is the duty of the Secretary to communicate to the House what we have done under that order. The question is whether we can suspend it while the resolution is before us; and if there is no standing rule on the subject I can hardly say that it is not in order to make such a motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. With great respect to the Chair, I do not dispute the right of the Senator from Michigan to make the motion which he does. I think his motion is perfectly in order; but I do insist that the Secretary shall execute the order of the Senate. The Senate have ordered the Secretary to do a specific act. Now I insist that the Secretary shall execute that order, and in the mean time the Senator from Michigan can make any motion in order that he sees fit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The duty of the Clerk is not suspended that I know of by this proceeding. It is a standing order to carry the action of the Senate to the House; but still there is a motion pending which is equivalent to rescinding that order.

Mr. GRIMES. I object to the President presuming to direct what is the duty of the Secretary in this behalf. The rule of the Senate prescribes the duties of the Secretary as much as they prescribe the duties of the Presiding Officer or of any other officer of the body; and it is just as much his duty to execute that order, without anticipating what may be the possible action of the Senate, as it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to decide according to the rules prescribed for the performance of his duties.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is just what I am trying to do, to prevent him from executing that order.

Mr. ANTHONY. When a motion is made to suspend a rule, I submit the rule is not suspended while the debate is going on. The Senator from Michigan can move to suspend that order; but in the mean time the duty of the Secretary is to execute the order of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to make a reply to the Senator from Iowa, who seems to assume that the Chair interferes with what he considers the duty of the Clerk. I made no order about it. The question is, whether the motion of the Senator from Michigan is in order; and what the effect of making such a motion may be I have not undertaken to decide. I do not know that it suspends the execution of the order of the Senate for a moment. I have not undertaken to decide that it does or does not. It leaves the Clerk full power to execute his duty until it shall be interrupted by the decision of the Senate on this motion; but I make no order about it one way or the other. The Clerk will choose his own course about it. I do not suppose the Chair has anything to do with that until the Senate determines the question.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it is sufficient notice to him not to execute that order while we are discussing the question.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire simply to say that I understood the Chair to decide with me, that it was the duty of the Secretary to execute the behests of this body as prescribed to him by its rules, but to go on and intimate to him that inasmuch as the debate was pending upon the question of the rescission of this resolution, it would be proper for him to withhold that message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not say that, and said nothing about it at all. The Chair leaves the Clerk to perform his duty according to his own idea of it, unless the Senate countermands him; but I cannot say that the motion to suspend this rule is not in order, inasmuch as I find no rule against it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The decision of the Chair accords precisely with the question I raised. I did not mean to raise the question that the Senator from Michigan was out of order in making the motion; I think the motion is perfectly in order; but I did mean to say it was the duty of the Secretary to obey the orders of the Senate without presuming that they may be countermanded. In that I understand the Chair perfectly agrees with me.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Secretary had not obeyed the order up to the time we assembled this morning, and we then commenced a discussion on the question of that very action of the Senate, I think it is sufficient notice to the Secretary not to execute the order until the action of the Senate is determined.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then if there should be a motion made to repeal any other rule of the Senate requiring the performance of any duty by the Secretary, it would be proper for the Secretary to suspend the execution of that rule, to suspend the duties that he was performing under it, until he saw whether the Senate would change its mind or not.

Mr. POMEROY. While the action of the Senate is pending on a motion of that character it is sufficient notice to the Clerk not to execute the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then, in order to suspend the rule for any time it is only necessary for a Senator to make a motion that it be suspended, and it must be suspended until the Senate shall act upon it, and in that way you may suspend all our rules.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask a question of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the point to be whether the fact that a motion is made to rescind a resolution—

Mr. POMEROY. That is not the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, it is; I beg your pardon—whether the fact that such a motion is made arrests and holds just where it is whatever the motion covers. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if a Senator should move to rescind the order applicable to a whole day's proceedings, (because of course it could cover various bills as well as one,) and the Senate should proceed to debate that motion for weeks, whether it be true that by that operation the whole business of legislation passing between the two Houses could be arrested by a single member?

Mr. POMEROY. I could answer the Senator by saying that it would not, and yet that does not touch this case at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the proposition of the Senator from Michigan to be that by moving to rescind the order he holds this resolution here pending the consideration of it in the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Michigan rose to make a motion for the return of a resolution to the Senate which had gone, as he thought, to the House of Representatives. Then the Senator from Michigan undertook to discuss that motion; and that was sufficient notice to the Clerk not to execute the order. That is my point.

Mr. CONKLING. I deny that for one; because if that be so any Senator can rise and enter such a motion, and it might be discussed for three weeks and no business would be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I do not think there is any question of that sort before the Senate. It is not the duty of the Chair to decide what the effect of a motion is upon the standing orders of the body. The Clerk is to perform his duty until he is arrested by the decision of the Senate in a contrary direction. Perhaps that is the true rule.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no point of order raised on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no point of order raised that I know of. The Chair decided that the Senator from Michigan was in order in making his motion; and if he was he has a right to argue it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am now informed that the Clerk has obeyed the order of the Senate and reported the resolution to the House, and I now desire to enter the motion which I first proposed, that the Clerk be directed to request the House to return the resolution to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. While I am up I have a few remarks more to make, and I may as well make them here. There is a difference between the views of the people, in my judgment, with regard to the present President and the views of some members of this body. The people, so far as I know them, certainly the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, have no confidence whatever in Andrew Johnson. They believe, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] said yesterday, that he occupies the position to-day with regard to the rebellion which Jefferson Davis did three years ago. They have no faith whatever in Andrew Johnson. But, sir, there is a sort of semi-conservative influence springing up that seems to have faith in Andrew Johnson. This republican conservatism is a sort of hybrid, and, like all hybrids, it has no power of reproduction; the race dies out with the first generation.

It started in 1862. It was started by William H. Seward, the Blair family, and Thurlow Weed; and the intention was to bury all Radicals; and, sir, your and my headstones were prepared. It was attempted then to form a Union party, to take in all the Copperheads and the Conservatives and carry the nation. We had in Michigan one man who turned Conservative at that time, a man who represented my district, by the name of Granger. All the rest of the delegation were to be buried and have headstones erected over them, except this man, who represented the Conservatives. Well, sir, the people of Michigan had a funeral, and erected a headstone; but it was over this Conservative; and that monument of conservatism is the only one that it has been necessary to erect in the State of Michigan from that day to this. She has never had but one pervert, and over his political remains was raised a tombstone, and that tombstone, having to this day marked the place where he was buried, it has not been necessary to raise any others. Michigan from that day to this has had a united delegation, sound upon radical republicanism.

It was so all over the United States. These tombstones were raised everywhere in every State, not over those who were then called Radicals, for they were the men who were in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war and who were in favor of the measures which finally put down the war, but conservatism at that time was buried, and nothing more was heard of it for some time. We had three or four gentlemen here who used to lecture us upon our constitutional obligations, and who were still members in good standing with the Radical Republicans of this body. The Senate know to whom I refer. But conservatism made no progress until after the close of the war. In 1865 it again raised its head in an attempt to unite the rebels North and South with the Conservative Republicans in the North. They erected their platform and appealed to the people, and the people again went to raising tombstones. Sir, the path of conservative republicanism is as clearly marked by tombstones as is the great highway to California by the carcasses and bones of dead mules. No man can mistake its path, because the tombstones are scattered thick all along the route.

In 1866 conservatism again united with rebels and Copperheads, and appealed to the people to sustain it; and, as I said before, the people immediately commenced raising tombstones; and in every loyal State every single man who deviated one iota from the Radical platform had erected over his political grave, "Here lies the body of a recusant: a man who could not be trusted by the people." They went further than that; they took these suspected men. In my own State I told you where they commenced raising tombstones; but, sir, they commenced it even in this body. There were men here who were generally sound upon all great questions; but occasionally they switched off and took the Conservative side. Every such man, without one single exception, the day his time was out had erected over his political grave a tombstone, simply because he had not been true to the wishes of the people. There are several members of this body now having their seats upon this floor because their predecessors were not true to the principles that the people believed in and advocated. Sir, the people have not yet got done erecting tombstones. The people are in earnest. Conservatism takes root in great cities. The city of New York is a Conservative city by, I believe, sixty or seventy thousand majority; some other cities are Conservative; but, sir, nine tenths of the voters of the United States believe as you and I do, in thorough, sound Radicals.

Mr. President, I had a conversation a few years ago with Mr. Lincoln on this subject of Conservatives. When Thurlow Weed marched out of our party and shut the door and bade us good-bye, I went to Mr. Lincoln and urged that he should bolt the door and leave Thurlow Weed and his coadjutors out; and I urged it upon this ground: that outside of our political organization Thurlow Weed was harmless; inside of our political organization he could do harm. He pretended to have a large Conservative vote in the State of New York. In the course of that conversation Mr. Lincoln alluded to the large numbers of the Conservatives. Said I, "Mr. Lincoln, I know something about the strength of the Republican Conservative party in Michigan. I can put the entire party in Michigan into a street railroad car and haul them up hill with two horses." The party has diminished since that, and I can now put them in a one-horse chaise and draw them with a mule. At that time I told him that I could haul the whole Republican Conservative party of the State of New York, outside the city of New York, in one railroad train with one locomotive. Well, sir, to-day, outside of two or three of the cities in the great State of New York, I can haul them in an omnibus. This conservatism has been growing small by degrees and beautifully less. The people understand precisely what they mean, and the people are with this Congress. They are with the majority in the House of Representatives who passed that bill yesterday that we ought to pass to-day. They are in favor of this Congress either sitting here or passing such laws as will make it safe for us to leave here; and I hope that this Congress will not adjourn until after they have passed the bill that came from the House yesterday, or agree to meet at an early day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have been somewhat puzzled, as I sat here listening to this prepared attack upon several gentlemen, and particularly upon myself, by the Senator from Michigan, as to what to say in reply, or whether to say anything. In the case of any other Senator in this body I should not have had any doubt at all; but with regard to the Senator from Michigan I am somewhat at a loss what to say. It is quite evident that this prepared, this thoroughly digested speech of the honorable Senator—I beg his pardon and the pardon of the Senate; I will say of the Senator—was meant particularly as an attack upon myself. He has alluded to me over and over again as "the Conservative Senator from Maine;" and he has gone on to describe two several occasions on which Conservatives, as he calls them, have endeavored to unite with the Democrats in order to overthrow the Republican party, applying the same term to them that he does to me.

It is impossible for me to mistake the aim and object of the Senator. There can be no mistake about it, I think, in the mind of any one who has heard him. I have been aware for some time that that Senator and some other Senators on the floor designed deliberately, if they could, to injure my standing and position, such as it may be, in the party to which I have the honor to belong. This is not the first open attack which has been made upon me by that Senator; and he stands not alone. I am aware, also, that that Senator—and he is not the only one—has taken pains privately to represent me as unfaithful because I do not agree with him in his notions with reference to the conduct of some public affairs. This has not been confined to this body or to the other House, to running about this Chamber and into the other Chamber; it has even gone into the reporters' offices, where I have been denounced in the same way; and divers and sundry claquers have followed up the same system. I have taken no notice of it, because I did not think it worth noticing. My notion is that the reputation of a public man must take care of itself; that the people will judge him from what he does and from what he says.

Sir, I have been aware that this was the particular object of the Senator from Michigan, because I received the other day from the city where he resides a slip, cut out of a newspaper of that city I suppose, in which a similar attack was made upon me, and in which I was denounced as opposing impeachment because I had friends and relatives in office. The accusation has gone the rounds of the papers that I had friends and relatives in office, and that I was ready to sacrifice my public duty for the protection of those friends and relatives. I have taken no notice of it up to this time. It may be well to do so, if the Senate will excuse me while I say a word or two upon that subject. I believe the Detroit newspaper said I had forty relatives in office. It so happens that I have three brothers who hold office under the President of the United States, and it so happens that neither of them was appointed at my request or by my suggestion. One of them is a superintendent of a marine hospital. He was appointed by Secretary Chase as a particular mark of regard to my honored father, who wrote to him requesting it, and not on my suggestion in any way, and it is certainly not a very great office.

I have another who is a postmaster. Not only did I not recommend him, but I positively refused to recommend him; and I occasioned some hard feelings in my family by refusing to recommend him, simply because it was out of the district where I resided, and I considered it the proper province of the Representative from that district to act in that matter; but he was appointed.

I have another who is an examiner in the Patent Office. Not only did I not recommend him, but I never knew he wanted the office. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] will bear me witness that I did not ask for it, and the first intelligence I received of his appointment was from the newspapers.

That is my offense so far as my brothers are concerned; and I say now, before God, that with regard to each of them I believe they would despise me in their hearts if they thought that I could sacrifice one iota of my belief or hold my tongue for a moment on their account. They are made of different stuff.

I have been twitted in the newspapers with the fact that my sons were generals in the Army. God gave me four sons. [The Senator paused, evidently suppressing deep emotion.] Three of them volunteered, and the other volunteered also, but his health broke down, and he was obliged to stay at home, much to his regret and sorrow. My youngest son fell upon his first field. Another had his arm shattered and his leg shot off. The third was not wounded, but served and fought in twenty battles. I never asked for the appointment of one of them to any office. They got their recommendations from their superior officers, and were appointed generals not on my recommendation. I did not ask for it. I told them they must fight their own way. Perhaps my standing in the Senate might have been a benefit to them in that particular, and my kindly relations with the Secretary of War; but what they got was not from the President. The two that live are now out of the service entirely.

Sir, I have thought it rather hard that newspapers of my own party should abuse me for having sons who distinguished themselves in the war, one of whom was killed and another shattered. They served their country well and rose to high rank, which I believe they deserved. I never heard it said that they did not, and it appears strange that I should be abused in the newspapers of my own party for that which in others would have been considered a meritorious distinction—having sons and giving them to the service of their country.

There is one matter that I had forgotten. While I was Secretary of the Treasury I appointed a young man, a cousin of mine, to a twelve-hundred-dollar clerkship. That is the only relative I appointed. That is the length and breadth of my offending, unless I am held accountable for the appointment of the judge of the district court in my State, whose daughter my son married, who was recommended by Judge Clifford, by the chief justice of our State, and by an ex-chief justice and the leading members of the bar, and was unquestionably a fit man to be appointed.

I have said thus much in order that it may be understood exactly what is the length and breadth of my offending in relation to office. I may add that when the administration of Mr. Lincoln commenced I was offered—I did not ask for it; my friend here [Mr. GRIMES] knows the fact—an appointment abroad for one of my sons; and I declined it, because, I said, there were too many in my State who wanted those offices and they must have them; and that if my son wanted to go abroad I would send him at my own expense. That son volunteered. After he had volunteered—a young man of education; I had educated him with the greatest care, and he was then ready to enter upon the practice of law in New York, where he had gone—I did ask my friend, the then Secretary of War, [Mr. CAMERON,] if he thought him worthy, to give him a commission: I did not specify what. I told him his age and his qualifications. I did not believe he had the strength to carry a musket; but he would go as a private soldier if he could not go otherwise; and I wrote to my friend asking him if he could give him a commission; and he did. That young man was the one who had his arm shattered in his first battle and a leg shot off in another, and who was nominated—not at my request, not on my suggestion—being then a colonel, for brigadier general, and was confirmed by this body, without being referred, for the gallantry of the action in which he had been.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator from Maine will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I think he does injustice to himself. He did not ask me for a commission. I remember the circumstance very well. He came there to ask me to appoint some other young man from the ranks in his State, and I asked him if he had not a son of his own carrying a musket. He said he had. He did not ask for a commission; I gave the commission without his asking for it. I do not think he knew it would be done until he saw the appointment. I was glad to do it, and I have been proud that I did, since I have been aware of the conduct of that young gentleman. I believe his gallant conduct reflected some credit on myself for making the appointment, and I have been very much gratified at it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is what I have been twitted with in newspapers of my own party, one in the city from which the Senator comes. I can guess under whose suggestion the attack was made.

I am called a "Conservative" by the honorable Senator, and he has shown what he means by Conservatives—men who act with the Democracy against his party. Let Senators turn to the record of my votes in this body and find where I have fallen short. Confidence in Andrew Johnson is it? No, sir; it is a want of confidence that actuates me and some others in those who would assume to direct what they have not the capacity to direct.

Sir, if I am a Conservative by my vote on this question and others I am a Conservative in company with the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL;] I am a Conservative in company with the honorable Senators from New York, with the honorable Senators from New Jersey, with the honorable Senators from Rhode Island, with the honorable Senators from New Hampshire; and on this question, as taken at the last session, with one of the Senators from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] Is he a Conservative too? And there are other honorable gentlemen that I can name. Why then is this attack made upon me, because I happen to act with the decided majority in this body on this question? Sir, we must be at liberty upon great questions of this kind to exercise our own judgments. I have no fear whatever of the most critical examination of my course in this Senate and out of it upon this question and all other questions. I shall leave my public record to take care of itself. If I had the slightest idea that anything the Senator from Michigan can say would affect it before the people of this country I should look upon myself with a contempt which I do not feel at present.

Mr. President, the time has come undoubtedly when there is a very serious difference of opinion in Congress upon a very important question. With regard to the Senate, I have considered that upon that question it was not proper for a Senator to express an opinion, or even, if he could avoid it, to form an opinion. My idea has been that a man who is to be a judge and try another in any given event under the sanction and solemnity of an oath was bound, as an honest and conscientious man, not only not to form an opinion, but if possible to keep his mind as free as he could from prejudice and passion, so that he might come to the examination of it calmly and quietly, resolved to try honestly and decide fairly, without feeling, without anger, without malice, and without having committed himself by denunciations of the individual. That is my idea. It is not the idea of other members of this body. They think that it is proper for them to come to such an examination, if it is had, with temper, with malignity, with denunciation, and with every effort to excite the public mind as well as their own. That is their idea. It does not agree with mine.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will not reflect upon all the members of the Senate in that direction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; I said of "other members;" not all, judging merely from the demonstrations that have been made here. Gentlemen must judge for themselves. I complain of nobody. It is for every man to make his own mark, and move in his own line. I shall act upon mine.

With regard to this great question, as a matter of policy, as a matter of good sense, I have not withheld my opinion upon it from my friends or from anybody who wanted to know it; and perhaps that opinion is well known and understood. But, sir, I await events. When they come I trust I shall be prepared to meet them, in my place, and, I hope, with an honest and pure mind. I shall try so to meet them, at any rate. Whether I am in the majority or minority will make no difference to me personally.

But, sir, it does make some difference to me how I am judged by the country; and, as I said before, I shall leave that country to decide upon so insignificant a matter as what my public course has been; and I trust it will try me by my record, what I have voted here, upon which I desire, in any particular, the Senator or anybody else to lay his finger and call me to an account for what I have said here or elsewhere. So long as I can keep in company with the honorable Senator from Illinois, the Senators from New York, one of the Senators at least from Massachusetts, and all the Senators from New England perhaps, except one, and be sustained by them in the course that I take, I shall endeavor to rest as quiet as possible under the denunciation of even so potent a man as the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator has brought up his family record and exhibited it to this body in answer to the remarks that I made. I never alluded to his family record at all. He says that a newspaper in Detroit printed an article on the subject. I have nothing to do with the Detroit newspapers. I never wrote a line for a newspaper nor saw an article before it was published; nor did I ever see the article to which he alludes in my life. Will the Senator hold me responsible for all that the newspapers in Michigan may say? Sir, I took the Senator from Maine on his public record and on his public declarations on this floor; and I made no allusion to his family record, or any other record, except that made in this body.

He says he cooperates with the Senators from New York and the Senator from Illinois. Did any one of those men say he believed the President would call an extra session of Congress if it was necessary? Not that I heard of; not that I am aware of. Not one of them ever made that declaration. Sir, it is known, not only to this body but to the country, that the Senator has stood here for month after month, the defender of Andrew Johnson and his Cabinet; and I take him on his record, on that defense and not on his family affairs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have only to say a single word. In saying that, the Senator states what is not true, and he cannot prove any portion of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was it not a defense of the President to say that he would call a session of Congress?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; by no manner of means.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I do not understand the use of the English language.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "For six months" I think you said.

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; and I will not take off a day; I will add to it, rather than diminish it. He stood up here as the defender of the Secretary of the Treasury persistently day after day, week after week, and month after month. I take his public record. I care nothing about him nor his family. I care not how many men he has in office, or how many out of office; it is none of my concern. It is a matter too infinitesimally small to allude to in this body. But his public record, his utterances, and his votes on this floor I have a right to comment upon. When he talks about contempt, I hurl back with scorn the contempt he expresses.

Sir, I have a record upon which I stand, as well as the Senator himself, and I believe I am as proud of it. I have nothing in that record to apologize for, take back, or explain.

My votes are there, and my utterances there. After a review of ten years, so help me God, I have never been able to discover a word I have uttered, or a vote that I have cast, that I would change, upon the review.

Mr. President, this is a matter of public concern. It is a matter in which the interests and the perpetuity of this nation are deeply concerned. I called up the Senator's record because it was necessary to illustrate the point I made, and for no other reason. He last spring came near defeating an extra call of the Senate, and I did not expect to see him here at that extra call; but, sir, the people demanded in their strength that we should come here, and no man dared stay away. Those monuments along the road stood up in bold relief, and they had a warning effect. Some men who were the most bitterly hostile to that extra call, who declared that they would not come here even if the Senate and House met, are here; and why? Because the people demanded that they should come, and they dared not stay away. And now, sir, the people demand of us that we shall either fasten this man Andrew Johnson so that he can do no more harm to this nation, or that we shall stay here and tie his hands by our presence.

PRIVILEGES OF DEBATE.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate resolve itself into executive session.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that is done I wish to introduce a proposition to the Senate, and at least to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be received by common consent, leaving the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania suspended, if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer resolutions which I will ask to have printed, and as they are in my own handwriting I will read them:

Resolutions declaring the privileges of debate in the Senate with regard to civil officers liable to impeachment.

Whereas it has been asserted that the conduct of a civil officer, liable to impeachment, cannot be freely considered and condemned by Senators in the course of legislative proceedings; and whereas such an opinion is calculated to impair the just privileges of debate: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Constitution, in providing for the impeachment of "all civil officers" of the national Government, embracing the President, members of the Cabinet, diplomatic representatives, and other civil functionaries, did not intend to limit debate in the Senate on the conduct of any civil officer, so far as the same may arise in legislative proceedings; that any other interpretation is inconsistent with the privileges of the Senate, and tends directly to shield misconduct in civil offices.

Resolved, That the Constitution expressly declares that "when sitting to try an impeachment the Senate shall be on oath or affirmation," thus superadding a judicial oath to that already taken as Senator; that from the taking of this oath the judicial character of the Senate begins, and until then each Senator is free to express himself openly on the conduct of any civil officer, and thereupon to invite the judgment of the Senate and the country; that at times this may be a duty, and it is always a sacred right, which cannot be renounced or abridged.

I send these resolutions to the Chair and ask to have them printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be received and ordered to be printed, no objection being made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. No. 138) to carry into effect the convention with the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

Mr. WILSON. I ask leave to report a bill with the assent of the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to raising volunteers for the suppression of the Indian war. It will be remembered that we passed a bill the other day on Indian affairs, in which provision was made for raising troops in a certain contingency. That bill, we understand, will not become a law, and therefore, with the consent of the Military Committee, I report this bill and ask that it be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by common consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask what action was taken on my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No action. The Senator from Pennsylvania moved to go into executive session, which superseded it.

Mr. WILSON. I am now informed that the bill which we passed in regard to Indian affairs has been passed by the House this morning. I will therefore simply introduce this bill and ask that it lie on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON. The House have passed our bill.

The bill (S. No. 140) to provide for the calling out of volunteers to suppress Indian hostilities was read a first time by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the bill lie on the table. I am told that the House has passed the other bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; it has.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 136) to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution providing for an adjournment of Congress until the 18th of November, and adhered to its original resolution.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 187) amendatory of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 63) declaring sympathy with the suffering people of Crete.

PEACE WITH INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Indian bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 136) to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes. The amendments of the House were in section one, lines seven and eight, to strike out the name "William Windom;" in line nine to strike out the words "and House of Representatives;" in line ten, before the word "and," where it first occurs, to insert the name "S. S. Tappan;" and also to strike out the second and third sections of the bill and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said commissioners are required to examine and select a district or districts of country having sufficient area to receive all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains not now peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations, to which the Government has the right of occupation or to which said commissioners can obtain the right of occupation, and in which district or districts there shall be sufficient tillable or grazing land to enable the said tribes respectively to support themselves by agricultural and pastoral pursuits. Said district or districts when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for said Indians to be located thereon; and no person not a member of said tribes shall ever be permitted to enter thereon without the permission of the tribes interested, except officers and employees of the United States: Provided, That the district or districts shall be so located as not to interfere with travel on highways located by authority of the United States or with the route of the Northern Pacific railroad, the Union Pacific railroad, the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, or the proposed route of the Atlantic and Pacific railway by the way of Albuquerque.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senate will observe that there are only two amendments made. The first is striking out the name of Mr. WINDOM, who says he cannot possibly go, and inserting the name of Mr. Tappan. Mr. Tappan, I understand, is a very good man, and one perfectly familiar with Indian affairs. My acquaintance with Mr. Tappan is not of very long duration. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] knows him better than any other Senator here, and can speak in reference to him. I understand he is a very worthy and fit man. I know he is a man of very great intelligence, and writes well on the subject of Indian affairs. He has furnished me with several of his articles on this subject.

The other amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] with a slight amendment to that, so as to have these reservations located in such places as shall not interfere with other railroads besides the Northern Pacific. With that exception it is the same amendment as offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. It leaves to the commissioners to select one, two, three, or four locations as they may see fit, but in other respects it is the same as the bill that went from the Senate. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

Mr. POMEROY. As to the name that has been inserted, Colonel Tappan, I can only say I regard it as one of the best appointments that could be made. I have known him intimately for twelve years. He is a good man. He was colonel of one of the Colorado regiments at one time, and served faithfully. He understands the Indians, and understands this whole question. No better man could be selected.

The amendments were concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

Mr. CONKLING. The House of Representatives have disagreed to our amendment to the resolution providing for an adjournment, and adhere to their original proposition; but there are blanks in that resolution which require to be filled up. I therefore submit a motion that the Senate insist on its amendment, and ask for a committee of conference. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. CONKLING. By the Chair, of course. The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. CONKLING, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. HOWE.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and, after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened at half past three o'clock.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 136) to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

MESSENGERS AND PAGES.

On motion of Mr. NYE, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized to retain during the coming recess the special messengers and pages now in his employ.

Mr. ANTHONY. What does that mean? Does it mean that during the recess these officers are to be paid the same as though Congress was in session? What is the effect of the resolution?

Mr. NYE. I introduced this resolution because I thought in some aspects it was entirely just and because the other House had adopted a similar resolution in regard to its officers. Many of the employees covered by the resolution are from distant States; and the boys who are our pages are mostly the sons of widows in poor circumstances. In the short interval that intervenes before we meet again they will be unable to do anything else. Those of them who are from distant States will hardly have time to go home and get back, and certainly will not have time to attend to any other business. For these reasons I introduced the resolution; and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. FOWLER. I hope this resolution will pass. These persons are employed but a short time at any rate. It is only a question of a few dollars. The other House has passed a similar resolution, and I think we ought to extend the same liberality to our employees.

The resolution was agreed to.

MILEAGE TO MEMBERS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I send to the desk, and ask leave to introduce, a bill authorizing the payment of mileage to members of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the bill be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which proposes to provide that Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of the Fortieth Congress who were in attendance prior to the recess taken on the 30th of March, 1867, and who after that date and before the reassembling of Congress on the 3d of July went to their respective homes and returned to take their seats in Congress after the recess, shall be paid the usual mileage for going to and returning from their respective residences.

Mr. CONKLING. I object to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot be received.

ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the resolution in relation to adjournment.

Mr. CONKLING. I send to the desk the report of the committee of conference, and ask that it may be read and considered.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the resolution of adjournment, report that having met and had full and free conference, they have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. on Saturday, the 20th day of July instant, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses, to meet on Thursday, the 21st day of November next, at twelve o'clock m.

ROSCOE CONKLING,

H. B. ANTHONY,

TIMOTHY O. HOWE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

F. A. PIKE,

F. C. BEAMAN,

BENJAMIN M. BOYER,

Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. HOWARD. This, Mr. President, is practically an adjournment sine die, for the 21st of November is only ten days before the commencement of the regular annual session of Congress under existing statutes. It cannot have been in contemplation of the committee of conference at all that the two Houses would assemble together on the 21st of November. Such a supposition cannot for a moment be entertained; and it appears to be their opinion, therefore, that there will be no necessity for any further meeting of this Congress before the commencement of the regular session in December. I do not concur with the committee on this subject. I dissent from it entirely. I believe that the necessity of another session of Congress between this time and that will be greater than that which has heretofore existed, and which has called us together now; and I derive this conviction from the very strong and emphatic and menacing language contained in the veto message upon which we acted yesterday.

The President tells us in that message, speaking of his power over the military commanders, that "it is to be feared that these military officers," that is, the officers who are to be appointed in the rebel States, "looking to the authority given by these laws, rather than to the letter of the Constitution, will recognize no authority but the commander of the district and the General of the Army." In a preceding passage he takes still higher ground, and says: "The Constitution, in order to carry out this power," that is, the power to see that the laws are faithfully executed, "gives him (the President) the choice of the agents, and makes them subject to his control and supervision." Here is a claim of executive power that transcends anything that I have ever seen, even in an executive message from the present incumbent.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark to him?

Mr. HOWARD. I shall occupy the time of the Senate but for a moment, and the Senator will pardon me if I decline to be interrupted. Here, sir, is very plainly an announcement of the purpose of the President to interfere with the appointments that may be made by the military commanders in the five military districts; and in case of disobedience on their part to his will to interfere by what he calls his constitutional power, and either to remove the commanders themselves from their places or to do something worse.

Sir, I have seen nothing in any of the executive messages which is so menacing, so revolutionary, and in my solemn judgment so unconstitutional and so treasonable as is contained in this passage which I have read. If there ever was a time when it was the duty of Congress to be in an attitude to check the progress of usurpation, this is the occasion. I very much regret that the committee of conference have come to the conclusion to which they have arrived, for I foresee in it difficulties such as we have not thus far encountered; and let me say, with all respect to the honorable Senator from New York, I think he is mistaken in his prophetic view of the next four and a half months. Sir, I ask for the yeas and nays when the vote shall be taken upon concurring in this report.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I will not say anything if we can have a vote now, and we must have it now if at all.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator begins will he allow me to make a remark?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I refrained from saying a word, for the reason that I desired to obtain a vote. It now wants ten minutes of four o'clock. Before we can adjourn properly, word should be sent to the President, and a message received from him with regard to some bills.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to begin by suggesting that the resolution should be amended so as to insert five o'clock instead of half past four.

Mr. CONKLING. That, I will say to the Senator, we cannot do, because this is a report of a conference committee which has been adopted by the House of Representatives, and we cannot amend it.

Mr. SUMNER. Thus the Senator puts that aside; but there is one remark of mine that he cannot put aside and cannot answer. The resolution of the Senator proposes to leave the President, a bad man, from this time forward to the end of November, from the heats of summer to the cold of winter, to bestride this country like a Colossus. I am against it; I am against any such surrender; and on that account I insisted upon the yeas and nays that I may record myself in the negative.

The Chief Clerk proceed to call the roll, and at the conclusion of the roll-call the vote stood—yeas 15 and nays 15.

Mr. CONKLING. I change my vote from the affirmative to the negative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon this vote—

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to have my name called. I vote in the affirmative.

Mr. CONKLING. I changed my vote before, so that I might be in a position to make a motion to reconsider. As I understand the vote of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who now appears, carries the proposition, I change my vote again to the affirmative.

Mr. NYE. Then I will change my vote with a view to move a reconsideration. I before voted in the negative; I now vote in the affirmative.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conklings, Davis, Frothinghuyse, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—22.

So the report was concurred in.

Mr. NYE. I move now to reconsider the vote just taken; and on that motion I desire to say a few words; and I hope I can do so without provoking any feeling. I have listened attentively to the argument on both sides of this question. I listened attentively to the President's veto message yesterday, and to a like document in March last. My judgment then was that it was wise for Congress to keep itself in such a position that it could come together if the exigencies of the times demanded it. The present session of Congress indorses the wisdom, or at least the action, if not the wisdom of those who at that time were in favor of such a session. I have seen nothing in the interim that should weaken the judgment of the majority of this body as then expressed; but I have seen much to strengthen my conviction, and I think that even now it is wise for Congress to be in a position to come together should the exigencies of the times demand our reassembling.

I was admonished yesterday by those in favor of an adjournment to this late day that it was unbecoming Senators to express even a reason why they opposed this adjournment. Notwithstanding that admonition, I propose to say, in a spirit of kindness and truthfulness, that the conduct of the Executive of this nation is not of such a character as to warrant the great strength of Congress being placed in his hands. The history of the past few weeks should admonish this country that the hopes of the nation are anchored in Congress; that they have no other place to look for safety. That is manifest by the prompt attention and attendance of members from distant States at this session of Congress. They came here in obedience to that mighty power of public sentiment which is behind them at whatever personal inconvenience. The great loadstone of duty and the great pressure of a public will behind them brought them almost all here in their seats. Why? Because there was danger in the hour. I suggested at that time—the Senate will bear me witness—that we had two sources of danger—

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg to interrupt the Senator to submit a proposition to expedite business. It will be recollected by Senators that the resolution of adjournment has been passed by both Houses, and accordingly the two Houses will stand adjourned at half past four o'clock. The President has some important bills in his hands. He ought to be at once notified of our action. I will therefore move, with the consent of the Senator from Nevada, that a committee of two be appointed to notify the President of the action of the two Houses, and to see whether he has any further communication to make.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest that the committee ought to be a joint one. I think that has been the practice heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe it has been.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose, then, to offer as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Missouri this resolution:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make the two Houses of Congress are ready to adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to; and the President pro tempore being authorized to appoint the committee, Messrs. RAMSEY and HOWARD were appointed.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg the Chair to accept my most respectful acknowledgments for this appointment; but at the same time I most respectfully and earnestly desire the Senate to excuse me from serving on that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that he be excused from service upon the committee just appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. FOWLER to supply the vacancy.

Mr. NYE. I was saying that last spring when the question of adjournment at that time was before us I suggested that we had two sources of danger, one of which was from the Supreme Court. I was then gravely told by men much more learned in the law than myself that it was not possible to get the question there; and yet it has been twice there. The question has been there whether the State of Mississippi and the State of Georgia could enjoin the General Government; and while the motions and questions raised in those cases were pending, an anxious people were watching with solicitude. That danger was scarcely over when an opinion from the Attorney General of the United States was invoked by the President. Of that opinion I have very little to say; but I will say this, that I think it was trifling with an anxious people. The work of reconstruction was going bravely on, and the party that the President represents becoming alarmed at its progress felt it to be their duty to throw obstacles in the pathway of reconstruction. The court had failed to do it; the President had not the courage to do it of himself; but he invoked the wisdom of the law-officer of this nation, and he wrote an opinion for the President, which I assert here, with some little experience of a quarter of a century as a lawyer, has neither law nor logic in it. It was an opinion given as Taney's opinion was given, a sort of breastwork thrown up around the Executive of this nation, punctured for heavy artillery and musketry to strike down and stop the progress of the work of reconstruction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, to announce that Mr. FOWLER, who was appointed on the committee to wait upon the President, feels too unwell to serve, and the Chair appoints Mr. BUCKALEW in his place.

Mr. NYE. I hope that committee is fixed now. I should have been through a long while ago but for it. Sir, I say that the opinion of the Attorney General, if it is entitled to the dignity of that name, brought Congress here. We have attempted by legislation to cure the defects which this man with optics so keen had discovered. Our remedy or panacea has been sent to the President of the United States, and he has vetoed it in a message savoring more of prejudice and passion than of due consideration of the proposition submitted. In that veto message there is one remarkable sentence. I listened to its reading twice, and I have carefully read it since myself. I refer to the startling declaration—I do not give the exact words, but the idea—that he will not willingly consent to have his authority overridden and the powers that are his own conferred on others, with a most unjust sneer and taunt at the military power of this nation, which has been its savior. Now, I submit to honorable Senators here, I submit to the country at large what reason they have for new confidence in this individual who attempted by collusion to procure an opinion which nullifies the laws under which the rebel States are to be reconstructed. When a man says he will not willingly do a thing, you have got to draw him up volens volens to make him do it; and where is the power to accomplish that when Congress is not here? But we are told that elections are to take place in the mean time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will yield the floor to allow the Chair to receive a message from the President of the United States.

APPROVAL OF BILLS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 136) to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes;

A bill (S. No. 138) to carry into effect the convention with the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 63) declaring sympathy with the suffering people of Crete.

ADJOURNMENT RESOLUTION.

Mr. NYE. Now I shall ask in vain for any one to show me what additional evidence has been given why this confidence should be placed in the Executive of the nation. But, sir, we are told that elections are to take place. So they are, and let me tell gentlemen that the best way to win the support of the people in the elections is to be faithful to your principles and your policy. If they see that you in an hour of danger desert your post they will reject you as unfaithful.

I think events have proved that I was right in my predictions when the question for adjournment was pending last spring. I think I am right now. Those gentlemen who were for adjourning then were just as confident that there would be no occasion for reassembling as they are now. Let me predict that if you adjourn now, next week there will be another opinion of the Attorney General, for I take it for granted he is cognizant of what this message is as he was of the other. When he then portrayed the effects of our bill, showed that it had all manner of horns and unsightly and unseemly things attached to it, and made these commanders military tyrants, he foreshadowed what was coming.

Mr. President, there is so much confusion here, and I am so whispered at on all sides by gentlemen, that it is impossible for me to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will take their seats and preserve order.

Mr. NYE. Under these circumstances I shall not consume any more of the time of the Senate, but satisfy myself by simply protesting against this report. I conceive that there is great danger in it and I hope a majority of the Senate will be of the same opinion. I think the earliest day which has been mentioned is at least as far off as our meeting ought to be put.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope we shall vote at once. This resolution has passed both Houses, and what effect the motion to reconsider, as such, if not disposed of by the time the hour fixed arrives, will be a question upon which men will differ and we may be in a very awkward situation. I understand unofficially that the President has nothing more to send, and I suggest that we ought to vote now on this question. If we do not, we shall reach half past four, when it will be contended by some that we are adjourned and by others that we are not, which will put us in a position of awkwardness that we ought to avoid.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from New York tells us that the President has nothing more to send. There is a bill that has passed both Houses of Congress to secure equal rights in the District of Columbia, which is now in the hands of the President. I should like to know of the Senator from New York, who speaks for the President, what the President proposes to do with the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Massachusetts is so facetious that I do not believe I can answer him in the spirit in which he would like to have me answer. I have learned, as I say, unofficially, from the messenger and Private Secretary of the President, that there was nothing, to his knowledge, which he was withholding, and intended to transmit. I give it to the Senator just as I received it, and it is as good as it was when it came to me.

Mr. SUMNER. "And intended to transmit." Then the President is not going to return to us that bill. In other words, in familiar phrase, he will "pocket" it—a bill to secure equal rights in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING. We are not responsible for that.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, the Senator is responsible, because he proposes to go home and leave equal rights in the District of Columbia without the protection which we owe them.

Mr. CONKLING. I know too well that as long as the Senator from Massachusetts lives equal rights, and all other rights in this District will be protected. I do not feel, therefore, the slightest uneasiness on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I rise to make a personal explanation before giving my vote. I voted against the adjournment resolution and after having done it I remembered that I had paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] and therefore I should not have voted. Now, to make the matter even, I suppose I must vote against the reconsideration.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cragin, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Conkling, Davis, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wiley—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stewart, and Williams—21.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Messrs. N. P. BANKS of Massachusetts, and S. S. MARSHALL of Illinois, a committee to join the committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after a few minutes spent therein the doors were reopened at twenty-six minutes past four o'clock.

THANKS TO GENERAL SHERIDAN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to take up the House joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan.

The question was put, and the motion declared to be agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think it is proper, when the Senate is as it is now, to call up these resolutions that have been voted by the Senate to be not in order heretofore. The Senate when it was full decided that it was not in order to take up these resolutions under the rule, and I do not see how you can call them up now under a vote of the Senate after that decision. I submit to the Chair that it is not in order to proceed with these resolutions after the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There has been no unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. The resolution was taken up by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It cannot be taken up by a vote of the Senate. After the Senate has decided that it is not in order to consider that matter, it is not competent then by a majority vote to take it up.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think not; I submit to the Chair that it cannot be taken up after the Senate has decided it not in order, unless it is done by a change of the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose not. The Chair submitted this question to the vote of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Can it be done by a vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate decided by a vote that it was not in order under the resolution adopted at the beginning of this session, to take up this measure, and I do not suppose it can be done now without unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So I suppose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Chair decide that it can only be taken up by unanimous consent? This resolution was taken up and considered, and I submit that it is too late now to raise objection. It was taken up by a vote of the Senate and was on its passage, and I submit, therefore, that it is now too late to raise the objection. I ask for the vote on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me no question of order can be clearer than that when the Chair has submitted to the Senate whether a subject matter is in order under its rules, and the Senate, by a large majority vote, has decided that it is not in order, you cannot afterward by another vote take up——The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time having arrived at which the two Houses of Congress have resolved to adjourn, it becomes the duty of the Chair to declare that the Senate stands adjourned until Thursday, the 21st day of November next, at twelve o'clock. The Chair so declares, and the Senate stands adjourned until that time.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 20, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was partially read, when

Mr. CULLOM moved that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is a resolution in regard to the adjournment of Congress, offered last evening by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] As that gentleman is not now in his seat, the resolution, if there be no objection, will be temporarily passed over.

There was no objection.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. The Committee on Printing, as temporarily appointed, have directed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House three thousand five hundred copies of the introductory letter, chapters Nos. 2, 6, and 7, and plate No. 2 of the report on the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi river and the protection of the alluvial regions against overflow, made under acts of Congress by Captain, now Major General, A. A. Humphreys, of the Engineer department of the United States Army.

I desire to state that the cost of the printing of the copies ordered will be $3,100, making about ninety cents apiece.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMIRAL GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of two executive documents relating to the retention of Rear Admiral Goldsborough on the active list of the Navy be printed, fifteen hundred for the use of the House and five hundred for the Secretary of the Navy.

A MEMBER. What will the printing cost?

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. Seven and a half cents apiece.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONVENTION WITH VENEZUELA.

Mr. BANKS. I ask by unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs Senate bill No. 133, to carry into effect the convention with Venezuela for the adjustment of the claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic. There can be no objection to the bill.

There was no objection, and the bill was received, read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRITISH ARREST OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, also presented a communication sent to the Committee of Foreign Affairs from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a report from the Examiner of Claims as to whether any American citizens have been arrested or sentenced in Great Britain or Ireland for words or acts spoken or done in the United States; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House if any information has been received by the executive department of the Government relating to the arrest or conviction of any American citizens within the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland on account of words or acts spoken or committed within the jurisdiction of the United States; and if any such case has occurred, or shall occur, that the President be requested to take proper measures to secure relief, and maintain the rights of American citizens.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WINDOM. I shall object to any lengthy debate until the Indian bill has passed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and it was thought desirable that a word should be said in favor of this report.

The report which has been read from the Examiner of the State Department says they have no information of any case but one, and that is the case of Captain McCafferty. Now, while I do not mean to cast any censure upon any Department of the Government, it is strange, while it has been notorious throughout the world, published in the papers of Great Britain and our own country, that many cases, to three of which I shall refer, have occurred which are not mentioned in the report. Stephen J. Meany was convicted as early as February last, and sentenced to fifteen years imprisonment. His case has been carried up on appeal and decided by a divided court, six to four, and yet our consuls there have transmitted no information to the proper Department. Colonel William J. Nagle also was arrested at Dungarvin, no charge having been made against him, and we have no information from the State Department of his case. He is a native of this country and an American citizen and soldier. He is now in jail and no relief is to be had. The third case is that of General Halpine, an American citizen, who has lived twenty years in Cincinnati, who won laurels in the war. He also is now in jail. All these cases are notorious, and yet we have no information from the State Department. I repeat I do not mean to cast any reflection upon that Department, but I do think our consuls abroad are very censurable for neglect of duty in such cases. The resolution asks the attention and interference of the President. I trust it will pass, and that the President of the United States will see that these men and others similarly situated are protected in their rights and privileges as American citizens.

Mr. CULLOM. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN WAR.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 136, to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out the words "WILLIAM WINDOM, chairman," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "chairman;" also in the next line by striking out the words "and House of Representatives." The Senate, it appears, has done me the honor to elect me chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in this House, and has instructed me to perform certain duties which it would be almost impossible for me to attend to. Therefore I ask that my name be stricken out of the commission and that some better man be put in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Senate only anticipated the action of the Speaker in designating the gentleman as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs when that committee shall be appointed.

Mr. ROSS. I suggest that the section be so amended as to leave the name of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] in.

Mr. WINDOM. I would be very glad to serve on the commission, but I think it would be impossible for me to attend to the duties. I prefer to name some one more likely to attend to the duties in an acceptable manner.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Who is he?

Mr. WINDOM. I would name Colonel S. S. Tappan, who has spent some years in the Indian Territory, and I am sure understands their character better than any man we can appoint. He is in all respects a proper gentleman for the position.

Mr. ROSS. I concur in that suggestion. The amendment of Mr. WINDOM was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. The other amendment is one which I proposed yesterday, and is appended to the printed bill. It is an amendment of importance, and I ask the attention of the House to it for a single moment. The second and third sections of the bill as it came from the Senate require a commission to select two certain locations, one of them north of the State of Nebraska and west of the Missouri river. The discretion of the committee is limited to certain localities. Now, it will be found, on examination of the bill, that the territory pointed out is not fit for an Indian reservation; Indians cannot be induced to go upon it.

The amendment I propose is to strike out those two sections limiting the commission to those particular localities, and give a more general discretion to make treaties with reference to other locations, the selection to be confirmed by the action of Congress. The whole thing is to be finally submitted to Congress for confirmation.

So far as the reservation proposed by the Senate bill is concerned I believe it is wholly impracticable. It is a portion of the territory known in the West as the bad land, where Indians, I believe, cannot live. And, sir, we propose to send a commission to treat with the Indians now in arms against us before we have whipped them, and to induce them by treaty to go on a barren desert where they will be starved to death. A gentleman told me the other day that we ought either to shoot or starve them, and he thought the latter the best way. The first thing to be done is to get them there. It is something like the old plan of schoolboys catching birds by salt on their tails. The Indians are not there and cannot be induced to go there. I propose to strike out the two sections and give them a wider section of country in which to make their investigation. I ask that the vote be taken on the amendment, but I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PILE.]

Mr. PILE. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

Add at the end of the section these words: The Union Pacific railroad and the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, on the proposed route of the Atlantic and Pacific railroad, by the way of Albuquerque.

Mr. WINDOM. I accept that amendment.

Mr. PILE. I move the amendment which I have offered.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ascertains that no member of the Committee on Enrolled Bills is present, and if there be no objection the Chair will appoint two members of that committee temporarily.

No objection was made; and the Chair appointed Messrs. WELKER and NIBLACK temporarily members of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

INDIAN WAR—AGAIN.

Mr. JULIAN. I have received a very important memorial on this subject in behalf of the Society of Friends in Indiana, embodying some of the provisions of this bill, and I would ask the honorable gentleman from Minnesota if there is any necessity for our action now? By the next session we shall be able to digest and perfect a better measure and avoid this hasty legislation.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman asks me if it is important that this bill shall be passed now, or whether we cannot wait and perfect the measure at the next session. I regard it as most important that we should pass this bill before we adjourn. We are now paying at the rate of $1,000,000 a week, and if we can save a single day of the war it will be worth more than the entire bill will cost.

There is another reason which makes it necessary that this bill should be passed at once. There are a great many peaceable bands of Indians who, though they belong to tribes that are disposed to go to war, some now being actually at war, desire to leave those tribes and remain at peace with us. In order that they may do so there must be some provision for their support. One section of this bill proposes to make a provision of that kind. If such provision be not made before the commencement of the next session nearly all those Indians will be compelled to take up arms against us, and our expenses in carrying on the war will, as I believe, be more than trebled before we meet again. I think it, therefore, of the utmost importance that we should now make some provision of this kind. The action now proposed is not final. The bill proposes that a commission shall be sent out for the purpose of investigating and making treaties. We may confirm or reverse the action of these commissioners at the next session of Congress. I ask immediate action upon the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question or two?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir; I yield for a question.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the measure which he pressed upon the attention of the House a few days since, and which has been concurred in by the Senate, will not meet the necessities of the case for the present?

Mr. WINDOM. I think, Mr. Speaker, that it will not fully meet the necessities of the case. It certainly will not unless there be an appropriation for the purpose I have just named; and if such an appropriation be made I think it far preferable that we should make our own selection of commissioners rather than have the President select them. Some gentlemen the other day appeared to be opposed to the President making these treaties. If we select the commissioners ourselves that objection is obviated.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am as anxious as the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] or any other gentleman, can be to arrest this Indian war; but I am unwilling that we should attempt to organize hurriedly a new system of dealing with the Indians. I believe that our present system is founded upon a vicious idea, and if persisted in will lead to destruction of the Indian race on this continent and to the great disgrace of our country. It offers an inducement to every Indian to adhere to his tribe; it encourages the continuance of tribal relations. By this system we are maintaining, as it were, foreign nations in our midst. I believe that we might, with no increase of expense, adopt a more judicious system which would offer inducements to the Indians to abandon their tribal relations, accept the habits of civilization, and become useful members of society. But I am opposed to organizing hurriedly a new system. The resolution which we have already passed will accomplish, I think, all that is demanded at the present time; and I prefer that further legislation on this question should be postponed until we can have full time to examine the subject and elaborate a judicious system.

Mr. WINDOM. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. WINDOM was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 137) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 63) declaring sympathy with the suffering people of Crete.

KENTUCKY AND DELAWARE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, which I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to present:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, charged by the House to inquire whether Kentucky and Delaware have governments republican in form, be, and is, authorized to send for persons and papers, so far as they may be necessary in conducting that inquiry; and be, and is, further authorized to appoint sub-committees in conducting all their investigations, with power in such sub-committees to administer the necessary oath.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and adopted.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to present to the Secretary of State the bill entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto passed on the 23d day of March, 1867," and the joint resolution to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States, together with the certificates of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate showing that said act and joint resolution were passed by votes of two thirds of both Houses of Congress, after the same had been returned to the House of Representatives by the President with his objections, and after reconsideration of said act and joint resolution by both Houses of Congress, in accordance with the Constitution.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT SPEECHES.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of gentlemen who did not get an opportunity to be heard on the President's recent veto message, and who have prepared speeches on the subject, which I now ask, by unanimous consent, they shall have leave to print as part of the debates of the House.

Mr. ROSS. I should like to know how many speeches are to come in under that very broad order. Let us know who they are that have speeches prepared to be printed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have none myself. I understand the gentleman's colleague has a speech to be printed.

Mr. ROSS. I will not object to the printing of any speeches that may now be presented, but I do object to members having the privilege of going home and writing speeches and sending them here to be printed after the adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Let the understanding be that the privilege shall extend only to those who may give their names to the reporters to-day.

Mr. ROSS. I do not object to that.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ADJOURNMENT.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in reference to the adjournment, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The Clerk read the following resolution, adopted by the House on the 11th instant:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That when the two Houses of Congress shall adjourn on the — day of July instant, the adjournment shall be to Wednesday, the 13th day of November next, at noon, and the two Houses shall then reassemble without further order.

The SPEAKER. To which the Senate have made the following amendment, in the nature of a substitute:

Resolved, &c., That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, at three o'clock p. m. on the 20th day of July instant, adjourn their respective Houses, to meet on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. PIKE. I move to adhere.

The SPEAKER. That would leave no time fixed for the adjournment of the two Houses.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move that the House concur.

Mr. PIKE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I should like to move to make it the 15th of October.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 40.

Mr. ROSS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Ross and Mr. PIKE were appointed.

The House again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 37.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. BENTON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to concur; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 72, not voting 66; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Benton, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Keader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hooper, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchen, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pile, Plants, Polsey, Raum, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selvy, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taft, Thomas, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—72.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Chandler, Cornell, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Holman, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburt, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Laffin, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Peters, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Robertson, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wood, and Woodbridge—66.

So the House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

The question recurred on the motion that the House adhere, and it was agreed to.

RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. By direction of the Judiciary Committee I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas Lafayette C. Baker was on the 2d day of July, 1867, duly summoned to appear and testify before a standing committee of this House on the Judiciary, charged with the investigation of certain allegations against the President of the United States, and has neglected to appear before said committee pursuant to said summons: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Speaker issue his warrant directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him to take into custody the body of said Lafayette C. Baker, wherever to be found, and to have the same forthwith brought before the bar of the House to answer for contempt of the authority of the House in thus failing and neglecting to appear before said committee.

I desire to say that I have in my hands a subpoena regularly served upon Lafayette C. Baker, commanding his appearance before the Committee on the Judiciary. He has failed to obey the process of the House, not only in this instance, but in, I believe, two other instances. Therefore the committee asks that he be brought to the bar of the House to answer for contempt of its process.

The preamble and resolution were agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEASE OF BUILDINGS BY THE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 10th instant, reports relative to buildings leased by the Department in New York and Brooklyn, rented by it, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE TO PRINT SPEECHES.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to inquire of the Speaker what was the proposition voted upon a few minutes ago in regard to printing speeches.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] asked consent to introduce a resolution authorizing gentlemen having speeches prepared on the bills recently vetoed by the President to hand them to the reporters of the Globe. That was agreed to by unanimous consent. Afterward the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] rose and remarked that it was a broad proposition, and he thought there should be some limit to it. The Chair also thought it was a broad proposition. The question was reconsidered, and the House then concurred in the suggestion of the Chair that gentlemen hand in their names to the reporter to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to reconsider that vote. If gentlemen desire to have some proposition of the kind adopted, I suggest that all speeches which are handed in prior to the adjournment might be printed. But the proposition to give gentlemen an opportunity of going home and writing out answers to speeches made in the House and publishing them in the Congressional Globe is certainly, in my estimation, very objectionable.

Mr. BAKER. I concur entirely in the view of my colleague. This printing of speeches ought to be restricted to those prepared before the adjournment.

Mr. LOGAN. There will be no safety in debate here at all if the resolution shall stand as adopted. If gentlemen will give me an opportunity to go home and write a speech in reply to some already published I may malign and libel a member as much as I have a mind to and there is no reply to it. Sir, it is a monstrous proposition, and I ask the House to reconsider it. If the House desires to let members present their speeches before the adjournment of Congress, I have no objection.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. If we allow gentlemen to prepare and print speeches after they have gone home, how are we to reply to them?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I stated when I made the motion that I had no speech of my own to print, but made it for the benefit of others whose speeches were not quite ready. It is not an unfrequent occurrence on the passage of bills that gentlemen have risen and asked the privilege of printing some remarks. I never knew the request to be refused or even objected to. But such speeches are frequently not furnished until after the House adjourns.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know what the rule may have been, nor do I care. A rule like that should not exist in a deliberative body. If speeches are to be printed they should at least be presented and printed in the Globe while Congress is in session, so that if there is any attack or misstatement it might be replied to before the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I am entirely indifferent as to what disposition the House may make of the subject. I have no speech of my own prepared upon the subject.

Mr. MILLER. I would ask the gentleman a question as to how he is going to reply to a speech delivered on the last day of the session before the House adjourns?

Mr. LOGAN. All I wish to say is that if any member has a speech to make in which he wants to characterize anything I have done or said, I want it done in my presence.

Mr. BALDWIN. I want to say a word upon this subject. It seems to me that the practice of printing speeches that has never been delivered here is a bad one and ought to be discontinued. The rule ought to be rigidly enforced prohibiting the printing of speeches never delivered in the House. The rule of the House limits speeches to one hour. I have seen speeches which were never delivered but were printed by permission that made twenty-eight columns of the Globe. Now, sir, considering the expense of printing the Globe, I think we ought in some measure to prevent this constant increase of expense; and therefore I hope that we shall reconsider this vote and rigidly exclude all speeches not delivered upon this floor.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that he move an amendment to enable these gentlemen to publish these speeches in a volume by themselves at the public expense, to be bound in Morocco covers.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that no such permission as is now asked will be given, and that no such order will be made. I trust that we shall not take another step forward in the direction in which we have been so long traveling until it has come to be notorious that there is no debate here in the House of Representatives. I understand debate to be the collision of mind with mind and thought with thought in advocacy and in reply until they reach some common conclusion. But we have nothing of that sort here, except now and then under the five minutes rules; but otherwise no one can have an opportunity to be heard here excepting those gentlemen who are enabled to get their names down upon the Speaker's list. Mr. Jones writes out his views on a particular subject, which will make a pamphlet of sixteen pages; and while he is engaged in that Mr. Smith is writing an hour's essay on some subject. Jones does not know what Smith is saying, and Smith does not know what Jones is saying, but both speeches are published in the Congressional Globe as a part of the debates of the House. I am unwilling myself to do anything which may help to give further countenance to the practice which has grown up in reference to this matter.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to ask how the rule would operate in cases where two gentlemen deliver the same speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I am afraid that that remark is a hint at my State; for I believe that during the Thirty-Seventh Congress there appeared in the Congressional Globe two speeches, one in March, and the other in April, purporting to have been made by a couple of—shall I say Democrats? I am glad that both of them were of that party; and each one of those speeches was word for word the same as the other, with this difference: one purports to have been made in the House and the other in Committee of the Whole; so that where the paragraphs of one begin with "Mr. Speaker," the paragraphs of the other commence with "Mr. Chairman." Now, in that case there happened to be this little trouble about the matter: Mr. Allen—pardon me, I did not mean to name anybody—published his speech first, and in the course of it alluded to "my resolutions," he having introduced a series of resolutions upon the subject of confiscation, that question being the topic of the speech. The other gentleman, who had introduced no resolutions, appeared as making just one month afterward the same speech, word for word; and unfortunately he did not alter the part of the speech to which I have just referred, so that he also alluded to "my resolutions." [Laughter.]

If gentlemen are curious in regard to this matter—and it is a perfect illustration of this whole system—they may look at the Congressional Globe of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and they will find that two members from the State of Ohio appear there, as I have stated, as delivering the same speech. It may have happened unfortunately that they employed the same man to write out their speeches, and that he cheated one or the other or both; or perhaps not having been paid by the first sold the same thing to the other, in order to reimburse himself. And I may add that it was a very tolerable speech. Those two speeches go to make up a part of what are called the "debates," published in the Congressional Globe.

I wish, sir, that we could get back to something like the old condition of things when—it might be with a little sharpness, it might be with a little roughness, it might be with a little less of the pure style of the essay which gentlemen can succeed in reaching in their chambers, yet with much more pertinency generally to the subject immediately in hand—we actually did discuss questions here in this body, and discuss them at length. I am opposed to any innovation in the direction in which we have already gone too far.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I concur entirely in what has been said by several gentlemen here, that this system which has grown up of publishing speeches never delivered upon the floor of the House is a great abuse, and ought if possible to be corrected. But it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is an abuse which has almost necessarily grown up under the rules and practice of the House. It is well known that upon many of the gravest and most important questions that come up for the consideration of the House and of the country very few members can succeed in getting the floor at all for the purpose of saying a single word upon those questions; and unless, under such circumstances, some permission is given to gentlemen to present in print the thoughts they entertain in regard to those questions, it may appear to their constituents, and will so appear, that when the gravest questions ever submitted for deliberation in a public body have arisen they have remained in their seats and failed to open their mouths in regard to questions in which their constituents are so deeply interested.

Now, it is well known that upon these great reconstruction questions which have been disposed of at this session and at previous sessions not one-tenth of the members that have desired to express themselves thereon have had any opportunity of doing so upon the floor of the House. Here only the other day, when this question which is agitating the whole country was brought forward, no man could get the floor except by special favor, and this, not as the result of any fault or partiality of the Speaker—for I have no intention of intimating anything of that kind—but because under a custom or rule which has grown up here in the House, a gentleman having charge of a bill has the power to control entirely the course of the debate, and most of the members of the House are entirely cut off from expressing themselves in regard to these questions.

Now, sir, I shall be very much in favor of so modifying the rules of the House that gentlemen, representing constituents who have the right to be heard on any subject, should have an opportunity to be heard before the debate was closed. If such a modification of the rules can be adopted I will go as far as the farthest against any gentleman being permitted to publish remarks as part of our debates which in fact were never delivered upon the floor of the House. It is a great abuse undoubtedly to publish as a part of the debates speeches or essays that were never made upon the floor. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has well suggested, our debates ought to be the expression of such thoughts as are struck out by the collision of mind with mind; but when questions are brought forward for consideration unfortunately no such opportunity as that is afforded to nine tenths of the members of the House. When the question of reconstruction was up the other day I know that many friends of mine here as well as gentlemen on the other side desired to be heard, but as soon as my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] closed his speech of one hour the debate was immediately closed. Then no gentleman, however much he may have desired to do so, had any opportunity to make any reply to that speech or any other that preceded it. I only refer to that by way of illustration. There were some things in the speech of my colleague that I desired very much to reply to at the time, but no such opportunity was presented.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not object to debate.

Mr. MARSHALL. I am not bringing this forward as a special complaint against my colleague, but as an illustration of a hardship, and, indeed, great wrong that is occurring here every day; and it is notorious that if many members are not permitted to print their speeches as a part of the debates as if delivered upon the floor, they will have no opportunity of being heard by the country or their constituents.

It has been suggested by gentlemen around me that the proper course to pursue in such cases would be for members who are unable to get the floor at the time to ask permission to print their thoughts as a part of the debates, and then, perhaps, permission would always be accorded. Probably that is the better way.

But this does not touch the evil complained of. To do justice the rules and practice of the House must be radically changed. And now as to the question immediately before the House. Many gentlemen have been busily engaged, and as this will be a very short session if closed to-day, and as some members may not have their remarks prepared to present now on questions that have been before the House, it seems to me it would be a hardship to them now to depart from the rule adopted, as I understand, in regard to speeches of this character. Let these gentlemen print their speeches now as heretofore, and I will hereafter go as far as the farthest in establishing some rule that will correct the abuses complained of.

Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that a body of this kind ought to be a deliberative body. It is not so important to the country that many bills should be passed as that all questions before us should be considered with due deliberation on the part of the men whose solemn duty it is to record their views thereon. There is always too much legislation; there is never too much discussion on these important subjects. That is one of the means of educating the country. It is one of the means of correcting crude measures, and of eliciting the diverse knowledge and opinions of those whose duty it is to mature great public questions which interest the people. We want more legitimate debate, the interchange of thoughts, the collision of minds; and those who wish to express their views should always have the opportunity to do so; and we would be better off with much less legislation. The practice suggested would be better for the country. How many bills do we see passed here that are crude and undigested, forced through without debate under the operation of the previous question, without permitting members to have an opportunity either to discuss or to deliberate them. This, in my judgment, is a very grave evil which has grown up here, and which ought to be speedily corrected.

I admit, sir, that nothing ought to appear in the Globe except such things as have actually occurred in the House; but we cannot properly adopt this rule until we have provided that all members shall have an opportunity to express themselves upon any subject when the question is before the House for consideration. If gentlemen having an influence with the majority will attempt a reform in this direction, I will gladly coöperate with them.

On this question of reconstruction I have myself had permission to print some remarks that I had no opportunity of delivering in the House; but I hope it is scarcely necessary for me to add that any gentleman who knows me will know that I would be very far from abusing such permission by making a personal attack upon any one. I hope there is no member in this House that would do so. And now, as the matter has gone so far, I hope there will be no attempt at this time to interfere with a practice that has grown necessarily out of a much graver abuse, and that gentlemen who have their speeches prepared may have an opportunity to present them upon this very important question as a part of the debates of the House. But I hope very speedily when we get together again some rule will be adopted which will correct this grave abuse, and which, while it confines the published reports to what actually occurs in the House, will give every member a fair opportunity of being heard upon every question that comes up for consideration. This all members, and especially their constituents, have a right to demand, and its denial should no longer be tolerated.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] to say a few words. I have listened with great interest to this discussion, because I felt yesterday that I had no opportunity to say things to this House which I believed would be of interest and importance, and which would not have occupied much time. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely correct in the views he expresses, and I think a large portion of the members of the House desire with him that some change should be made in our rules in regard to the manner of conducting our debates.

But the point I was coming to particularly is this: that in my judgment we can never make a rule which will be effectual as long as the present system continues of furnishing members with desks, so that they can come here and write letters, read newspapers, and transact their private business instead of listening, as they should, to the discussions of the House. Our business would be more rapidly and thoroughly done if we return to the system that prevailed some years ago, when the desks were dispensed with and tables were furnished in different parts of the Chamber for the use of those who had occasion to write letters. If the Committee on the Rules will take this subject into consideration, I think they could devise some plan which would give a fairer opportunity for debate, and which I think would be agreeable to all the members of the House.

I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is right in stating that the custom has been heretofore to give leave to print very generally, and I supposed that that was the intention on this occasion. I certainly never knew the privilege to be abused in the way suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] that is, by any personal attacks. But it is better we should get rid of the whole thing in the way the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] suggests and come to some system, some rule, by which every member can on every subject have an opportunity to express his views.

Mr. LOGAN. Before moving the previous question, I will only say that so far as personal attacks are concerned I am as little interested in them, I presume, as any member of the House. My only object was to establish a precedent here so that hereafter we might by some means or other arrive at legitimate debates. The resolution that was passed this morning is certainly unprecedented in parliamentary usage. I do object to the publication after the adjournment of Congress of remarks that never were delivered in this House by any gentleman. I now move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to the Chair he would like to make a suggestion before taking the vote.

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield.

The SPEAKER. Allusion has been made by several gentlemen to the practice of the House. The Chair concurs with the remark of the gentleman from Illinois, that the proposition adopted this morning was very broad, broader than usual, and he suggested the same to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.] Although it was adopted by unanimous consent, it was afterward modified upon motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS,] as the Chair has already stated.

The practice of the House has been in regard to all bills emanating from committees to allow the chairman or some member of the committee reporting it the right to speak. That is very proper, because the committees are the fathers of the propositions. But in the great pressure of business upon the House a large number of members desire to debate the measures, and hence the more frequent use of the previous question of late years than formerly. The consequence is many members have not an opportunity to debate the question before the House. It is easy for gentlemen on important committees, either at the head or as members of it, who are gifted in extempore oratory, to obtain the floor and speak on important questions. It is difficult, however, for the majority of the members to obtain the floor for speaking. Their only opportunity, therefore, to discuss public questions and get their views before the country is on Saturdays, or in evening sessions when the House sits as in Committee of the Whole.

It is for this reason that the Chair has endeavored as far as possible to ascertain those who are not on important committees who desire an opportunity, without prejudice to the business of the House, to express their views, and the Chair will continue in the future as in the past to do so, knowing well that prominent and leading gentlemen have greater advantages and more frequent opportunities under the usage of the House to state their views to the country.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House allowed gentlemen who handed their remarks on the veto of the President to the reporters of the Congressional Globe to-day to have their speeches recorded; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I move now to lay the motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the proposition was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask consent to make a brief personal explanation.

No objection was made.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I have never risen to vindicate myself, and would not do so now had not the public journals placed me in a false position before the country, and involving, as I think, my personal reputation.

The Committee on the Judiciary, charged with the impeachment of the President of the United States, deemed it their duty at the close of the last session of Congress, on account of the magnitude of the subject, to hold an adjourned meeting, and did adjourn until about the 1st of May. At that time they met and devoted themselves most laboriously to the examination of the question before them. About the time they supposed they had completed their labors a motion was submitted to the committee that under the evidence before them they would not be justified in recommending articles of impeachment against the President of the United States. I voted for that proposition, and for the purpose of giving the public rest, so far as the committee could do so, it was voted to give to the country the result of their deliberations.

Subsequent to this vote, and doubtless with a desire to elicit truth, members of the minority desired additional testimony. Subpoenas were issued for witnesses, who, in their opinion, would testify to material facts relevant to the investigation.

Unlike my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] I had not determined at that time what my vote would finally be. He, by his own statement before the House, had determined the question prior to the adjournment in June, and required no further testimony. The expression, sir, is more worthy of a Nero or a Jeffreys than a learned member of the Law Committee of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Vermont that his language is not parliamentary.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I withdraw anything I may have said unparliamentary or discourteous toward the gentleman, for whom I entertain personally a high respect. Sir, when this duty was imposed upon me as a member of the Law Committee of this House, I supposed I was to discharge it as a man and a lawyer, and not as a partisan. I considered myself responsible to the Constitution, the laws, my oath, and my God. Beyond that I had no responsibility. I did not deem it proper to ask myself what my party demanded or what public opinion would justify. I entertained the question in a judicial capacity, and in no other. Sir, it is known that I am opposed to the President in his general policy and in many of his public acts; but in the grave matter of impeachment I shall be governed by the law and the evidence, and by nothing else.

Sir, since the assembling of Congress at this session the public journals of the country have stated that I have changed my opinion, or at least that I was vacillating and doubting as to the course which I should ultimately pursue. No one was authorized to say that from any intimation or expression of mine. When the vote was taken by the committee upon the testimony then before them I was against impeachment, and I stand in that position now. With my view of the evidence and the law I should sacrifice my idea of both law and evidence in order to change my opinion.

I know, sir, that this country can endure even the impeachment of the President. I know, sir, that a people who carried the flag of our country in triumph through the bloodiest and most expensive war that the world has ever seen—a people who, when informed by the lightning-flash that the late President of the United States had been murdered in a public theater, conducted themselves so quietly that the wheels of the Government rolled on without any creaking, and the public securities were kept up as they were before—could endure the impeachment of the President of the United States. And, sir, when the time comes, if it shall come, in this investigation, that in my judgment under the law and the testimony, Andrew Johnson should be impeached, I shall be as ready as any other to impeach him, regardless of consequences. But, sir, if the day should ever come when impeachments for political purposes is regarded with favor by this or any other Congress, then, permit me to say, I shall despair, despair forever, for the safety and stability of our institutions.

The papers have said that in my course on this question I cannot sustain myself at home politically. Coming from the little State of Vermont—as noble a State as any in the galaxy, whose political record has been as bright as the sunlight and as pure as the light of the stars—I may not, sir, sustain myself. But how poor, how infinitely poor, will be the sacrifice when compared with an approving conscience, which, at least in the hour of death, will be of far more value than all the political wreaths which may crown one's brow in his pathway from the cradle to the grave.

I express no opinion now in regard to impeachment, for it may be that the investigations of the committee are not completed. My decision as a judge I hold in abeyance until the evidence is closed. When that shall be done I shall act up to my convictions of duty, whether I live or die, whether I stand or fall before the country or before my immediate constituents who have honored me heretofore, and who will honor me hereafter, if I am worthy of their confidence.

Mr. BENTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I have risen simply to a personal explanation, and I do not deem it proper to yield to any one. I surrender the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I ask consent to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the very unusual language of my friend from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE]—I suppose I may call him my friend, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Always.]—calls for something at my hands in the way of reply.

I have been struck with the exhibition upon this question of a degree of sensibility upon the part of gentlemen connected with the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary which seems to me to be a little morbid, if I may be allowed to use such an expression. Why do they flee when no man pursues? Is it so that I or anybody else has at any time undertaken to impeach the motives or the conduct of any of them? Not at all. I cheerfully accord to them the same latitude of thought and freedom of opinion that I always claim for myself. I am entirely willing to credit them with the same disposition to promote the interests of the country in this investigation that I have.

But, sir, there have been remarks, falling originally from the mouth of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa,] and now reiterated by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE,] which I think I am required in justice to myself to answer.

And now, sir, let me ask, how does this question stand before the House and the country? You have upon your records a report—verbal, it is true—but still a report of the results which have been reached by the committee. There is nothing in our rules, I suppose, which requires that it should be in writing. When this question was first opened the honorable chairman of the committee, by the authority of that body, as he stated—and undoubtedly he had received such authority, two members of the committee only dissenting, and that not on the point now in question—announced to this House (as he had previously announced, with the consent of the committee, to the country) that this great question, involving, as I think, the very life of the nation, had been passed upon by the committee, and that five of its members had arrived at the conclusion that no act furnishing sufficient ground for impeachment had been shown by the testimony to have been committed by the President of the United States, while four of them, constituting a minority were of the opinion that he had done acts which made it the duty of this House to arraign him to answer for high crimes and misdemeanors before the bar of the Senate.

Here, then, is a report of an authentic character. It went to the country immediately after its announcement. I incline to think that one of its objects was to prevent an extra-session of the Congress of the United States. I do not impute any fault to those who may have thought that such a session under the circumstances of the country was anything but desirable either for the country's sake or for the sake of the party; but if I am not mistaken, the opinion did prevail inside of the committee that the effect of that announcement would be that no session of this body would take place under the joint resolution of the 3d of April last. Whatever may have been its purpose, this undoubtedly was its operation. The report went out over the telegraphic wires and through the pens of the newspaper correspondents to every nook and corner of the land that the Judiciary Committee, composed of nine members, seven of whom belonged to the great Republican party of this nation, had not been able to find matter in all the records and evidence before them on which to base a single charge against the President of the United States. Well, sir, under these circumstances I felt it to be my duty when this question came up, and the same statement was reiterated here, to interpose my answer and my protest, and to say in vindication of myself and of those with whom I had the honor to act and think, and who were denied the privilege of assigning in the hearing of the country the reasons of their opinions, that I was possessed, as I thought they were also, with the deepest and strongest convictions on this subject, that those convictions rested upon facts sufficient to sink a whole Administration beyond recovery, involving as they did the permanent welfare and the very life of this Republic. I felt, too, that in order to avoid any default on my part, or any responsibility that might otherwise attach to me, it was my duty to give warning to the House and country, and my right to say to both that if this testimony was not to be produced or published—if a question of such magnitude was to be indefinitely postponed—if the country was to suffer from the indifference of those who were charged with its great interests, I washed my hands of the consequences.

I stated yesterday that I was prepared to meet the issue upon the criminality of the President then; and since my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] has been pleased to indicate his willingness to meet it also at the proper time, I may be excused for repeating that I am equally ready for that controversy now. All has been heard that is material to the case, and we cannot, as I think we do not, differ materially as to any of the great facts involved. There is nothing to divide us but the law, and in regard to that I will now only say that I bate no jot or tittle of the confidence I expressed on yesterday.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the case is now before the country upon the decision which has been already announced. But that is not enough. There are, I think, outside of the mere question of impeachment, reasons which will appear when this testimony is disclosed, which are sufficient in themselves for us to remain here now for the protection of the public interests; and I submit to gentlemen who now stop their ears against the information they might have if they would demand it, whether they may not possibly find it difficult to answer when the question is put to them by their constituents hereafter why it was they refused an audience when they might have been informed if they had but chosen to hear.

Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to indulge in any course of remarks that might be considered personal. That sort of controversy is always unpleasant to me; but the honorable gentleman from Vermont has been pleased that in the declaration made by myself at this stage of the inquiry in regard to the guilt of the President I have judged in such a way as would have been only worthy of the justice of a Nero or Caligula.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I have withdrawn that.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says he did not mean it in the way of personal offense, and has withdrawn it. I do not feel, sir, as if he had intended anything of the sort; but in answer to the argument I must be allowed to say that I have disclosed no more than I was authorized to do under the circumstances of the case, holding as I did on that question, as I have already stated on this floor and now reiterate, the understanding that the case was then settled by the solemn judgment of the committee, with this proviso only: that if any testimony should be offered at any time before the period assigned, for the purpose of making up their report, it should be received. Of course, in all fairness we could adopt no other rule. And I now put it to the gentleman from Vermont himself, or to any gentleman of the majority, to say whether there is at this time any testimony behind which they regard as material or important for the purposes of this investigation?

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman puts the question to me, and I desire to answer. I can only answer that I do not know. I am prepared to weigh and consider whatever testimony may come before the committee. At the time of the adjournment of the committee in June, the testimony, as the gentleman well knows, was not closed. I am perfectly willing to say that I do not preclude myself from altering my opinions or convictions on whatever testimony may be subsequently adduced.

I will answer the gentleman further by saying I understand that the testimony is incomplete, and that only to-day a gentleman next in point of honor and trust to the President was before the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I understand, as I have already said, that it was of course expected that any testimony should be taken that might be offered, but that is not an answer to the question.

It was remarked, however, in the previous debate, by way of answer to the allegation that the inquiry was substantially at an end, that there was process out at that time for two witnesses, and the chairman of the committee [Mr. WILSON] was pleased to say that no member of the committee had requested the attendance of more witnesses than myself.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman may take that back.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not take it back; I did not say it.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether or not the minority of the present Judiciary Committee of the Fortieth Congress who are in favor of impeachment are not a majority of all the members of the committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress who are serving on the present committee. Because, I desire to know whether we were really taken in in any way when it was agreed to put this question to the Judiciary Committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and when a special committee was voted down.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. At the time of its discharge a majority of its members were, I thought, ready to report in favor of impeachment. Desiring, however—and in this I express my own opinions only—to make the case as full and complete as possible, it was considered not advisable to make a report at that time in the imperfect condition of the testimony.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 136 to establish peace with certain hostile Indian tribes.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendment to the resolution of the House of Representatives in relation to the adjournment of Congress and disagreed to by the House, asked for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the resolution, and had appointed Messrs. CONKLING, ANTHONY, and HOWE managers on the part of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the foregoing message of the Senate in regard to the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the House recede from its adherence.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me adherence is the last step; that if we adhere it is equivalent to saying we do not intend to have a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on page 21 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A conference sometimes takes place after one House has adhered."

Mr. PIKE. Then it will not be necessary to recede.

The SPEAKER. The House may recede from its adherence and agree to a committee of conference.

Mr. PIKE. From the tone of the debate yesterday in the Senate I supposed that if the House adhered the Senate would recede and concur in the resolution of the House. Now, however, it seems the Senate desires a committee of conference.

Mr. ROSS. Can we not adhere and have a committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. That is impossible.

Mr. PIKE. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 60, nays 45, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Blair, Boutwell, Buckland, Churchill, Reader W. Clark, Cobb, Cornell, Dixon, Driggs, Eldridge, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hill, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jenckes, Kitchen, Koonz, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mungen, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pruyn, Raum, Robinson, Sawyer, Stone, Trowbridge, Twichell, Unson, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Van Trump, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benton, Brownell, Butler, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Ferry, Hayes, Hooper, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, McClurg, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Polsley, Ross, Schenck, Seofield, Selye, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taft, Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—45.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Chanler, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eli, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Halght, Harding, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asabel W. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and Wood—65.

So the House receded and agreed to the committee of conference.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Messrs. PIKE, BEAMAN, and BUTLER.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I do not desire to prolong this discussion in such a way as to exhaust the patience of the House.

Mr. MILLER. I would ask the gentleman if the committee are ready to lay their report upon this question before the House when opportunity is offered?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. So far as I am individually concerned I am ready to submit my own views in writing and to enforce them by argument at any time that the House may be ready to hear me. I may say the same in regard to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who says to me that he is fully prepared now to submit a full written report on the whole case.

Mr. MILLER. I would ask the gentleman if the minority of the committee are not ready to report their views?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. I cannot say as to the other members of the minority; I can speak only for myself and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] although I have no doubt that the other members of the minority are equally ready to sustain their views. Here is a minority of the committee entertaining strong and decided opinions upon this question, and yet unable to give the reasons for the faith that is in them in consequence of the failure or refusal of the majority to make their report in the regular way. The position is an awkward and by no means an agreeable one, but it has imposed on me the duty which I have just now been endeavoring to perform.

I will only say in conclusion that the place which has been assigned to me in this investigation was not one of my seeking. The duty which it involved has been to me a very painful one, it has been a very laborious one. I have endeavored to perform it however to the extent of my ability. I have had no end in view but to serve my country, in a case where I thought its highest and dearest interests, its safety, and its life were involved. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] was pleased to say in the course of some remarks made by him a few days ago on this subject that it was a mere question of President-making, and nothing more. Allow me to say in reply that my humble ambition has never tended in the direction either of making presidents or making kings. I have no particular respect either for the makers or the manufacture, and judging from what I have seen of the results of that kind of business generally, I should not suppose that any credit which has ever been earned in that way was worthy of the aspirations of any man of even less pretension than myself. But this much I will say to the gentleman from Maine, that when I find a President of these United States asserting kingly powers, claiming the force of statutes for his proclamations, living in habitual contempt and violation of your laws, suspending their powers or trampling them under foot, bartering away untold millions of your property for rebel use, claiming to rule without a Congress, insulting the legislative power and defying its authority, and ruling this nation as if he were its master, so help me God I will uncrown him if I can. And more than this, when I witness all these things, as I have done in the career of Andrew Johnson, when I see the great council of the nation bearded and insulted in its own Halls, I will not consent to abdicate my high trust as one of the nation's Representatives by abandoning my seat and turning over to him the entire and unchecked direction of its affairs. I will rather stay to curb this arrogance, and instead of resorting to expedients of doubtful propriety to abridge the power that the Constitution has given him, exert the power that the Constitution has given me, by striking at once and boldly, bravely, manfully, and directly at the one great obstacle that stands in the way of the nation's peace, by pulling him down from his giddy elevation, and making of him a great example for future times.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to occupy their attention for a few moments.

No objection was made.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I regret the discussion of this question, as I have often expressed myself before in advance of a presentation of the case to the House. Of course I have nothing to say of personal explanations which gentlemen may have been called upon to make because of charges contained in the press; but, sir, I do not feel willing, in regard to so important a question as this, to be placed in any false position before the House and the country; and when the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that I am under any party spur here, as though I had intended such a thing on yesterday, I certainly never intended to convey such an idea to the House or the country.

What I said in that regard was this:

"I understood that so far as the reference of the subject imposed an obligation upon me as a member of the committee, it was to investigate fearlessly and faithfully the subject, not merely as a member of the Republican party, but as a member of the law committee of the House of Representatives. I have pursued the investigation with that view and in that spirit, and I affirm here to-day that no amount of political pressure shall turn me aside from a conscientious discharge of the duty thus imposed."

That is what I said yesterday; it is what I affirm here to-day. I believe, as I think every member of the committee believes, that this investigation should be conducted with a due regard to the rules of law; and no belief that anybody may have that this case should be forced upon the country regardless of its incomplete condition can turn me aside from the course which I have indicated, and which, in my judgment, the law requires I should pursue. It is farthest from my intention to say that the Republican party as a party is pressing this case for political or any other improper ends. The votes of the Republican members of this House during the present session negative everything of the kind. They have acted prudently, and whatever disposition they may finally make of this subject will, I doubt not, be wise and secure the approbation of the country.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAMS] says that a majority of the committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress were in favor of reporting articles of impeachment against the President of the United States. I do not know whether that is true or not. There was no expression in the committee to that effect. What may have been the private opinions of members of the committee I do not pretend to know.

I am not prepared to say that any member of the committee has been triling with the committee, with the House, or with the country in this matter. I am not prepared to say that any member of the committee who has asked for the attendance of witnesses or called for the production of documents did it merely for the purpose of delaying the formation of final opinions by a majority of the committee, and to postpone the preparation of their report, not expecting that the evidence called for would have any weight or bearing upon the case, but in order to gain time for the preparation of their own views, that they might come in and ask the House, in advance of the closing of the testimony, to accept a report from a minority of the committee. I will not charge that, because it would be unkind, it would be ungenerous, it would be opposed to every obligation imposed upon members of the committee. When gentlemen desire additional testimony taken I am bound to believe that they regard it important, and that they would not ask for or expect the preparation of a report until the testimony is all in and the case closed. Now, sir, the members of the committee all know that the case is in an incomplete state at this time; that testimony has been taken—I do not say at whose suggestion—

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. If the case is incomplete now, is it any more incomplete than it was in June, when the committee took a deliberate vote on the question and published it to the country? If a deliberate vote could be taken then for the purpose of affecting the country on this question, why cannot such a vote be taken now?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman. The case is nearly as incomplete now as it was then, for many documents called for have not yet been received, and considerable testimony is not yet printed, and some is not written out by the reporter. But I have no doubt that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had his mind made up on this subject longer ago than the 3d day of June. I think that he—although elected a member of this House, which is to pass upon this question upon the evidence—had given his opinion to the country in advance of all investigations, and he cannot be consistent with the record he has made before the country except by voting to sustain the position he assumed before the country prior to taking his seat here.

Now, sir, the publication of the action of the committee in June amounted to nothing more than this: that upon the facts disclosed by testimony, up to that time such high crimes and misdemeanors upon the part of the President had not been developed as would justify an exercise of the impeaching power of this House, and in connection with that I may say—

Mr. BUTLER. One word further. Was not that summing up before the testimony was all in?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am not intending to disclose all that occurred in committee at that time. I have not done it, nor will I do it except at the proper time; but, sir, when the time for the discussion of this case does come, notwithstanding the recognized ability of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the power as a lawyer conceded to him by the country, if my frail judgment of the case shall conflict with his I will meet him in fair and legitimate discussion of all the issues involved in it. I do not intend to develop anything in advance beyond that.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that time will come before I die, and I do not expect to die before seventy.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a restless gentleman. I understand that well enough. He wants every one to act in his way, and he will not be satisfied with anything else. He must remember there are other men in the world besides himself, and that they cannot all look at every question just as he does.

And it so happens a vote of this House has fixed the time when this case shall come before it for consideration. During the first week of the next session, whether it be an adjourned or a regular session, is the time fixed for the report to be presented. That is the judgment of the House on this point.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Massachusetts and all others who are disposed to complain of the action of the committee, that I am willing to-day, if the House desire it and think it prudent and proper, to let this whole testimony go to the country in advance of the next session. I have no objection to that if that be the desire of the House; but, as I have suggested to the members of the minority of the committee, it would hardly be a proper proceeding to throw the case upon the country for consideration before the House is ready to take it up. The impropriety of such a course of proceeding must be evident to all.

In regard to what that testimony may disclose I am perfectly free to say this—because I may lay it upon the public record and in view of the public acts of the President of the United States—that I find enough to justify my determined hostility to the policy he adopted and to his whole course of conduct concerning the questions at issue between him and Congress. His conduct is and has been most reprehensible. There is to my mind nothing clearer than that politically there is no justification of his actions and the headstrong obstinacy with which he has persisted in his evil ways. But it is a different thing when you impose upon me the duty of determining as a member of the Judiciary Committee whether this conduct and these acts, bad as they are, will, under the law and the testimony in this case, warrant an impeachment of the President of the United States. But I do not intend to go into a discussion of any questions of law or fact involved in this case until the proper time. I have my view of it, but further development of the facts may change my view. There may be such a state of facts, in addition to those already developed, as to authorize a report by the whole committee in favor of the impeachment of the President. If that should happen I will support it with what power I can command. And now, sir, I hope this case will rest where the House has placed it. Let it come on in the time and manner already ordered by the House; we then can discuss it in the light of its own developments, and I feel sure it will be wisely disposed of.

Mr. COOK. Reference having been made to the opinions of the Judiciary Committee of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and the question having been raised why a change was made in that committee, I wish to say a single word or two in explanation of my position as a member of that committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and also of the reasons why I left that committee.

While I was a member of the committee, during the time the investigation was pending before it, I do not think I made any expression of my opinion on the subject of the impeachment of the President. During that time I was very reticent in the expression of any opinion as to what was or was not proven before the committee, and I do not think I ever did announce publicly what I thought on that subject while a member of the committee or that my views were known to any one. But since I ceased to be a member of it, not feeling any responsibility on the subject of the committee's report, and having a decided opinion upon the question, I have on various occasions stated what that opinion was, namely, that I thought there was evidence before the committee which ought to be presented to the Senate of the United States. But that expression of opinion has been wholly since my connection with the Judiciary Committee has ceased.

The suggestion that I should be changed from that committee came from myself. The reasons that influenced me in making it were wholly independent of any question pending before the committee, having no reference to any such question whatever. I made the suggestion, and I suppose I originated the idea that I should be changed from that committee; and the reason that operated on my mind was this: I knew there was a claim, and it seemed to me to be a just one, that the Democratic party should be represented by a larger number than one on a committee of nine. There was but one member from that party on the committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and the new questions before that committee were of such grave importance that it seemed to me to be just that another member from the other side of the House should be appointed. I understood that the demand was made. I understood that a gentleman from that party prominent in my own State was urged by the members of his party for the position, and it seemed to me to be reasonable that the change should be made. Therefore, to relieve the matter from all embarrassment, I myself made the suggestion that the wishes of the gentlemen on the other side should be met in that regard. That was the reason that influenced me to suggest that I should not be reappointed on that committee. I know of no other reason; and knowing all the circumstances under which the change was made, I think I may say that I know that no other reason influenced any one who had anything to do in connection with the change on that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is obliged to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] for the statement he has just made.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask consent, in connection with this subject, to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the matter of the impeachment of the President, the Committee on the Judiciary be further instructed when they present the testimony in the first week of the next session of Congress to cause to be printed and presented therewith also the report of the committee and the views of the minority, if any members of the committee should dissent from the general conclusion of said committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that there is no doubt at all about that being the course of action the committee will pursue. We have already asked for authority to present in print the usual number of copies of the testimony, and we intend to have ready the whole case at that time. Therefore I suggest that it is unnecessary to pass a resolution of this kind.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I will only say to the chairman of the committee that this resolution will surely do no harm. As I understand it, there is no order for the printing of the report of the chairman of the committee; and certainly the resolution which we passed was not designed to imply an order to print the report of a minority of the committee. If I am properly posted in reference to what committees are required to do or may do in a deliberative body, there is no such thing as a minority of the committee known except by order of the House. Hence, although it may be intended on the part of the chairman that the voice of the minority should go to the country as well as that of the majority, yet it can do no harm for us to express the view of the House on that subject.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Of course I have no objection; but I understand the object of the resolution to be to have the minority reports printed. Well, now, that is very unusual. If any gentleman of the minority desires to express his views, he can have them printed in the Congressional Globe. The idea of having nine different opinions printed by order of the House in relation to this question seems a very novel one and establishing a very bad precedent. I know that the opinions of these gentlemen will be very interesting and very useful to the country; but at the same time I do not see any reason why we should depart from the usual rule, and allow every gentleman to spread before the country as many hundred pages as his facility in writing will enable him to produce.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman has certainly understood my views as to the liberty and right of each man to express his opinion of this House, so that the House may examine and understand it. I will say to the gentleman from Vermont, when he says that this is not an ordinary motion for publishing to the country the reports of the minority, that this is not an ordinary proceeding, an impeachment or investigation into the conduct of the President.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. One moment. I beg the gentleman not to impute to me a desire to withhold the reports of the minority. An opportunity of laying their views before the country is always allowed to minorities, if not as a matter of right, certainly as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not impugn the motives of the gentleman from Vermont, but inasmuch as he says that he has no desire to prevent the opinions of any of the members of the committee from going to the country I infer that he agrees with me, and is for this resolution; at least that is the tendency of his remarks.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is the resolution before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out all after the word "instructed" and to insert the words "to report forthwith to this House all the testimony that has been taken in the case."

Mr. LOGAN. I consent to that amendment, and hope that it will be adopted; and I now move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. GETZ. Would not that resolution directly conflict with the resolution already adopted by the House, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to report on this subject at the next session of Congress?

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to determine how both resolutions can be carried into effect.

Mr. LOGAN. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been seconded on the original resolution, and the gentleman cannot accept the amendment except by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the yeas and nays on the resolution as modified.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 58, nays 48, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Benjamin Benton, Bromwell, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Driggs, Furusworth, Ferriss, Fields, Finney, Gravely, Hopkins, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pile, Polsley, Raum, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Thomas, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Butler, Cake, Chanler, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eli, Eliot, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Harding, Hayes, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Lafin, Lincoln, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Peters, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Randall, Robertson, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Sigreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—69.

So the resolution of Mr. LOGAN, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. BOUTWELL, when his name was called, said: Understanding that it is not the intention of the House to continue in session to act on this testimony when submitted, I vote "No."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was received by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, who also announced that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 78) authorizing extensions of the mail steamship service between the United States and China and Japan.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask that the resolution just adopted on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] may be read. I desire to understand the action of the House on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the matter of the impeachment of the President the Committee on the Judiciary be further instructed to report forthwith to this House all the testimony that has been taken in the case.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to make one single inquiry: whether the House will regard this resolution as a discharge of the committee from the further investigation of this subject, so as to cut them off from submitting any report?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the testimony, when reported by the committee in accordance with the order of the House, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think that the action which has been taken by the House ought to be carried out to its legitimate conclusions and the committee discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

The SPEAKER. That motion is privileged if the gentleman makes it.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. If the testimony already taken is to be spread before the country while the investigation is still proceeding, and before the committee has passed upon the question and given its conclusions to the House, it seems to me hardly worth while that the committee should continue its investigation further.

The SPEAKER. As there is no motion pending, the Chair will lay before the House message from the President of the United States.

PUBLICATION OF CABINET PROCEEDINGS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I have received a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 8th instant, inquiring "whether the publication which appeared in the National Intelligencer and other public prints on the 21st of June last, and which contained a statement of the proceedings of the President and the Cabinet in respect to an interpretation of the acts of Congress commonly known as the reconstruction acts, was made by the authority of the President or with his knowledge and consent," and "whether the full and complete record or minute of all the proceedings, conclusions, and determinations of the President and Cabinet relating to said acts of Congress and their interpretation is embraced or given in said publication," and also requesting that "a true copy of the full and complete record or minute of such proceedings, conclusions, and determinations in regard to the interpretation of said reconstruction acts" be furnished to the House.

In compliance with the request of the House of Representatives I have to state that the publication to which the resolution refers was made by proper authority, and that it comprises the proceedings in Cabinet relating to the acts of Congress mentioned in the inquiry, upon which, after taking the opinions of the heads of the several Executive Departments of the Government, I had announced my own conclusions. Other questions arising from these acts have been under consideration, upon which, however, no final conclusion has been reached. No publication in reference to them has, therefore, been authorized by me; but should it at any time be deemed proper and advantageous to the interests of the country to make public those or any other proceedings of the Cabinet, authority for their promulgation will be given by the President.

A correct copy of the record of the proceedings published in the National Intelligencer and other newspapers on the 21st ultimo is herewith transmitted, together with a copy of the instructions based upon the conclusions of the President and Cabinet and sent to the commanders of the several military districts created by act of Congress of March 2, 1867.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1867.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not move that they shall have power to send for persons and papers, for they have that power already. If they choose to exercise it in that direction, I say, sir, that they may find some facts very different from those contained in that message.

Mr. MUNGEN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE STENOGRAPHERS.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution, and to make a brief statement to the House in explanation of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when more than three committees of the House or sub-committees shall be in session, and engaged in taking testimony at any one time, the accounts of the stenographers of the House for reporting such additional testimony (when done by them or persons employed by them) shall be allowed at the rates now received by the reporters for the Congressional Globe, and paid upon the certificates of the chairmen of said committees respectively.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent to say a few words on the subject before objection to the resolution is asked for.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I merely desire to say that these gentlemen, the stenographers of the House, called upon me and requested that I should bring this matter before the House. They have a contract with the Government by which for their salaries alone they report all the testimony taken before the committees of the House, paying the assistants which they may employ out of their own pockets. Their salary, I believe, is about four thousand dollars each, and up to the present time they have furnished reporters for all the various committees and sub-committees without expense to the Government. Now, it appears that the number of committees and sub-committees which will hold sessions during the recess to take testimony will be thirteen, and for all these they will be obliged to furnish reporters. The investigations of these committees will extend from New England at least to Kentucky, and it will be great injustice not to make some provision for the payment of some of these reporters, and to leave the burden to fall entirely upon these gentlemen who have made a hard bargain. The resolution proposes that they shall not only report themselves but furnish a reporter for a third committee, and that when more than three committees are sitting at the same time the additional labor shall be paid for at the rates allowed the reporters for the Congressional Globe.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will say to the gentleman from Vermont, if these stenographers only received the same pay as the reporters of the Congressional Globe I would not object to it at all; but as it now stands these gentlemen employed by the House receive many times more than the Globe reporters. They receive large salaries for doing nothing much of the time; and now because they are to be asked to do something the gentleman proposes that the work shall be done by others and paid for by the Government. If the gentleman will provide that these stenographers shall be paid as the Globe reporters are paid I will not object.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I know nothing about this myself, but these gentlemen have explained the matter to me, and I have no doubt truthfully. I understand that they do not get what the Globe reporters get. They get four thousand dollars, and the pay of the Globe reporters I understand is more. Besides, they have furnished reporters for all the committees. Now, the number of committees is so great, all requiring reporters, and the outlay on their part is so great that their salaries will not pay the reporters they will have to employ, and I think it is only just this relief should be afforded.

Should we ask them to pay out of their salaries several thousand dollars for extra reporting? If they undertake to furnish stenographers for those various committees it will take half a fortune to do it. It seems to me to be just and right that the extra reporters should get the same rate of compensation that the Globe reporters do. The two men who took this contract get their salaries, which amount, as I stated, to about four thousand dollars each. Out of those salaries they have to pay for one extra reporter, which will reduce their salaries to about three thousand dollars. If it is wrong that they should have this relief I would like the gentleman to show it.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I think I can show it. These gentlemen are getting very large pay for doing very little work. It has been so all the last year. They have had very little to do. But now it is probable they will have considerable to do, in which case I am aware that they may not get enough pay. But let them and their employes have the same pay that the Globe reporters get, and no more. The Globe reporters would be willing to do the work at the same rate they now get, and would consider themselves making money by it. Stenographers in abundance can be obtained to do it at that rate. When these gentlemen come back next session and show us that they had to employ a good many sub-stenographers and are out of pocket, or have not made as much money as they ought, I have no doubt the House will do them justice. But there is no need of bringing the question up now.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, like myself, always feels very much hurt when he sees money taken out of the Treasury. We both are ready to raise objection to anything that takes away the public money. But, sir, my sense of justice induces me to go out of my usual rule and vote away a little money in this instance.

The gentleman says during the last year these stenographers have had nothing to do. Let us see. There were two investigating committees in session in New York and a committee in Washington. Then there was the Judiciary Committee in session with extra reporters from the time of the last adjournment till the 3d of June. I venture to say that with all the work they have to do they make a very meager salary—not enough to support them if they have families. Now, by order of the House they will be absolutely ruined next year if they fulfill their contract. It is not the design of the Government to do that which will oppress people who have taken contracts to do public work. I do not ask that they shall have a cent more than their services are worth. We do not get rich out of our salaries, and I am sure they cannot do it. I really think they ought to be relieved.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. One word in reply to the gentleman's economy. I suppose of course he is not in earnest when he says that he and I feel very much hurt when we see money taken out of the Treasury. I do not understand that he claims to be so very economical. I am not aware that his votes would sustain his eulogy upon himself even if he is in earnest. Now, I do not care about the small amount this bill takes out of the Treasury, but it is advertising to the country that we will pay extra prices to every man who will come here, hang around, and get some clever member of Congress to make a motion for his benefit. It is debauching everybody about the Capitol. Some member gets up and makes a motion that the employes of the House be continued during the recess. Nobody wants to be considered small, and—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will address the Chair.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I thought the Chair understood this question perfectly, and I saw that the gentleman from Vermont did not know much about it, so I was endeavoring to enlighten him. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. The gentleman accuses me of being a very clever man. I think a great many would not agree with him in that view. I hope, however, I am a just man. Now, sir, one of these gentlemen has just told me that if they had been paid for the last year at the rate the Globe reporters are paid they would have received more than $10,000 instead of $3,000. That is an entire answer to the gentleman's argument, that during the last year they received large sums of money for doing a very little work. I suppose the statement of the stenographers is true; and if it is, there certainly is great reason and propriety, it seems to me, in providing some relief for them in view of the future duties that are imposed upon them. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that.

The question was put, and the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MILLER. I now move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Accounts when appointed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. It certainly was not understood that that resolution was before the House. The debate on it was pending the question whether there was any objection to it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] reserved the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states the fact correctly, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] reserved the right to object, but he resumed his seat without objection; but there is a pending motion to refer to the Committee of Accounts when appointed.

The motion to refer to the Committee of Accounts was agreed to.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports.

Mr. BAKER. I have no resolution to present, but will state that on yesterday I desired to submit some remarks on the recent veto messages of the President. Under the rules of the House I had no opportunity of doing so, and I now ask that I may hand what I desired to say to the reporters.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I desire, also, to submit some remarks, and I ask that they be printed.

No objection was made, and the leave to print was granted. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

LOCATION OF INDIANS.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs when appointed be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the location of all the Indian tribes of the United States on a tract of land sufficient for their necessities, under the superintendency of some humane person, with a view to the education of said tribes and the protection of their rights.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PIKE, from the committee of conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses in regard to an adjournment, reported the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That at four o'clock and thirty minutes, p. m., on Saturday, the 20th of July instant, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses, to meet on Thursday, the 21st day of November next, at twelve o'clock m.

Mr. PIKE. As this is very nearly the House resolution it is hardly worth while to discuss it, and I call the previous question on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. LOAN. I move that the report of the committee of conference be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred, under the operation of the previous question, upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 47, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Blair, Bromwell, Buckland, Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Dixon, Briggs, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Halsey, Hamilton, Hayes, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Jencks, Kelley, Kitchen, Koontz, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Marshall, Miller, Moore, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Phelps, Pike, Poilsens, Prayn, Robinson, Sawyer, Selye, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Taffo, Townbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Aukon, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Finney, Gravely, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McClurg, Mercur, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Perham, Pike, Plants, Raum, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Thaddeus Stevens, Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Windom—47.

Washburn, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wood—62.

So the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. NOELL. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering at the present time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the heads of the Departments of War, Navy, State, Interior, Treasury, and Post Office are requested to inform the House of the names of clerks, appointees, and employes in their respective Departments; also the salary and term of service of each; also the district and State or Territory from which appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NOELL obtained the floor.

Mr. ROSS. I desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. NOELL,] to move to amend his resolution by adding "and on whose recommendation."

Mr. NOELL. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would suggest that if we require the names of all those who have recommended all these clerks, the communication will be so voluminous that we cannot receive it for a long time. In some cases persons applying for clerkships obtain the recommendations of various persons at home, and send them to their member of Congress.

Mr. ROSS. The information which I desire to get is, what member of Congress made the recommendation in each case. This information would show what many gentlemen here know to be a fact, that some members can get half a dozen clerks appointed in the Departments where others cannot get one. I think there should be something like a fair distribution in this respect. I want to know who are the favorites at the Departments in getting clerks appointed.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman will modify his amendment so as to add to the resolution the words "and by what member of Congress recommended," I shall have no objection.

Mr. ROSS. I modify my amendment in that way.

Mr. NOELL. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of this resolution, I will say that the number of clerks appointed during the war from the eastern States preponderated so largely over the number appointed from the western States that I believe some measure of this kind is necessary in order to show that preponderance and bring about the relief that we need.

During the war we have suffered in the West a great deal from the ravages of the armies on both sides. Our people have been impoverished and plundered; they have been stripped of their property, so that persons formerly wealthy are now reduced to abject poverty. On the other hand, in favored eastern and northern States from which most of the appointments in the Departments have been made, the people, instead of being impoverished by the war have had their wealth increased by it. The immense patronage of the Government has been scattered in profusion over a comparatively few States. The majority of the appointments in the Departments have been made from the States of Pennsylvania, New York, Massachusetts, and Maine. I desire by means of the response to this resolution to show this fact—to show that the people of the western States are deprived of the benefits of Government patronage, are wholly ignored by the Departments. The exhibition of this fact may give force to the demand for some relief against such a state of affairs.

When the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] acting Vice President, was in the West he called attention to the unequal distribution of the benefits of the Government, to the disadvantage of the West. He knew the deep feeling which exists among the people there; that the burdens of the Government are laid heavily upon them. They are, sir, most severely taxed, and they have not arrived at that shrewdness of making up their returns, as they do elsewhere, if report be true, so as to evade the payment of internal revenue. They are taxed heavily, and they pay their taxes honestly. They bear the burdens of the Government. They are used as machines to grind out so much money for this Government, which is to be paid into the hands of a certain dominant party, and after being used as machines and their services secured, then they are given the go-by. When patronage is to be distributed, or any financial benefits accorded, they are left out in the cold. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, we in the West are not only taxed heavily for the support of the Government by supplying internal revenue, but in the tariff acts a discrimination is made against us and in favor of the eastern manufacturers. Our taxes are increased to the extent to which foreign importations are prohibited, so as to enrich the manufacturing interests of New England. What the custom duties have in the way of deficiency we must supply. Now, when we consider these taxes are drawn from the West and put into the pockets of the rich manufacturers, I conceive it must be admitted that great injustice is done to us.

And, sir, there should be some remedy for this great evil. Senator WADE obscurely hinted what he deemed some sort of relief. He had his mind upon the women of the West. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. For how long has the gentleman on the floor?

The SPEAKER. An hour.

Mr. NOELL. Senator WADE knew what he was about. He knew that the women of the country were used to governing their families, and that they knew by instinct what was proper to be done. He was for giving them a voice in the Government, knowing as soon as that was done their management would get rid of the burdens which the West carries for the manufacturers of the East.

Mr. BENTON. Is there any reason why the people of the West should not have a manufacturing interest as well as the East?

Mr. NOELL. That is too large a subject to discuss now. The East has the superior advantage of shrewdness in "gouging." [Laughter.] It has secured the most of the benefits of the Government. It has the most of the patronage. We have the strange spectacle of a great party—I do not know it is great except in persistence of purpose—a party having great weight and influence in the affairs of the country, that has built itself up on the patronage of the Government.

Mr. BENTON. What party do you refer to?

Mr. NOELL. The Radical party.

Mr. BENTON. Is not the gentleman aware that the officers who have the patronage are the supporters of "my policy?" Do not the "bread-and-butter" politicians oppose the Republican party?

Mr. NOELL. It has been the misfortune of the President that the patronage conferred upon him by the Constitution has been taken away from him. Why, sir, if he were to send in the names of the twelve apostles to the Senate that body would reject one after another till they came to Judas Iscariot, and him they would confirm. [Laughter.]

It is almost impossible from the character of the officers that are appointed to get a good man confirmed. It is patronage that has built the party up; on that its whole strength is founded so that it is able to control the destinies of the country.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I would ask the gentleman if he is in favor of the policy of the President?

Mr. NOELL. Well, I am in favor of my own policy. [Laughter.] I think every man should have his own policy and follow it; and mine at this time is to give the West an equal chance with the eastern States in the distribution of these offices.

Mr. STEVENS, of New Hampshire. I ask the gentleman how the clerks in the various Departments are appointed; whether the Radical party has anything to do with their appointment?

Mr. NOELL. The appointees in the Departments are nearly all Radicals. If the poorest and meanest clerk in any Department is turned out it raises a howl, and resolutions are offered and speeches made which are calculated to strike terror into the soul of every head of a Department. [Laughter.] And yet we see many of these appointees connected with this party working by every means in their power to build up their own party and break down the Administration under which they are holding office.

We have had some violent speeches during this session on impeachment. It is well that the weather was good. Had it been the usual temperature at this season of the year gentlemen would have brought themselves into a condition which would have induced disease, and not all the ice that could be put in the aqueduct would have kept the temperature of this Hall so low as to prevent evil consequences from such rash exertions on their part. It has been with the Radical party a question of bread and butter. Because they could not have full possession of the patronage they have worked themselves up into a perfect rage. From this very question of patronage the question of impeachment derives all its strength.

It was the misfortune of the Administration to have the patronage, for in these weak piping times of peace a little bread and butter is a dangerous thing. [Laughter.] They have cut us off from the exercise of patronage in the manner in which every Executive has heretofore exercised it, and they have compelled the Administration to appoint men that would be acceptable to themselves; and the character of such a man as would be acceptable to the Radical party could hardly be estimated. [Laughter.] We have seen distinguished gentlemen on this floor making speeches on impeachment. Why, sir, they even wanted to hang the President. They have worked day and night; they have tried to connect him with the assassination because they thought if he was dangling betwixt heaven and earth what a glorious lot of bread and butter would fall into their mouths. [Laughter.]

We have seen the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts get up on this floor and shake his head most seriously when the question of assassination was before the Judiciary Committee, and saying he hoped things might not be as they might be, but if they were as they might be he did not know what the consequence would be. [Laughter.] Why, sir, some of these gentlemen who were developing the great conspiracy made themselves lions, and as they walked along the street people would say, "There goes Mr. So-and-So; he knows who killed Lincoln; he can see as far into a millstone as any other man." [Laughter.]

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. COVODE. Will the gentleman yield a moment to allow me to offer a resolution? I find there is no authority given to the Judiciary Committee to make a report and have it printed.

Mr. NOELL. I will yield to allow it to be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted, with their testimony in the matter of impeachment of the President, to present and have printed their report thereon; and also the views of the minority of the committee, or of any member or members thereof.

Mr. NOELL. I object. We have had too many of these Radical electioneering documents circulating over the country, leading to all kinds of investigations.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE DEPARTMENTS—AGAIN.

Mr. NOELL. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. About ten minutes.

Mr. NOELL. I have said that this question of patronage exercises a great deal of influence. It is one that appeals to the affections of the Radical party. When we touch upon that we touch upon a thing that they love. An office in their minds is scarcely excelled in attractions by an individual of the great colored species. Next to their devotion to the irrepressible or everlasting African they are devoted to offices. I believe that if the subject were fully investigated it would be found that their devotion to the African is increased and intensified by its connection with their devotion to official patronage. I know that they have a natural attachment to the African. They believe that—

"A thing of beauty is a joy forever;"

and they keep this thing continually before the country. They commenced by emancipating the African; raising a howl over the country for emancipation. That was the first stage. They did not want to exhaust the subject; they wanted to keep a part in reserve for future elections. Two years after that it was proposed that the African should be recognized as a citizen, and we had a taste of the doctrine of the "American citizen of African descent." The Radical party were not satisfied with this; the object was merely to draw the people on. After that we had another act giving to the African the full privileges of a citizen; giving him the elective franchise. That, I think, was a glorious spectacle of Africanism. But still that was not satisfactory. It was found that that policy would not do. A distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts said that universal franchise was simply transferring the South to the hands of the rebels. He knew full well the power of an aristocratic element. He knew the power of money over the poorer class. He knew the influence which wealth can exercise in political affairs. He had seen in the North that the national banks and other financial schemes had placed the country in the hands of a powerful faction of wealthy men, and that the opinions of the people everywhere were molded by the influence of money. He declared that universal suffrage would throw the control of the South into the hands of the rebels. So the next thing in the programme was to take away the right of voting from the whites, and then to build up an immense military machinery by which the right of voting was taken away from all, by which the ordinary apparatus of government was abolished, and all controlling power put into the hands of a few military leaders.

Mr. BENTON. I desire to ask the gentleman how the Democratic party came to lose their ascendancy in Missouri?

Mr. NOELL. Well, sir, the Democratic party lost their ascendancy in Missouri as they have lost it in other places: just by getting beaten. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENTON. The gentleman does not answer my question. I will ask him whether the displacing of that party from power was not because there were so many rebels and traitors in the party?

Mr. NOELL. Well, sir, I do not know anything about that. I know that in Missouri, under the registration law—which is the example that has been followed in reconstruction—a man was not asked whether he was a rebel or was loyal. He was asked any question that the register chose to ask him, and no matter what his answer was, if it was suspected he would not vote for the Radical party, his name was stricken from the list. In some places the fact that a man belonged to a Johnson club was a sufficient reason for striking his name from the list. In other places a man was asked whether he was a Catholic; and his being such was considered as good ground for striking off his name. Thus the thing was carried on. The proceedings were governed by no fair or uniform principle. The question was not that of loyalty; the question was whether this minority faction could get into its hands the whole patronage of the Government; whether the wealth of the State could be placed under their control, to be exacted in the shape of exorbitant taxation. And, Mr. Speaker, it almost sufficed to disfranchise a man if he had a farm large enough to make him sensitive upon the question of tax-paying.

I do not propose to prolong this discussion unnecessarily; but it is very rarely that we on this side get an opportunity to occupy any time. Now, I hope that all gentlemen who are fair-minded, and every member ought to be fair-minded—

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman give way a moment to allow me to introduce a resolution of some importance?

Mr. NOELL. If there is any "bread and butter" in it let us have it.

MILEAGE.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the members of the House and Senate shall be allowed the same mileage for their attendance at this as at former sessions of Congress.

Mr. BAKER. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER. I will tell the gentleman what is the matter. I think it an eminently unfit and improper resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to yield to me.

Mr. NOELL. Certainly.

Mr. GETZ. The gentleman allows this to be taken out of his time to put money into his pocket. [Laughter.]

Mr. NOELL. Why, sir, time is money. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I move to suspend the rules to introduce my resolution.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. NOELL. I will say a word on the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman is putting the cart before the horse; he is proposing to argue what has just been decided.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 138) to carry into effect the convention with the republic of Venezuela for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States on the Government of that republic; and

An act (H. R. No. 137) amendatory of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for contingent expenses of the Senate of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, notifying the House that that body had passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee on its part, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House, to wait upon the President and inform him unless he has some further communication to make Congress is ready to adjourn; and that it had appointed as such committee on its part Mr. RAMSEY and Mr. FOWLER.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BANKS. I move to concur in the resolution of the Senate to appoint a committee to wait upon the President.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. BANKS and Mr. NOELL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the Senate have concurred in the report of the committee of conference in reference to the adjournment, but that a motion to reconsider has been made, and is being discussed.

Mr. NOELL. I beg to be excused from serving on the committee to wait on the President. I have the floor and cannot leave it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be excused.

Mr. KELSEY. It is not in the power of the Chair to excuse him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor for an hour, and I make the point that a committee cannot be appointed in his time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Missouri yielded to allow a message from the Senate to be reported.

Mr. NOELL. I had to yield. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is a privilege which is usually granted. The question is on excusing the gentleman from service.

Mr. NOELL. If the House will agree to give me my time when I get back I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe I made it in time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not rise in his seat.

Mr. NOELL. I demand the previous question on my resolution and the pending amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. MOORE, his Private Secretary, informed the House that he had this day approved and signed an act supplementary to an act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Senate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE DEPARTMENTS—AGAIN.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered on agreeing to the resolution offered by Mr. NOELL and the pending amendment.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. NOELL. I can accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being put, there were—ayes 50, noes 26; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to know whether the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NOELL] declines to serve on the committee to wait on the President; if so he will appoint another.

Mr. NOELL. I have no objection to serving, but I cannot leave at this time. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair then appoints the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] in his place.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and the Chair appointed Messrs. SCOFIELD and NOELL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes, 50, noes 39.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the resolution for the adjournment of Congress.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, rose and was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. COVODE. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is no provision, as the Journal will show, for the printing of the report of the Judiciary Committee. Therefore I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted with their testimony in the matter of impeachment of the President to present and have printed their report thereon, and also the views of the minority of the committee or of any member or members thereof.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. COVODE. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. NOELL. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the committee appointed to wait upon the President be allowed to report in December.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged motion.

On the motion to suspend the rules there were—ayes thirty-five.

Mr. COVODE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JUDD. I rise to a question of order. This House has directed the Judiciary Committee to report the testimony in the impeachment case. I see the testimony present here on the desk of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa,] and I desire to ask the Speaker if this vote by yeas and nays discloses the fact that there is no quorum present whether the committee can then report?

The SPEAKER. Before the yeas and nays are concluded the Speaker will declare the House adjourned.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. On the motion to reconsider, there were—ayes 48, noes 85; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, made an inquiry of the Chair which was not heard by the reporter.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered the Committee on the Judiciary to report forthwith. The Chair supposed the gentleman was about to report a few moments ago when he recognized him and gave him the floor, but he did not proceed, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] claiming the floor at the same time to offer a resolution, the Chair gave it to him.

Mr. COVODE. I hope the gentleman will ask to print the report. That is all I ask.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The chairman of the committee is ready to report.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the proposition to suspend the rules. A motion has been made to reconsider the vote ordering the yeas and nays, on which question no quorum has voted. The hour of half-past four o'clock having arrived, the Chair, wishing every member a safe journey and a happy reunion with the loved ones at home, declares this House adjourned, in pursuance of the concurrent resolution on the subject, until Thursday, the 21st day of November next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petition, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of James Rock and 25 others, praying Congress to pay his transportation as a soldier in the first Michigan cavalry, from Salt Lake City to his home in Michigan.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The memorial of citizens of North Carolina, praying Congress to take such steps as they may deem best to secure the removal of the illegal Governor of that State and all his subordinates, "who, by their influence or example, are aiding and abetting him" in retarding restoration.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, November 21, 1867.

The Senate reassembled to-day at twelve o'clock m., (Hon. B. F. WADE, President pro tempore, in the chair,) pursuant to the following resolution, adopted by the two Houses of Congress on the 20th of July, 1867:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., on Saturday, the 20th day of July, instant, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses to meet on Thursday, the 21st day of November next, at twelve o'clock m.

PRAYER.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D., as follows:

Glory be to Thee, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, for the protecting wing of Thy providence extended over us. Thanks for seed-time and harvest and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with joy and gladness. Thanks for the peace and safety and quiet which have prevailed throughout all of our borders. Thanks to Thee for the revelation Thou hast given us of Thy will, and the light of the glorious Gospel which shines upon our path, and the hope of a blessed immortality within our souls. And now, O Lord God of Hosts, we invoke Thy blessing to be upon this great nation, upon its rulers and statesmen, upon its legislators and governors, upon its brave defenders and judges, and upon all the interests and institutions of thirty millions of people. Oh, grant to make us, as a nation, the great apostle of liberty, the grand exponent of Christianity, the asylum for the nations of the world, and a glory and the defense in the great brotherhood of nations.

And now especially do we ask Thy blessing upon the Senate of the United States and House of Representatives in Congress assembled. Give grace and health and strength to Thy servants who preside over these bodies; and the spirit of wisdom and justice and truth to those who shall legislate for the country. And grant, we pray Thee, that in all of their deliberations the spirit of truth and humanity and justice may prevail. And Thou, O God of the nation, preside over this august body, we pray Thee. We ask that Thy blessing especially may be upon all of our interests and institutions, individually and nationally, and that we may seek direction from on high, and that God will be with us in all our efforts and labors and deliberations and sacrifices, and crown us with His blessing. Come, O Thou King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, and forgive us our sins and accept our persons and our service and save us with everlasting salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of Saturday the 20th of July last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presentation of petitions and memorials is now in order.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I present a petition of citizens of Washington, in which they represent that immediately after the last municipal election in the city many employers discharged their colored employes to the number of about one hundred and fifty, for the alleged reason of exercising the right of the elective franchise conferred upon them by the late act of Congress, thereby causing much inconvenience and suffering to the families of such discharged electors, and they pray remedy from Congress. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of William M. Rust, of Texas, praying to be relieved from all disabilities imposed upon him by the act known as the military reconstruction bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of Bridget W. McGrorty, widow of a lieutenant colonel of one of the Minnesota regiments of volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

HOOR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was

Resolved, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

REPEAL OF COTTON TAX.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate, for the information of the Senate, any facts or reports in possession of the Department relating to the repeal of the tax on cotton.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 65) amendatory of a joint resolution approved July 25, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of Mrs. Bridget W. Grorty; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EQUAL RIGHTS.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 141) for the further security of equal rights in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. This is an exact copy of a bill which passed Congress immediately before its adjournment, and which was signed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and duly sent to the President, but which was never returned by him. I presume that the bill has fallen; that owing to the adjournment of Congress there were no eleven days of session within which the bill could be returned, and that the bill is now, therefore, in the hands of the President, and it is beyond our reach. Under these circumstances I introduce the bill again verbatim as it passed both Houses; and, if there be no objection, I would submit that the Senate proceed with it now. It has already had, I believe, nearly the unanimous vote of this body on a former occasion—certainly the vote of a very large majority, and it has been enrolled. I suggest, therefore, that the Senate proceed with it to-day, and send it to the other House, and make another endeavor to bring it to a close.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the Senate proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill which has just been introduced by him. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over under the rule.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 66) pledging the faith of the United States to the payment of the public debt in coin or its equivalent; which was read the first time, and is as follows:

Whereas the public debt of the United States was (except when specially otherwise provided) contracted and incurred upon the faith and credit of the United States that the same would be paid or redeemed in coin or its equivalent; and whereas doubts have been raised as to the duty and propriety of discharging such debt in coin or its equivalent: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the public debt of the United States (except in the cases where in the law authorizing the same other provisions were expressly made) is owing in coin or its equivalent, and the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged to its payment accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the resolution be laid on the table and printed; and I give notice that I shall ask the Senate at some early day to proceed to its consideration, and I hope that it will pass this body with entire unanimity.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that this is a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. A joint resolution.

BILLS INDEFINITELY POSTPONED.

Mr. WILSON. There are on the general orders two or three bills reported by my committee which I do not think ought to encumber the Calendar. I desire to take them up with a view to have them indefinitely postponed. The measures to which I refer are Senate joint resolution No. 5, Senate bill No. 132, and Senate bill No. 140.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the following bills and joint resolution was postponed indefinitely:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 5) declaring the municipal offices of Alexandria, Virginia, to be vacated;

A bill (S. No. 132) to provide for the calling out of volunteers to suppress Indian hostilities, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 140) to provide for the calling out of volunteers to suppress Indian hostilities.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, November 21, 1867.

The House of Representatives reassembled pursuant to adjournment, and at twelve o'clock m. was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer was offered by Rev. C. B. BOYNTON, Chaplain of the House.

The SPEAKER. The recess having expired, the House resumes its session. Unless the reading of the Journal be dispensed with, the first business in order is the reading of the Journal of the 20th of July last. If there be no objection the reading will be dispensed with.

No objection was made.

MEMBERS SWORN IN.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order, as a question of privilege, is the swearing in of members who have been elected during the recess.

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER. I hold in my hand the credentials of Hon. GEORGE W. WOODWARD, member-elect from the twelfth congressional district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Hon. SAMUEL F. CARY, member-elect from the second congressional district of Ohio, is also present.

Mr. WOODWARD and Mr. CARY appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

THE TENNESSEE DELEGATION.

The SPEAKER. The members-elect from the State of Tennessee will now be called.

The members-elect from Tennessee were called, as follows: R. R. BUTLER, HORACE MAYNARD, WILLIAM B. STOKES, JAMES MULLEN, JOHN TRIMBLE, SAMUEL M. ARNELL, I. R. HAWKINS, and DAVID A. NUNN.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to Mr. Stokes, of Tennessee, being sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must make some motion in regard to the case.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that his credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that he be not sworn in until the case has been investigated.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. If no objection be made, the members-elect from Tennessee to whom no objection is made will now be sworn in.

Mr. BROOKS. One of my questions of privilege is an objection to them all. I object to the swearing in of the delegation from the State of Tennessee for two reasons: and first, upon the ground that three of them, if not more, whom I shall specify by name, have been guilty of treason to this Government; have violated its laws and its Constitution; that one of them has served in the secession legislature of the State of Tennessee, and has taken an oath of allegiance to the confederate government and to Jeff. Davis as the head of that government. I object also to others, whom I shall name. This is my first point.

My second point is, that I object to the swearing in of the whole delegation, upon the ground that there does not exist, and did not exist at the time of this election in the State of Tennessee, a republican form of government such as is required by the Constitution of the United States to entitle a State to a representation upon the floor of this House. Without entering at any great length into this point at the present time, the substance of my argument is grounded upon the elective franchise law of the State of Tennessee, passed in 1865.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BROOKS. I beg that the gentleman will not interrupt me until I state my proposition.

Mr. DAWES. If there is to be a lengthy discussion upon this matter, I suggest to the gentleman that he give way for a moment and let one or two gentlemen, to whom there is no objection, be sworn in.

Mr. BROOKS. I may as well pursue my statement of my point to the end. I object upon the ground that the elective franchise law of Tennessee, under which these gentlemen are said to have been elected, disfranchises a large portion of the white population—a majority of the white population of the State of Tennessee; that these members thus elected under that State franchise law of the State of Tennessee were elected by 55,000 negro voters, 45,000 white voters only voting, and that there were disfranchised in the State of Tennessee in that election from forty to forty-five thousand white voters; 100,000 voters controlled that election, 55,000 of whom were negroes; 45,000 whites being voted down, and 40,000 white voters disfranchised, who could not vote at all under the law of the State. I object to them upon the ground that an oligarchy exists and reigns in the State of Tennessee; and that it is not such a republican form of government as the Constitution prescribes and ordains; and, therefore, I object to the swearing in of the whole delegation upon the principles which I have here alleged.

I will not at this time consume the attention of the House by reading the lengthened law of franchise of the State of Tennessee. But what I have to say upon that subject is, that a more oligarchical, monarchical, exclusive, tyrannical law hardly ever existed under any form of government, and does not now exist in Great Britain or in France. That law, in my judgment, with all due respect to the Representatives from the State of Tennessee, or to the State of Tennessee—for she has no Representatives on this floor—that law is a disgrace to a free form of government, a dishonor to civilization, and a reprobation of all forms of republican self-government.

Without proceeding further upon this point, I shall first object to the swearing in of Mr. Butler, from the first district of Tennessee; from East Tennessee, I think, he comes—from the region where Governor Brownlow lives; and I object to him upon many and various points, which I shall proceed to show as good grounds for objection, and which I have but very little doubt will meet with the attention and consideration of both sides of this House when the facts are brought home fully to the consideration of Republican members, because almost all of them are on a record in the vote which they gave last July for the exclusion of the Kentucky members; almost all of them are upon a record which excludes Mr. Butler irrevocably from being sworn in, upon the facts which I shall present to the consideration of this House.

I hold in my hand the Journal of the extra session of the thirty-third General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, which convened at Nashville on the first Monday of January, 1861, upon the special convocation or order of the then Governor of the State, Isham G. Harris, the declared and avowed object of which, in the message, was to separate or segregate the State of Tennessee from the States of this Union; and of that Legislature Mr. Butler, who is now claiming a right to be sworn in here, was a member.

And before I go further, I shall proceed to read a portion of his record in that Legislature, which I shall show to be the record of one among the most extreme and violent men among the seceding members in this State; not outdone by Isham G. Harris himself, and going as far and as fully as any man did in the Legislature to separate the State of Tennessee from the Union. And I shall proceed to show the active part which he took in that Legislature before I proceed to another and more active part taken by him in the perambulatory legislature, first convened in Nashville by Governor Harris, and subsequently portable and transferable, after the affair of Fort Donelson, to the city of Memphis, on the Mississippi river. On page 57 of the House Journal of 1861 of the extra session of the General Assembly of Tennessee, Mr. Butler offered a "House resolution, No. 34," as follows:

"Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed to vote against the confirmation of any man to office who indorsed an infamous libel upon the South, known as the Helper book; and that the Governor is hereby requested to forward a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators in Congress."

I do not blame Mr. Butler so much for that. I read it, not so much for the consideration of this side of the House as for the other side of the House more particularly.

The second resolution was that—

"The people of Tennessee receive the report of the appointment of William H. Seward to a position in the Cabinet of the incoming Administration as further evidence of hostility to the institutions of the South; and if the policy he has advocated in all his speeches upon the subject of domestic slavery shall be inaugurated with said Administration, the South has but little hope of a settlement of existing difficulties between her and the North."

The objection here is to Mr. Seward as a member of the incoming Lincoln administration, upon the ground of his hostility to the South. I do not blame Mr. Butler very much for that. This is not the point of my accusation. At that time I was equally opposed to the incoming of Mr. Seward into the Administration. In the matter of the Helper book, and as to the question of the fitness of Mr. Seward as a member of the then incoming Administration, we agreed in sentiment. I do not, therefore, mention those as points against the admission of Mr. Butler as a member of this House.

The great object of that Legislature was, as I have said, to obtain or order a convention in the State of Tennessee, which convention should, under the doctrine of secession, take the State of Tennessee, as was contended, constitutionally out of the Union. A resolution was offered by Mr. Jones that "the action of the convention shall be submitted to the people, upon reasonable notice, for ratification or rejection, and shall be of no binding force unless it is adopted and ratified by a majority of the qualified voters of the people of Tennessee;" and upon the final vote on that subject Mr. Butler voted with the seceders to create a convention, to ordain it by law, to make it, as was then contended, a legitimate and constitutional convention. Upon the final vote taken on that subject, the strongest sort of a resolution for the creation of a convention, whose action was to be submitted to the people, was adopted by a vote of sixty-eight ayes and no nays; and the bill for the holding of a convention was then ordered to be transferred to the Senate, Mr. Butler voting in the affirmative.

Another resolution, No. 44, introduced in that Legislature by Mr. Farrelly, provided that "His Excellency the Governor be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to make inquiry of the different banks of the State whether or not they are willing to loan the State money in the present crisis of affairs;" and if so, how much and upon what terms." On that resolution the vote was 47 yeas to 19 nays, Mr. Butler voting in the affirmative.

Mr. Pickett submitted resolution No. 51, on the subject of Federal relations—a long series of resolutions, too long to read, but the purport of which can easily be imagined when I describe them as of the worst kind of the resolutions which were at that time introduced into the "secession" legislatures of the southern States. The resolution to which I particularly call the attention of the House is that which was offered by Mr. Jones as an amendment, and which was carried, that—

"Should a plan of adjustment satisfactory to the South not be acceded to by the requisite number of States, to perfect amendments to the constitution, it is the opinion of the General Assembly that the slaveholding States should adopt for themselves the Constitution of the United States, with such amendments as may be satisfactory to the slaveholding States; and that they should invite into a union with them all States of the North which are willing to abide such amended constitution and frame of government; severing at once and forever all connections with States refusing such reasonable guarantees for our future safety."

The vote on the adoption of that resolution was—yeas 42, nays 23; Mr. Butler being recorded in the affirmative.

In the same volume I find another long series of resolutions of the same sort, introduced by Mr. Grant, from the joint committee on Federal relations. The concluding resolution of the series I will read:

"Resolved, That should a plan of adjustment satisfactory to the South not be acceded to by the requisite number of States to perfect amendments to the Constitution of the United States, it is the opinion of this General Assembly that the slaveholding States should adopt for themselves the Constitution of the United States, with such amendments as may be satisfactory to the slaveholding States; and that they should invite into a union with them all States of the North which are willing to abide such amended constitution and frame of government, severing at once all connection with States refusing such reasonable guarantees to our future safety; such renewed conditions of federal union being first submitted for ratification to conventions of all the States respectively."

This resolution received the vote of Mr. Butler. There are other points in this book, all going to demonstrate as forcibly, or more forcibly than what I have read, that at all times and on all occasions, without any exception whatsoever, Mr. Butler voted against the Union members of the Legislature of Tennessee, and with the leading "secesh" members of that body.

Secession was ordained, and that ordinance of secession I have before me, but I will not consume the time of the House by having it read. It was adopted May 7, 1861, and ratified June 8, 1861. It was an ordinance of secession professing to take the State of Tennessee out of the Union, and declaring that it thereafter formed an independent State—one of the confederate States of America.

The record of Mr. Butler up to this moment may be defensible by those who sustain him here, if any are so disposed, on the ground that prior to the ordinance of secession he had the right to his own opinions; the right to declare them and to vote accordingly. But, sir, if I should stop here I should fail to present his complete record, and I now proceed to go further to other documents which I have here before me, but not in printed and authentic form, such as those obtained from legitimate authorities; the records of that State after the ordinance of secession not being in the possession of any government or authority of which I am aware, if they have not already been destroyed. Of the "secesh" legislature held in Tennessee after this ordinance took that State out of this Union, Mr. Butler, of East Tennessee, became a prominent and active member; and I have in my hands a variety of motions in which he took an active part, and when they are fully presented to the consideration of the other side of the House they will bind gentlemen to their mischievous precedent established in this House in the case of the member-elect from the State of Kentucky in July last, and compel them to refuse to Mr. Butler the right to take the oath and become a member of this body.

I have before me, Mr. Speaker, the record of Mr. Butler's votes in the "secesh" legislature of the confederate State of Tennessee. I have here where he moved an amendment and voted to amend a bill authorizing the authorities of the confederate State of Tennessee to confiscate and sequester all northern debts due from people in Tennessee to people in the North, and to sequester all northern property held in Tennessee belonging to any citizen of the North. That bill of confiscation and sequestration not only proceeds to confiscate and sequester northern property, but also declares citizens of the North to be aliens, and entitled to no more rights than aliens from Great Britain, aliens from France, or aliens from Austria or Turkey. And when the ambulatory or ambulant "secesh" legislature of the confederate State of Tennessee was threatened by the irruption of our army after the success at Fort Donelson—when it was threatened at Nashville, Mr. Butler, among others of that ambulatory legislature, decamped from that city and established the headquarters of that legislature in the city of Memphis. Among other measures adopted in the city of Memphis for which Mr. Butler voted was one for taking care of the invalid soldiers of the South; providing the ways and means for supporting also the families which were left behind. This may have been charity, but it was a charity showing his heart as well as his votes at that time to be with the southern confederacy.

But, sir, the point to which I wish now particularly to call attention was a motion for removing the incorporated banks of the State of Tennessee from within the Union dominion, from those portions of the State which had been taken possession of after the victory of Fort Donelson, to those portions not in the occupation of our army. And a vote of his is on record in the "secesh" legislature indorsing that motion, and threatening those banks with a deprivation of their corporate rights if they did not change their places of business to within the confederate or "secesh" dominion in the State of Tennessee. No more important vote than that could be given; for next to the sword of the South was the purse of the South, if indeed the purse was not the most important. By that act of Mr. Butler he voted to take ten million dollars from the then conquered portion of Tennessee and to transfer that capital to the confederate government of Tennessee. His vote is on the record. And if this were not enough, he is on the record to give the use of the Tennessee hall of the House of Representatives to the electors for president and vice president who elected Jeff. Davis to be president of the confederate States.

He is also on record as voting to pay for the cavalry horses of the confederate government. He is also on record, in the eighty-ninth resolution of the "secesh" convention, as declaring that no compromise whatsoever should be made with the northern United States of America, except with the express condition that the confederate States should be recognized as sovereign, independent States of this Union. The eighty-sixth resolution of this convention, then assembled at Memphis, was to seize all United States property to pay for rebel services during the war, and Mr. Butler is on record as voting for that. He is also on record to build a railroad from Cleveland, Tennessee, under the authority of the confederate government, as a great military necessity of the confederate States of the South.

I might, I presume, stop here, but I hold in my hand some resolutions upon which Mr. Butler voted in the "secesh" legislature, which I will proceed to read, and to which I ask the particular attention of all sides of the House. Mr. Jones offered the following resolutions in the "secesh" house of assembly:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this general assembly that the separation of those States now forming the confederate States of America from the United States is, and ought to be final, perpetual, and irrevocable; and that Tennessee will, under no circumstances, entertain any proposition from any quarter which may have for its object a restoration or reconstruction of the late Union on any terms or conditions whatever."

"Resolved, That the war which the United States are waging upon the confederate States should be prosecuted on our part with the utmost vigor and energy, until our independence and nationality are unconditionally acknowledged by the United States."

"Resolved, That Tennessee pledges herself to her sister States of the confederacy that she will stand by them throughout the struggle; that she will contribute all the means which her resources will supply, so far as the same may be necessary, to the support of the common cause, and will not consent to lay down arms until peace is established on the basis of the foregoing resolutions."

These resolutions were carried—ayes 41, noes 19; and among the 41 ayes is the name of Mr. Butler, now claiming to be a Representative on the floor of this House from the State of Tennessee.

I take it for granted that after I have presented these and some other facts I shall have the support of the whole Republican side of the House; for I hold in my hand the report of the debate which took place in this body in July last upon the question of the admission of Kentucky members on the floor, against one or two of whom charges were brought not half so grave as against this claimant Butler; and yet every member, except one, I believe on that side of the House refused the swearing in of the members from Kentucky. As this is a forgetful age—all of us are liable to forget—I ask the attention of some members on the other side of the House to some remarks which they made on the subject of the admission of the Kentucky members.

After the Speaker had decided upon a motion of order, made by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] that it was right to arrest the swearing in of those members before they were permitted to take their seats, in order to refer their case to the Committee of Elections, the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] whose vote I am sure of having, presented a resolution which finally passed the House, and on that occasion he spoke as follows:

"Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution to the House I do not do so with a view of striking at any particular member of Congress claiming to be elected from the State of Kentucky; but I do it for the purpose of establishing a precedent in this House, which shall be placed upon higher motives than that of excluding any individual from a seat here. I ask that all the members-elect from the State of Kentucky shall be excluded from the privilege of taking the oath until an examination shall be had before the Committee of Elections. Why do I do so? Sir, it is upon the ground that this House should not be contaminated, or allow itself at any time to be so, by the introduction of any man into its Halls as a Representative of the people of any district in the United States who has, during the rebellion, participated in any way whatever in it."

"If Kentucky can send members to this House under these circumstances, and in spite of objection or protest, they may be sworn in as members under the rules and authority of this House. I ask any man to tell me why South Carolina may not do the same thing under the advice of the head of this Government? If the State of Kentucky, or Maryland, or Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent, were to hold an election of members of Congress, and were to send members here who were known to the country as rebels, it would be our duty to inquire into their status."

"Now, sir, there is no use in our being so thinskin-skinned about these questions. Some gentlemen say: 'Oh, it would not be right to keep these men out; we have had some of them in before.' We should not be afraid to look the question in the face. The question is, What are you going to do hereafter? What are you going to do when some other State sends you up a whole delegation of such men? Are you going to swear each one in when there is no protest against his election? If you do, tell me whether or not Alex. Stephens, or any of those men, might not enter these Halls and take the oath? They can do so, and the only true course, in my judgment, is when a delegation comes from a State whose loyalty is questionable, whether it has been in the rebellion or not, to examine the whole delegation, and admit such men as are loyal, and send such as are disloyal back to their constituents, and tell their constituents to send you a different class of men."

Mr. LOGAN. As the gentleman is reading my remarks, I ask if he will allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. BROOKS. I must decline if it would come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman can obtain the floor at any time.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to discuss the question. I only desire to call the gentleman's attention to the resolution which the House passed.

Mr. BROOKS. I must decline to yield, and I do it upon the ground that the gentleman will certainly be able to obtain the floor after I have closed what I have to say; he has the right to it; and now I call attention to the remarks of another honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.] He said:

"You have heard read the charges and specifications and the affidavits in support of them. A prima facie case has at least been made out against them. I trust this is not assuming too much, for I would not knowingly do an act of injustice to them."

He continued:

"I am insisting that Congress has the right to exclude disloyal men; men who engaged in the rebellion; men who committed treason against this Government. I care not whether the man comes from Kentucky or from any other State; the principle is the same."

"Now, sir," continues Mr. INGERSOLL, "I say for one, and I do not profess to speak for any one but myself, that if Samuel McKee, a loyal man, had received but one loyal vote, and assuming, which I do not say is the fact, that Mr. Young received 15,000 disloyal votes, he himself having been guilty of giving aid and encouragement to the rebellion, I for one should vote against the admission of Mr. Young, and for the admission of Mr. McKee with but one loyal vote behind him."

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] indulged in the same tone of remark. He said:

"Sir, I present the practical question to this House, that there is a prima facie case made out. The House is not asked to declare that John D. Young is not entitled to a seat here, but it is asked to declare upon this showing that he shall not be permitted now to take the oath, but shall stand back until some inquiry shall be made into the truthfulness of these allegations, and a report made to the House upon which it can understandingly determine the question ultimately and finally."

He further continues:

"If there be within the general knowledge of the House, to its satisfaction, proof that the election in any particular district of country or in any particular State has been so conducted that the voice of the people has in all probability not been heard there, or their will perverted, or their choice been made distinctly, it is in the power of this House to pause at the very threshold and direct that an investigation be made, in order to satisfy the House with regard to any Representative claiming to come from such locality, district, or State."

Mr. LOGAN subsequently reiterated like remarks at very considerable length, and in as strong a manner as those I have read.

A gentleman from Massachusetts, whom I was surprised to see take that position upon that occasion, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] said:

"I think we are justified in taking this position: that when a member rises in his place and states as of his own knowledge, or upon information worthy of belief, that a person presenting himself here for a seat in this House is or has been substantially a traitor to this Government, we have a right to decline to allow that person to take the oath until that matter has been investigated and he has been relieved from the charge." * * * "But when it is alleged upon the authority of a member of this House, or upon an affidavit presented and read by a member of the House, or by its Clerk, that a person presenting himself here for a seat is a traitor, of course we must refuse to allow him to take the oath until he is purged from that charge. It is upon that rule that I must vote upon the questions as they are presented."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have made out that the State of Tennessee has not a republican form of government, that is, that no system of self-government such as we recognize exists in the State of Tennessee; and I am sure that I have made out against Mr. Butler not only a prima facie case, but a case, quod erat demonstrandum. This record is impossible to be got over by any discussion in this House. And I am further sure that upon the precedent established in the July session of this House, I have every Republican member of the House, by the record, by the debate, by solemn declarations and arguments, every one of them, committed not only to the ejection hereafter of this Mr. Butler from the floor of this House, but to a refusal to allow him to be sworn in here by the Speaker of the House if he dares to appear in that area and take the solemn oath which the law of this country prescribes—if he dares to take it after the exposition I have made, and subject himself to the penalties of the crime of perjury to which the taking of that oath would doom him.

I will now refer to the member-elect from the fourth district of the State of Tennessee, Mr. Mullins, who I believe comes from the central part of the State. I object to him, not upon grounds so strong as I have objected to the admission of Mr. Butler; but I object to him upon the ground that he gave aid and comfort to the rebellion; made speeches in behalf of the rebellion, lent it aid and support, and assisted to raise troops for that rebellion. In the year 1861 he made a speech in Bedford county, Tennessee, at a place known as Moore's Springs, near Shelbyville, for the purpose of urging the young men there to join a rebel company to be raised there. In the speech referred to, Colonel Mullins said that he wanted to see all the young men go out and fight for their homes and firesides; that he was old and not able to do much fighting; that he would remain at home and make meat and bread for those to live on who did fight; and whenever it became essential he would himself go into the rebel army. The speech was entirely a rebel speech.

I hold in my hand authority for these declarations, and if this authority is denied hereafter, I shall proceed to submit it in a more substantive and official form than I have named here.

In the fourth district of Tennessee, where lived some eight thousand of the twenty-two thousand white voters who organized the State of Tennessee after the rebellion, Governor Brownlow, under this wicked registry act, in order to elect a man of his own school, and to prevent the election by the conservative voters of that district, threw out four counties, containing five thousand registered voters, the counties of Coffin, Franklin, Lincoln, and Giles. In those counties, where, I say, lived eight thousand of the twenty-two thousand voters who organized the State of Tennessee, five thousand of those white voters were thrown out by the proclamation of the Governor of Tennessee; doing away with the whole registry of these counties. He disfranchised them all by an arbitrary edict of power; and if Mr. Mullins could be maintained in his seat otherwise, this declaration is sufficient here to show that republican self-government does not now and did not exist, in at least the fourth district of Tennessee.

I have also objections to urge to the admission of Mr. Arnell, of the sixth district of Tennessee. During the war he was established in the county of Lawrence, Tennessee, where he lives, and had a tannery which, during no inconsiderable portion of the war, was devoted to the manufacture of shoes. He declared he was unable to supply his neighbors with shoes, because, such were the requisitions of the rebel authorities upon him, that before he could supply the women and children of his neighborhood with shoes he must supply this foundation and understanding of the rebel army.

I also object to the admission of Mr. Trimble, from the fifth district of Tennessee, who, I am informed—I have not the authentic information in his case that I have in the others—because when the ordinance of secession was submitted to the people of Tennessee, in 1861, if he voted at all, as many believe he did vote, he voted to take Tennessee out of the Union.

Mr. Trimble says that is not true; I was about to state, when he said so, that if he would rise upon this floor and say that it was not so, I would say no more—but as he has no right to say it to the House he whispers it to me, and I say to the House for him, that he did not vote at that time. I withdraw my objection, then, to Mr. Trimble, because I have no authentic testimony; none except a mere verbal report, which is not enough for me to make charges respecting him upon the floor of this House.

I now yield the rest of my time to the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] But before I yield I wish to introduce some resolutions, which I will put in form.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that a mere objection to the swearing in of a gentleman will not arrest the administration of the oath; but it will require some action of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I will propose two resolutions, one against the admission of all the members; the other, that the certificates of Messrs. Butler, Stokes, and Arnell, previous to their being sworn in, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. I shall call for a division of the question upon the resolutions of which notice has been given by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make but a single remark. I was apprehensive at the last session that the precedent which gentlemen were establishing in the case of Kentucky would come back at some not distant day to torment its inventors; and as I have objected to Mr. Stokes being sworn in as a member of this House, and have moved that his credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections, I now ask to place before the House the ground of my objection.

On the 27th of July, 1866, Mr. Stokes was making a speech in this House, when I asked of him the privilege of introducing and having read at the Clerk's desk a letter purporting to have been written by him. That letter was read, as follows:

LIBERTY, May 10, 1861.

DEAR SIR: I have just learned from a friend that there is some gross misrepresentation going the rounds in your section in regard to my position in this trying crisis, and for the benefit of yourself and others I write this.

I have been a zealous advocate of the Union up to the time of Lincoln's call for seventy-five thousand troops; that being in violation of law, and for the subjugation of the South. I commend Governor Harris for his course, and for arming the State and resisting Lincoln to the point of the bayonet, and have enrolled my name as a volunteer to resist his usurpation. I have, in Congress and out, opposed coercion and all forced measures, believing that it was better to recognize the independence of the "southern confederacy" than to attempt to coerce them back.

I have always opposed secession, but claim the right of revolution, and the right to resist the oppression of the Federal Government, and to throw off their allegiance to the same when that oppression becomes intolerable. That time has now come. I have been, and am now, for standing by the border slave States, for they are to be the great sufferers during the conflict. I am opposed to being tacked on to the southern confederacy at present, (except as a military league.) But when peace is restored, if the two nations cannot live in peace, let all the fifteen slave States elect delegates, meet in convention, frame their constitution, and submit it to the people for their ratification.

The South ought to be a unit during the war, by all means. I had announced myself as a candidate for reelection, but on seeing Lincoln's proclamation for troops abandoned the canvass at once, and I am no candidate. I claim to have done my duty in trying to heal our difficulties and restore peace. That having failed, I shall now march forward in the discharge of my duty in resisting Lincoln, regardless of false charges, or what not, by those who are trying to put me down. Time will tell where we all stand, and who have been faithful.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I remain yours truly,

WILLIAM B. STOKES.

Mr. JOHN DUNCAN, McMinnville, Tennessee.

When this letter was read, I inquired of Mr. Stokes, who was then addressing the House, whether it was a genuine letter written by him. His answer was "Yes, sir, it is." Upon this letter, therefore, I have made the objection to the swearing in of Mr. Stokes, and have moved that his credentials, with this letter, be referred to the Committee of Elections, and the gentleman on the other side will now have the opportunity of following the precedent of the Kentucky case.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing this question at length, but merely to call the attention of the House to the precedent referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] It is not the fact, as stated by the gentleman, that this House decided that on a charge made by a member against a whole delegation the credentials of that delegation should be referred to the Committee of Elections. I introduced a resolution embracing such a proposition, and in support of it made the remarks which have been read by the gentleman from New York. But the House decided against that resolution, and I was obliged to amend it so that the charges should be made against the individual members implicated, and not against the delegation. In that way the credentials of the individuals against whom charges were made were referred to the committee, not the credentials of the whole delegation. That was the precedent established by the House. The present resolution is directed against the admission of a whole delegation. So far as regards many of the members-elect from the State of Tennessee, no charges have been made by any gentleman upon his own responsibility—no charges the truth of which he asseverates—no charges sustained by the evidence of any man whose name has been given to this House. So far as regards the charges against Mr. Butler, and perhaps one other member-elect, if those charges be true, I have only to say that I am glad to see that side of the House coming up to the mark, because in future there may be some use for their help here when other parties come here applying for admission as members. I myself would not vote to permit Mr. Butler to be sworn in and to take a seat as a member of this House, if the journals of the Legislature of Tennessee prove what has been stated, until an investigation has been had before the appropriate committee. But as to the other members-elect, with one exception, there are no charges against them. As to the charge against the gentleman from, I believe, the third district, Mr. Stokes, that has been before this House heretofore. There is no charge against him except that made by the gentleman from the State of Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] supported by a letter which has been read in this House time and time again. That being the only evidence against the gentleman from Tennessee, the House is as well prepared to vote on that question now as they would be if it was referred to a committee.

Mr. Speaker, I will say this in support of Mr. Stokes, of Tennessee, that if any man can ever wipe out a wrong such as that of penning a letter of this kind, this noble man has done it, and done it well. For two long years he traveled by my side, through the smoke of many a battle, on the side of the Union army, and if that wipes out an error of this kind it applies with the greatest force to the case of Mr. Stokes. But the gentlemen who are so charitable to the men who have fought so many years against the Government, who would give them power and allow them to control this vast country, have no charity for the men who fought side by side with the Union soldiers in the recent conflict for the preservation of this country, when some of you gentlemen were publishing articles in papers that were treasonable in themselves, to a loyal country. I do not wonder, therefore, that gentlemen should be so desirous of having this man, who fought so faithfully for the Union, kept out of this House.

Now, when the evidence is before the House, I ask the House to decide the question without reference to a committee, because we have investigated and passed upon this Duncan letter before. I do not mean investigated in reference to his right to take his seat, but that it has been discussed before in this House. The House understands the matter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman is mistaken about the House having ever investigated this letter. Another subject was before the House when it was read before. It was read but once. It was read before on the question of the admission of the Senator from that State, modifying the test oath so that he might take his seat in the Senate. It was after Mr. Stokes had taken his seat. I should not have introduced it now were it not that Judge Trimble, having sat in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, was on a similar allegation prevented from taking his seat.

Mr. LOGAN. I said that it had not been referred to a committee, but that members of the House understood it. I heard of it before I became a member of this House I do not know how many times—I think two or three times. We all know what it is, what is the charge and what the evidence, and if a committee were to investigate the charge from now to December a year their only report would be that he wrote this letter—he does not deny it—but that he showed himself true to the country in the conflict with the rebels. That would be the report. The House is as able now to pass upon his right to a seat as at any time. There is no charge except the one we have now before us.

As to another member from Tennessee, the charge is based upon the journals of the confederate State legislature. That is as I understand it, but the gentleman may be mistaken. But on this charge of the gentleman from New York I am willing to refer the credentials to the Committee of Elections to be investigated, as in the case of the Kentucky members. This is all I desire to say.

Mr. DAVES. If I call for a division what will be the first question?

The SPEAKER. First on that part which excludes the whole delegation.

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York informs the Chair that he does not move to exclude all of the members, but to refer the certificates.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to refer the credentials of Mr. Stokes to the Committee, with the paper I have read, and that he be not sworn in pending the investigation.

Mr. BROOKS. I move as an amendment that the certificates of the gentlemen from Tennessee be referred to the Committee of Elections; and that the certificates of Messrs. Butler, Mullins, and Arnell, previous to being sworn in, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAVES. I move as a substitute that the credentials of Mr. Butler be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that he be not sworn in pending the investigation. In support of that motion I understand that the gentleman from New York makes a charge in good faith against the loyalty of this gentleman who presents his credentials and asks to be sworn in. If the gentleman does not make the charge in good faith, that is for him to settle with his own self-respect, and what is due from him to the House. It is enough for me to assume that the gentleman from New York has made such wonderful progress at the present session that in good faith he charges upon a member-elect disloyalty, and on that ground proposes to exclude him until the question can be investigated by a committee.

At the last session the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] took the position that no charge of disloyalty, however flagrant and however palpable, was sufficient ground for the exclusion of any person coming here bearing the certificate of the governor of his State as a member-elect of this House, but claimed that, however black in treason he might be, it was the duty of the House first to qualify him as a member, and then, if it were able, to expel him by a two-thirds vote. Sir, I congratulate the country and the gentleman from New York upon this wonderful conversion. There is no parallel to it since the celebrated journey to Damascus, [laughter,] and I trust with this encouragement before him he will continue journeying on till even he shall see more clearly than we do now what constitutes loyalty and what disloyalty.

The gentleman also takes the position in his remarks, and in the amendment which he originally proposed, that it is proper for this House upon a case made out to look into the status of a State of this Union and to decide for itself whether that State government be republican in form or not. In that matter I also congratulate him upon the wonderful advance he has made, and I am happy, for one, to be able to stand with him and vote with him, as I shall, on the original motion he has made in reference to Mr. Butler, of Tennessee. At the last session, in reply to the gentleman, when I propounded to him in vain the question whether he could conceive of disloyalty so flagrant and so palpable as to justify him in voting to exclude a member until his case could be investigated by a committee, I stated to him that whenever any member stood up in this House and upon his responsibility as a member of the House made a charge directly against any one presenting credentials here that he had been untrue to his country, or a traitor, I would vote first to investigate his case, and then I would pass upon the question as the evidence itself should be presented. The gentleman from New York resisted that proposition. And now, taking him to be sincere in his present motion, I welcome him as a new convert, and like a new convert I expect him to take the lead in the good work and to do works meet for repentance. I trust that he may now take hold of this work and be no longer found fighting, as he was at the last session, for the admission of men to seats in this House, however serious might be the charge of treason against them. I now call the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield the floor to me a moment?

Mr. DAVES. I withdraw the call and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me a moment to point out a distinction which I think gentlemen have failed to observe between the Kentucky case and this case of Mr. Butler, or any other that has ever been before Congress. The objection made to admitting the Kentucky delegation rested upon present disloyalty—upon their words and actions in the last campaign—upon their present condition of mind. The allegations made against Mr. Butler and Mr. Stokes and the other members of the Tennessee delegation go back to a period of time when there was a wide diversity of opinion among all the people of the country. Is the gentleman from New York ready to take the position that there shall be no change of opinion which shall merit forgiveness? Is he willing to say that every man who participated in the old pro-slavery or State rights sentiment shall be forever debarred from this House, or from office, honor, or emolument? That is the logic of his argument.

The gentleman to whom the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Elections relates never held an office which required an oath that would disfranchise him. The case is not analogous to that of Senator PATTERSON. It has been held that the Legislature is not such an office as that. This gentleman was elected in 1859 to the Legislature of Tennessee, and the journal quoted is a journal of legislative proceedings under that election. There was no confederate legislature to be elected at that time, and, when a special session was held, Colonel Butler and the other loyal members of the Legislature proposed to meet at Kingston, and they were carried bodily to the place of meeting. He is a man who served through the whole war. His son served in the ranks of our Army; his home was desolated and burned; his body three times imprisoned. Under power granted by General Burnside, he raised a regiment of gallant East Tennesseans and led them through the war. I hold in my hand a letter, among others, from Senator PATTERSON, of Tennessee, indorsing him then as a fit man for that service. I hold also the order of General Burnside empowering him to raise the regiment. I hold his commission, signed by Andrew Johnson, empowering him to lead and command that regiment. It is rather a late day to except him from the loyal delegation from Tennessee, and put a blot upon his name. I have here his own letter of that day, published through the eastern part of the State, in which he urged the starving Union men who had been discharged from the prisons of the State and set at liberty to enroll themselves in the ranks of the regiment that he was to lead in behalf of the flag of his country. In the time yielded to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts I cannot read the various letters and papers that are before me. Here is his commission as judge since the war closed and the State of Tennessee had been reorganized. Here, as I said, is the order from General Burnside to him to raise the regiment. Here is a commission from Andrew Johnson to him as colonel of the regiment. Were his colleagues on this floor able to speak they would tell you with more minuteness and knowledge and more eloquence than I could hope to do, how valiantly he led the men of Tennessee for the overthrow of the rebellion and the maintenance of the flag and the Constitution of his country.

I hope the case will be made no exception of, but that he and the other members from Tennessee will at once be admitted to their seats; and let the men of the South know that upon this floor it is the Democratic party that admits no place and no time for penitence that can remove disfranchisement, not for rebellion, but for holding opinions in 1861 which they hold to-day on the subject of State rights and the degradation of the colored people of America.

Mr. DAVES. I do not make this motion,

Mr. Speaker, upon the merits of the case. I never heard of this case before. I only hear of it in the House at this time, and it may be as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says, that this man is as truly loyal as I am, or as the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is. But I am not going to put myself with the gentleman from New York, with one set of opinions and votes for one side of the House and another set of opinions and votes for the other side of the House. With the same charge presented against a gentleman who claims to be on one side of the House as is presented against a man who comes here belonging to the other side of the House, I leave it to the gentleman from New York to divide his vote and his duty and his conscience; I treat them both in the same way. When a charge is made here in this House by a regular member of the House, upon his responsibility, that he has reason to believe, and he produces the evidence upon which that belief is founded, which upon its face appears to be good and valid, that a gentleman who presents his credentials here is disloyal, I think it is due to him, due to the House, and due to the country, that his case be investigated by a committee.

If it shall turn out that political antagonism or malignity or inconsistency has prompted such a charge as this, it is in the care and in the power of this House to deal with any such charge and the author of it as they think is due to the character of the gentleman maligned, upon the investigation of a committee or otherwise, as they see fit. If any member of this House, without ground, should make such a charge against a member-elect and cause his credentials to be referred to a committee without any reasonable foundation for excluding him until that investigation, it would, in my mind, be sufficient ground for a vote of censure, if not expulsion from the House.

I trust, therefore, that we shall take the gentleman from New York at his word, assume that he is consistent in making this charge, and that he will vote for his resolution himself; but whether he votes for it himself or not, let us, upon the strength of the charge, refer this case and have it investigated. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. CHANLER took the floor.

Mr. BROOKS. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman on my left, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. BROOKS. And my colleague yields to me a moment. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts object? Does he fire a charge at me and then receive none back?

Mr. DAWES. No, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. I only want to say that you expelled me once, and if you try it again I will come back by ten thousand majority.

Mr. CHANLER. My object in rising is not to take part in the exceedingly personal discussion to which this debate is tending. Either this is a question of privilege worthy the consideration of the House at this time, or it is not worthy a moment's waste of the time of the House.

The chairman of the Committee of Elections, in order to save Mr. Stokes from the same fate to which he would consign Mr. Butler, throws Mr. Butler into the arena for the wild beasts to tear him to pieces. He reminds us of that apostle who had to fight the beasts at Ephesus; and with regard to his allusion to light, a great light has fallen across the paths of a great many of the erring saints in that church, and that light has been exactly from the region from which my colleague from New York brings this effort to force you, by committing you to the inconsistency of your previous course, to show your repentance, and in sack-cloth and ashes to recognize the great democratic principle, that when the people of Tennessee or Kentucky or Connecticut or any other State send you, in their sovereign capacity, a man duly elected under the laws of the States, you dare not refuse him his position among you.

It is because for partisan purposes, in the last session, you defeated this great democratic principle that my colleague [Mr. BROOKS] and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] have brought you to the stand as witnesses against yourselves. And the subtle, special manoeuvre of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DAWES,] by which the resolution of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] is ignored, is adroit, but certainly it does not show that his repentance is worth much. He will improve. I think that he has had an opportunity of studying the divine light, that principle of vox populi vox Dei (which has been so consistently ignored on that side of the House) in the recent elections in his own State, and it is to be hoped he will accept the truth; it is to be hoped that that whole side of the House, which will decide upon this case, will recognize the great uprising of the people, irrespective of party, throughout this country. The democratic party does not claim this as their victory, but as your defeat.

Accept the shining light, O Saul, or die in the darkness of the politically damned. Your time has come; and not being fallen angels, although you have followed your arch-fiend through many a dreary toil of battle and disgrace, remember that you are men, and that you have a hope of salvation, and not utter damnation. Take the light when you can get it; but do not attempt, when stultified by your past action before the country, when rebuked by the voice of the people throughout the land—do not attempt to throw upon my colleagues on this side of the House the weight and responsibility which rest upon you and you alone, for you and your votes will decide who shall be admitted on this floor and who shall be rejected. I hope that not only the Saul of Tarsus, but the Saul of Massachusetts will accept the benign influence of the popular will, and read the Constitution by this holy light, which is spreading itself from California to Maine. I hope that you all may see wherein your rights consist, and wherein you have transgressed before.

Read us no lessons from Scripture, in God's name. You have denied the principles of truth in the Constitution; you have ministered the Gospel so as to carry out your fanatical political schemes; you have trodden upon every right human and divine, that you might elect here men who at the opening of the rebellion were against you; who are covered with all the sins of the rebellion; who practiced all the infamy which you charge daily upon those who will not vote with you. And yet if they will come in and accept your conditions and sustain your partisan organization, though they may be steeped in the deepest dye of rebellion and political apostasy, they are marked white by the simple process of an oath taken here that they have not done that which their lives and history prove they have done. But if it comes from this side, the speck may be so slight that even the microscopic power of the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. DAWES] cannot see it; yet they are ruled out by the decision of the majority.

I oppose these exceptional cases. The people should be permitted to understand that when they vote they elect their representatives here, and not be given to understand that from this day forth this House of Representatives shall be limited in number, except the men sent here shall vote with you, and belong to your political clique. Make that declaration like men; take the position boldly, and go to the people upon it, and see how many of you will return and rejoice in your system. But try this clandestine stab at the system of representation, allowing the people to vote, allowing their representative to come here, and offering him the test of a solemn oath, and when he is obliged to take it upon his conscience, you then vote him out as a traitor if he goes against you, or vote him in, though he be a traitor, if he go with you. Let that course continue. Let the people understand that that is the principle of that form of "republican government" which is to be given to Maryland under the demand of one of the members of the Judiciary Committee. Let it be understood that such is what you claim to be the "republican" principle of government, and that light which the Saul on the other side has not yet seen, but which it is asserted the Saul on this side has seen, will shine to your utter blindness; and the letting down of a sheet, with all sorts of things to feed you in your blindness and misery, will be the benign result of your own course.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] need not take any alarm. I do not propose to waste any lessons of Scripture upon him, for I do not desire to hurt his feelings at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I propose to occupy but a minute or two upon this question. I have ever felt, sir, that in acting upon questions of this character, touching the right of any gentleman to a seat upon this floor, every member ought to consider himself in the character of a judge, not of a partisan; and it is for the purpose of explaining very briefly the grounds on which I shall base my action upon the questions now presented that I have sought the floor.

What is the law of this House upon questions of this character, as established at a former day upon the application of certain gentlemen from the State of Kentucky to be sworn in as members of this House? We have a law requiring absolutely that every member before taking his seat shall swear, among other things, that he has at no time given countenance, aid, or encouragement to those who have been engaged in armed hostility to the Government of the United States.

The action of this House in the case of the Kentucky members established, if it established anything, that the oath prescribed by that law is not a mere appeal to the conscience of the person applying for a seat, but that it superadds a new and additional qualification; and that while the provisions of that test-oath continue in force, any person who has at any time given countenance, aid, or encouragement in any way to those engaged in armed hostility against the Government of the United States is absolutely disqualified from holding a seat upon this floor. It means that, or it means nothing but mere blind partisanship; and I will not do the majority upon the other side of the House the injustice of taking it for granted that, upon a high and solemn question touching the right of an entire delegation to admission upon this floor, they cast their votes under the influence of mere blind partisan feeling. It is to be presumed that they intended to establish some rule as the law of the House in regard to the right of persons applying for seats here who have, at any time and under any circumstances, given aid, countenance, or encouragement to those engaged in a war against the Government.

The precedent established is misstated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] doubtless through misapprehension. There was nothing in any of the charges against the delegation from Kentucky tending to show that they were at that time, or had been recently, guilty of any act showing hostility to the Government of the United States. In the case of one of the members who was excluded upon the report of the chairman of the Committee of Elections the only evidence was an unsworn statement from some obscure individual—a statement contained in a letter to Mr. McKee, that the writer thought certain facts tending to show hostility to the Government at the commencement of the war could be proved against said member. Yet upon that statement, and that alone, my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] introduced a resolution proposing that this member-elect and all the others from the State, with one exception, should be excluded from their seats and not permitted to take the oath of office until the case had been investigated by the Committee of Elections; and these gentlemen remain out of their seats up to this time; not, I repeat, upon any charge that any of that delegation were at that time engaged in any act of hostility to the Government, for there was no organized opposition to the Government of the United States at that time anywhere within the broad area of our country. It was simply upon the ground that this test-oath superadds a new and additional qualification, and that the House has the right to inquire whether the applicant in any particular case can conscientiously take the oath; and if in the judgment of the House he cannot, the House decided that, although he is willing to take it, he is absolutely disqualified for membership so long as that test-oath stands upon the statute-book. If this is not the rule established in the Kentucky cases, I wish to be informed what is and was the purpose of the majority on that occasion. I insist that no other rule can possibly be eliminated from that precedent.

I need not say that I disapproved of the action of the House at that time; but that precedent having been established, it is the law of this House, until this body takes the back track and establishes some new and different law; and it is not within the province of gentlemen on that side to decide otherwise at this time without frankly and honestly admitting that they have established a law by which they cannot stand, and that they ought to recede from it. When the majority of this House shall place their action upon that ground, I will, for that purpose, gladly vote and cooperate with them; for I do not believe that the precedent which has been established is a correct one, or that it can be maintained by an appeal to the Constitution, or any sound principle of policy. It has been well established by the authority of Story and Kent, and other commentators on the Constitution, and also by the action of both the Senate and the House of Representatives in numerous adjudicated cases, coming down to the accession of the present dominant party to power, that the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution are the only ones that can rightfully be required or imposed; that they are complete in themselves, and that no others can be superseded without an infringement or an amendment of the existing Constitution. No question of constitutional law is better settled than this, or on more irrefragable reasoning and authority. Such being my convictions, it is of course impossible for me to sanction or approve of the precedent established by this House in July last.

This qualification, prescribed by the Federal Constitution, and which of itself excludes all others, is the one to which this House ought most unquestionably to conform. But as the majority here have established a law for their own action, to be applied to political opponents, they owe it to themselves and to common decency to apply the same rule to their political adherents. That rule is, in the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] in the discussion of the case of the Kentucky members, when any member upon his own authority, or upon information he believes to be correct, charges that any gentleman applying for admission to a seat upon this floor had at any time been guilty of giving aid or encouragement to those engaged in the war against the Government of the United States, the case should be referred (without permitting the applicant to be sworn in) to the Committee of Elections to inquire into the fact, and if such charge be found to be sustained, he shall be absolutely disqualified from taking his seat as a member of the House. Now, applying that test to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Stokes, who held a seat in the last Congress—

Mr. DAWES. Take them one at a time.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not deny that during the rebellion, and subsequent to the writing of that Duncan letter, he did enter the Federal service and perform his duty well in the Federal Army. But that does not affect the question here presented. Can he conscientiously take the oath? Can he swear that he never, at any time, gave aid, countenance, or support to the armed rebels of the United States? He cannot so swear, for that letter would give the lie itself to any such oath. It is utterly impossible for him to do so, and it is clearly the duty of the House to step in as they did in the case of the Kentucky members, if the majority do not intend to abandon the precedent made in that case, and inquire into the fact whether this letter, admitted to be genuine, is not utterly inconsistent with the oath to be taken by every member.

So, sir, in the case of Mr. Butler. If the facts read from the Journal of the House of which he was a member are true, it is utterly impossible for him to take that oath without violating one of its most important clauses. If the House thinks it proper to step in to protect the consciences of the members from Kentucky, (rebel members, as they were called by honorable gentlemen here,) I ask whether it is not equally right to step in to protect the consciences of these good, super-loyal brethren from Tennessee.

Another observation and I have done. The whole State government of Tennessee as at present organized and administered is a disgrace to the American nation and to the civilization of the age. What ought to be the action of the House in regard to the entire delegation claiming to represent that State here I will not undertake to argue; but, sir, it is a notorious fact, and can be proved, if necessary, that Union soldiers, men who fought in the Union Army in Tennessee during the entire war, have been excluded and driven from the polls and not permitted to vote under the Brownlow usurpation because they would not put their hands upon their mouths and their mouths in the dust, and bow their knees suppliantly to the negro government established there and which lords it over the white freemen of that once noble and illustrious State. For that, and that alone, Union soldiers all over the State, I charge it here, and it can be proved if the House will order an investigation, have been driven or excluded from the polls simply and solely because they would not crook the pregnant hinges of the knee to the negro and the negro-worshipping oligarchy in that most outrageously misgoverned of all States in the civilized world.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that as a certain rule has been applied in the case of your political opponents, this House owes it to its own character, to its standing in the eyes of the civilized world, to common justice, and even common decency, to apply the same rule in all cases and especially to your political friends, until the rule is abrogated or abandoned.

Mr. Speaker, I shall only add to the remarks already made that as the Kentucky delegation are most wrongfully kept out of their seats, upon evidence nothing like as strong as this now presented against members from Tennessee, I shall vote to send the latter also to the Committee of Elections, and shall insist that the same rule be applied equally and alike to friend and foe. Fair play is a jewel, and ought to be practiced, sometimes, at least, even by this most illustrious and immaculate body.

Mr. DAWES. I propose to take each one of these cases by itself. I now call the previous question on the resolution, amendment, and substitute.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the first branch of the amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. PRUYN. Do I understand the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to cover the whole ground? It proposes, I understand, to admit all the members except one.

The SPEAKER. That is the amendment.

Mr. DAWES. If my substitute is adopted, then when any other member presents his credentials the same objection can be made, and the question can be voted upon by the House.

Mr. PRUYN. Then it is not a substitute for the whole.

The SPEAKER. It is a substitute for the whole?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. In case the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts shall be adopted, will it not then be in order to introduce a resolution like the one I have already offered when Mr. Stokes presents himself to the bar of the House?

The SPEAKER. With regard to any of the remaining gentlemen any member may make the point and it will be decided by the House.

Mr. DAWES. I so understand it: it is only proposing to meet one case at a time.

The SPEAKER. The substitute relates only to one gentleman, Mr. Butler; if that should be agreed to, the Chair would then call on the remaining gentlemen to be sworn in, when of course the motion could be made to postpone or refer.

The first branch of Mr. Brooks's amendment was read by the Clerk, to add to the original resolution as follows:

Resolved, That all the certificates of the gentlemen from Tennessee be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. Is it within my power to withdraw the call for a division and let it all be disposed of at once?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAWES. Then I do so.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the second branch of Mr. Brooks's amendment, to add to the original resolution the following:

Resolved, That the certificates of Messrs. Butler, Mullin, and Arnell, previous to their being sworn in, be referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask whether that is divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The rule is, that each branch of the proposition can stand by itself if the remainder is rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I ask to have read the affidavits or the statements upon which that motion is made.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent, as the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object to it.

Several MEMBERS. I object.

The question being taken on the second branch of the amendment, it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. DAWES, to strike out all after "Resolved" in the original resolution, and substitute therefor the following:

That the credentials of R. R. Butler for the first district of Tennessee be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that he be not sworn in pending the investigation.

The substitute was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the original amendment as amended by the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. PILE. I call the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MEMBERS SWORN IN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the delegation from California, to whom he understands there is no objection, are ready to be sworn in, and also the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] Two of these gentlemen belong to the majority and two to the minority, and if there is no objection the Chair will swear them in. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The members-elect from California, Mr. SAMUEL B. AXTELL, Mr. WILLIAM HIGBY, and Mr. JAMES A. JOHNSON, and the member-elect from the third congressional district of Illinois, Mr. E. B. WASHBURN, severally appeared, and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM TENNESSEE.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution as amended, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 28, not voting 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BEAMAN stated that Mr. Urson was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. LAFLIN stated that Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, was detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. LOGAN said: I rise to a question of order. I ask that the name of Mr. Brooks be called under the rule in relation to members who are present voting. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the ruling on the point made by the gentleman from Illinois by previous occupants of the chair has been that it cannot be made as a point of order until after the roll-call has been finished and the result announced. Attention can then be called to the fact that a gentleman has sat in his seat and declined to vote, and the question raised whether he has disobeyed the rules and is in contempt of the House.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I call his attention to it now.

Mr. BROOKS. It was a matter of inattention altogether; I was engaged in conversation; I vote "no." [Laughter.]

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the remaining members from Tennessee will now be sworn in.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the credentials of Hon. William B. Stokes be referred to the Committee of Elections, together with the letter written by him known as the Duncan letter, published in the Globe of July 27, 1866, in support of a charge of disloyalty against him, and that pending the investigation of the committee he be not sworn in as a member of this House.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that?

Mr. DAWES. I will do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the House in July last, in the Kentucky case, settled a practice in regard to these matters, as has been said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] That practice I understood to be this, and I thought it in conformity with parliamentary law and entirely within the scope of our constitutional power properly exercised; it was then decided that if any member in his place would rise and make a statement of facts impugning the loyalty of a member-elect, showing probable cause why, on account of his disloyalty, he ought not to be permitted to participate in our deliberations here, nor even be allowed to take the oath, it should be considered, not as conclusive in his case, but as raising a prima facie case and ground upon which his credentials might properly be referred to be reported upon. It was also held that if affidavits, although they might be ex parte, were produced showing facts of this or of kindred character, that should be held sufficient to require the member-elect to stand back and wait until his case could be inquired into and reported upon by the proper committee.

Well, sir, affecting to follow that rule, gentlemen upon the other side of the House to-day rise in the case of the Tennessee members who are called to the Clerk's desk to be sworn in and to take part in this House as members; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] makes an averment and supports it by some statements affirming that one of these members is in such probability disloyal that the matter ought to be referred to the committee and reported upon, and that his oath should not be accepted until such report comes in.

What then occurs? A vote is taken, and that member shows that he was trifling with the House by at first inadvertently not voting, and afterward by voting against his own resolution—a resolution based upon his own showing—that member proves to this House that his object was rather to set some mean little party trap, (which, however, has sprung and caught himself,) and not for the purpose of a grave inquiry into the right of a member to take his seat here according to the election returns and credentials which he presents.

Now, I want no more of this. If members will come here and present a showing by affidavits, as was done in the case of John D. Young, at the July sitting; if they will rise in their places and make a statement, based in like manner upon that credibility which ought to attach to a statement officially made by a member upon this floor, I am ready upon such statement to give proper reference to the case about which the statement is made. But if members come here and make such statements, they themselves believing that their resolutions ought not to pass, they themselves having no faith in the statements which they make, it is to my mind only proof that, instead of dealing with the grave question, one of the very gravest, whether a representative of the people is entitled to a place upon this floor, the whole intention, the whole object is to trifle with the House, and obtain, if they can, by some apparent inconsistency upon the part of some person in voting, some pitiful little party advantage.

Now, sir, no such advantage has been obtained here. I am glad to say that the gentlemen with whom I act, consistent with themselves, have adhered to the rule which they established in July last. I am glad to say that the Republican members of this House, giving a credit to the statement of a member upon this floor, which his own conduct proved it was not entitled to, have passed his resolution upon that statement and that showing of his, and in spite of his own opposition to it.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] offers a similar resolution now in the case of Colonel Stokes. He has voted against the other resolution, although it appeared to have his support. He will probably reserve to himself the privilege of voting against his own resolution if it is submitted to a vote of the House. And if that be the object—I am not entitled as yet to say it is—it will only be another exemplification of the kind of treatment which this House is to receive from gentlemen who come here, affecting, with crocodile tears, to apprehend that the people of this country are not going to be truly represented by loyal men in any of the States.

I shall not vote for the resolution in the case of Colonel Stokes, simply for the reason that it is based upon a letter written by him at the beginning of the rebellion containing avowals of opinion which I by no means approve, and which I think savor very strongly of disloyalty. I cannot vote for a resolution based upon a letter of that kind without also having in mind the fact that since that time there has been disclosed here to the House of Representatives, and there is a part of the public history of the country to be found, showing that this objection to Colonel Stokes cannot by inference be fairly presumed to apply to his present status, to his present condition of mind, to his present determination and object and act toward the Government of this country. There is proof in the history of the country, which has been made known here to this House, that since that time Colonel Stokes has fought loyally upon the side of the Union, and proved his loyalty where many other gentlemen have not so distinctly entitled themselves to have it recognized—upon the battle-field.

Knowing this, I do not ask to have any inquiry in the case of Colonel Stokes, and therefore I shall not vote in favor of the resolution. Not knowing anything of this kind so clearly in the case of Mr. Butler, I was willing that in his case there should be a reference, an examination, and a report, which will enable him, as I believe from what I hear outside, to come out triumphantly vindicated from the charge that has been made against him.

Mr. MORGAN. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask my colleague whether the fact that Colonel Stokes has fought gallantly under the Union flag will enable him to take the test-oath?

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not the conscience-keeper of Colonel Stokes. That is a matter for him to settle. I do not know that the letter written by him, so far as I remember its contents, is in any way inconsistent with that oath. I have not the letter before me now. I believe, however, it is a declaration of certain sentiments which I myself, according to my standard, regarded at the time and regard now as inimical to the Government of the United States; but it did not constitute any act of aid or comfort actually given to the enemy.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow one portion of the oath to be read?

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; we are all familiar with it. I understand what constitutes the sin of Colonel Stokes in the view of gentlemen on the other side. It is not that he was disloyal at the beginning of the rebellion, but that he fought for the Union afterward. It is for this reason that he is not agreeable to some gentlemen who are opposing his admission to a seat upon this floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Will my colleague yield to me a moment further?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. I merely wish to remark, further, in order that my own position may not be misunderstood, that I am opposed to the resolution to refer the case of Colonel Stokes to the Committee of Elections. I addressed the inquiry a moment ago to my colleague, in order to bring to his attention and that of the House the analogy between the position now occupied by Colonel Stokes and the position of thousands of our fellow-citizens in the southern States whose misfortune and whose fault it was to go into the rebellion, but who have since given every evidence of repentance for having done so.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand that perfectly well; and in those wise acts of reconstruction which we have passed and mean to carry out, it will be found that we have provided for just such cases, and that where there is penitence, where there is proof of subsequent good conduct, any one who, by reason of past disloyalty, is disabled or disqualified from participating in the Government may, upon appeal to Congress, be relieved from that disability; and without such a provision, the reconstruction acts would, I think, have been very defective indeed. Such a provision was also embraced in the constitutional amendment which was submitted to the people of the southern States.

But all this is aside from the present question. I am not in any way criticising the position of my colleague, [Mr. MORGAN.] I believe he has made none of these motions and none of these statements. He probably voted in July as he will vote or has voted to-day. But my allusion is, first, to the fact that we have been called upon to act on a statement deemed to be a sufficient foundation for a resolution by a gentleman who has afterward disavowed, as it were, his own statement by voting against his own resolution, thus showing that he was not quite so zealous in defending the Constitution and the rightful representation of the people as he would have appeared to be if we had not followed him through the whole course of his record upon this matter. And I refer next to the particular resolution now before us, first, to say that I hope it is not a case of the same kind, and in the next place, to say that, so far as the facts have been disclosed to this House and to the country, there is reason enough, in my judgment, for not referring the case of Colonel Stokes to the Committee of Elections; and, therefore, though I voted for the former resolution, I hold that I shall be entirely consistent in voting against this.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only one word. I shall vote against this resolution for the same reasons which induced me to vote in that direction when the members from Kentucky presented themselves and asked to be sworn in, and I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to the position that the majority on that side of the House occupy in reference to the delegations of the two States of Kentucky and Tennessee. At the last session of Congress the members from Kentucky presented themselves here. They were publicly known as being adherents of this side of the House, and on clap-traps made up from statements since proved to be false, they were sent to the Committee of Elections, seven of them, and to this hour they have not the right which their people delegated to them, of representing their State upon this floor. This, too, of a State which in no manner voted itself out of the Union, and which stood from the beginning to the end as a loyal State. Let me call the attention of the House and the country to the manner in which they treat the representatives to-day from Tennessee who hold their own sentiments. One of them who now presents himself aided the State of Tennessee in going out of the Union. If there be any demagogism, as charged by gentlemen upon the other side, it rests alone with them. Why is the State of Tennessee to have its delegation admitted here now when charges are made against the members from that State similar to those made against the members from Kentucky and which have kept them out? Why send the credentials of one to the Committee of Elections and not the others? Let gentlemen on the other side reconcile the inconsistency of their action. If there be demagogism, then it is with them and not with us.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. DAWES. This has taken up time enough, I think, with entire respect to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PRUYN. It is only to ask a question.

Mr. DAWES. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in view of the statement he made when upon the floor of this House a few moments ago, whether, in view of the events occurring at the South during a few months past, and the events which have occurred at the North more recently, the military committee have arrived at the conclusion that it is necessary at this session to make any amendments to the reconstruction act? I ask this because of the statement he made when upon the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I now resume the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will, I hope, allow me to reply to the question put to me so courteously.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. The question is put so gravely and so courteously, as is always the habit of the gentleman from New York, I must in the same temper reply to him. We have a Committee on Reconstruction, ordinarily known as the committee of fifteen, to whom this subject has been referred.

A MEMBER. It is now the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCHENCK. We have now referred these subjects to the Committee on the Judiciary. We had a committee of fifteen before, but under no circumstances has this class of cases ever been referred by this House to the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman is not aware, perhaps, that the business of the military committee is necessarily confined to those things which relate to the Army and its government, and whatever affects its interest in any way.

Mr. PRUYN. I am quite aware of that; but the gentleman when up made a remark which justified me in asking whether the committee with which he is connected had not come to that conclusion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not think I said anything of the kind.

Mr. DAWES. The case of the gentlemen from Tennessee is before the House. The letter referred to has already been before us. We all know about the facts, and I do not see the necessity of referring it to the committee. We have heard all the testimony there is to substantiate the charge, and there is no need for any further investigation. The House can pass upon it as well to-day as at any other time, and I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. ELDRIDGE's resolution was disagreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of privilege in the case of Colonel Mullins. As it seems to be required on the other side that in order to make a charge some affidavit or some specific statement, signed by somebody, should be presented, I ask the Clerk to read the paper which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. A resolution must first be offered before any papers can be read.

Mr. BROOKS. I then offer the following resolution, understanding it to be necessary:

Resolved, That the certificate of Mr. Mullins be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that he be not sworn in pending the investigation.

The Clerk read, as follows:

I am well acquainted with Colonel James Mullins, of Bedford county, Tennessee. I have known him from my boyhood, and I now make this statement:

In the year 1861—I forget the day and month—I heard Colonel Mullins make a speech in Bedford county, Tennessee. The speech was made at a spring known as "Moore's" Spring, some three or four miles from Shelbyville, Tennessee. The speech was made for the purpose of urging the young men of that locality to join a rebel company then being made up by one James A. Moore of said State and county. In the speech Colonel Mullins said that he wanted to see all the young men go out and fight for their homes and firesides; that he was an old man and not able to do much fighting, but that he would make meat and bread for others to live on while they fought, and that whenever it became essential he too would go into the rebel army. In fact, the entire speech was an "out and out" rebel speech, and in entire accord with the speeches being then made throughout Tennessee by such men as Governor Harris and other rebel leaders.

In one or two days after hearing this speech, I met Colonel Mullins in Shelbyville, Tennessee, and rebuked him for the speech referred to. He replied that half of the North and all of the South had gone with the rebellion, and that he thought it the duty of every southern man to take side with the South in the struggle. I told him if he thought so he could go that way, but as for myself I should "paddle my own canoe."

At the conclusion of the speech referred to, I urged the young men to pay no attention to what Mullins had said, and not to go into the rebel army. A great many took my advice, and remained firm Union men, many of them subsequently becoming Union soldiers.

At the time Colonel Mullins made this speech I regarded him as a "rebel," and I am sure his language would have sustained such a belief.

I have been a loyal man from the beginning. On the 17th day of April, 1862, I enlisted as a Union soldier. I was subsequently elected a lieutenant in the first Tennessee United States troops, known as the guard of Governor Andrew Johnson, then military Governor of Tennessee.

I am now a first lieutenant in the twelfth United States infantry, regular Army.

The Colonel Mullins referred to is now the Congressman-elect from the fourth congressional district of Tennessee.

A. M. TROUGER.

First Lieutenant Twelfth United States Infantry.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 12, 1867.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, some members on the other side of the House seem to be in a very ill humor. They are very much offended with me for presenting certificates, affidavits, and documents such as I have submitted to the House this day. They are in ill humor and I am in good humor. Now both of us have reasons for our respective humors. The country has exhibited the very best of reasons for our being pleased on this side of the House, and the best reasons for their being displeased on the other side; and if I have given them their own medicine under the bad Kentucky precedent which they have established, and am not disposed to take their medicine, they should not be angry and should not rail at me. It is not a patent of my own manufacture; I am not the Brandereth that invented it. They are the doctors in the Kentucky case; they have manufactured their own pills, and if I make them take them they should make the best of it, and not rail and howl at me as certain gentlemen on the other side have done.

The honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] though not in a very bad humor, attacks the newspapers. The only difference between that gentleman and myself is, at the opening of the war he was a terrible copperhead, while I was a terrible Union man, and now I am a terrible copperhead while he is a terrible disunion man—a terrible Jacobin. That is the only difference. If I were to read his speeches they would be found quite as bad as anything that ever appeared in any newspaper with which I had any connection. While most of his are on the wrong side, mine are on the right side.

Now, there should be no ill humor upon this subject. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] in the course of the debate, threatened me with the censure of the House if I failed to maintain my charges against Mr. Butler, and in the course of the discussion he talked of my expulsion. That is the last thing I expected to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Contested Elections, who maneuvered to turn me out of this House upon testimony which, if he knew anything, he knew to be infamous, and which my constituents rebuked by sending me back here by over six thousand majority. I said a little while ago that if he had any disposition to try that experiment of expulsion again I would come back here with ten thousand majority; but I reckon I could come back then with nearer fifteen or twenty thousand. I have a constituency in the rear, a joyful, gleeful constituency, who will maintain me in my rights on the floor of this House, in decorum and order, to examine into the case of others that present themselves here for admission.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] also paid me his respects. He is never a very amiable man, permit me to say; he has not that suavity which as a student of Chesterfield he might do well to cultivate. And he reminds me more of a character in one of the novels of the day, Snarleyow I think it is, than of any other man I ever met with. The character in the novel is descriptive of that which he so often exhibits on the floor of the House. He indulges in fierce censures and comments which may be parliamentary and which may not be; he indulges in such phrases as "crocodile tears," "little and mean," &c. All this is in character with the honorable gentleman from Ohio. He is the regular scold of this House, and he scolds the other side of the House a great deal oftener than he scolds this side, and if they are able to endure his scolding I am quite sure that I can.

But he says that I have voted against the resolution excluding Mr. Butler after I have exhibited rebel records which ought to exclude him, and I am censured for inconsistency. First let us look at the resolution as it prevailed. There is no more reason why Mr. Butler should be excluded from the floor of the House than that two more of the same delegation should be excluded whose cases I have stated. Why pass that partial resolution? I was not the father of that substitute. I was not obliged to adopt the child of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] It was no creation of mine, but a substitute adopted by the other side of the House.

But I tell honorable gentlemen, all of them upon the other side of the House, I do not believe in the precedent in the Kentucky case. I do not believe it will hold water or stand examination. I consider it the most dangerous precedent ever established in this House, that a majority here, on the presentation of credentials, upon mere outside ex parte affidavits, upon mere declarations from any quarter, without examination by a committee, should do as this House has done, from July to the last of November, exclude the Kentucky members. But that was the precedent established by the authority of the House; that is the common law of the House, and how a lawyer can rise on the other side and not expect to be bound by the common law of the House, though he may not now approve that common law, is more than I can comprehend. It is a precedent binding upon the other side of the House, but not upon this, because we all voted against it, and my only object was to bring to them their own precedent, their own medicine, and to make them take it. But instead of their being in good humor, I am railed at by three gentlemen on the other side for pursuing a course which is proper and parliamentary.

Now, sir, I regret this kind of debate, and it is seldom I am called on to indulge in it, but on principle I defend myself for the course I have taken. Whenever we on this side have the power, as we soon shall have—the dawn breaketh not only in the East, but everywhere, and the next House will be ours—when that day comes, we will reverse this precedent and overthrow it. It is your medicine, and not binding on us in any sense whatever; and when I present it to you, I resort to a parliamentary course which is justified by innumerable precedents. So much for that.

Now, perhaps, I owe an apology before I sit down to the honorable gentleman from the Nashville district of Tennessee, Mr. Trimble. I was informed by a letter from Memphis that he voted for the ordinance of secession of Tennessee. The letter was from a gentleman there whom I did not know personally. I have written back to know what is his character, but I have received no answer. I carefully stated in the remarks which I made before that it was sufficient for me that the honorable gentleman from the Nashville district should disclaim such a vote and I would not involve him in my resolution. It is sufficient to me to have the word of a Union man or a rebel; whatever he may have been, it is enough for him to have said he did not vote for secession for me to accept his word in good faith. If I have put him wrong before the country I owe him an apology, and I cheerfully take back any remarks I may have made. That is all I have to say upon that point.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman now state what I asked him to state?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the gentleman last up that he is not yet a member of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I presume that, under the substitute adopted by the other side of the House, the gentleman will, in a very few minutes, have an opportunity to state what he desires in order.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, a few words only.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I thought the gentleman said, "That is all I have to say."

Mr. BROOKS. On that point.

Mr. DAWES. I was surprised at that remark.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman is surprised at a great many remarks, and few members have more occasion to surprise the House than he has. I do not know why he indulges in this personal course of remarks toward me all the while, except that once he did a mean thing toward me, and feels ashamed of it all the time, and wishes to justify it in some way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels under the necessity of calling the gentleman to order. His remarks certainly are not parliamentary.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg pardon of the Chair; they are not parliamentary. I hope the Chair will keep us all in order, for we need it very often.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not wish to interrupt gentlemen speaking by calling them to order, except when he deems it his imperative duty to do so.

Mr. CHANLER. I would inquire to what language of my colleague [Mr. BROOKS] the Chair referred when he called him to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] is entitled to the floor, and will proceed in order.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to ask the Chair what language he referred to—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] made no point at the time.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to ask—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the gentleman. The language to which the Chair excepted was this: that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] "had done a mean thing" toward the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] That language was not parliamentary. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] will now proceed in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I am aware that the introduction of the word "mean" was not parliamentary. But I should not have used it if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] had not used it in reference to me. "Mean" and "little" were the adjectives he applied to me. I do not suppose the Speaker heard him, in the confusion here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear those words used in reference to the gentleman, or he would have checked the gentleman using them. The Chair thinks the remark of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was general, and not with reference to any particular gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. If I recollect aright, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] applied the remark particularly to me.

The SPEAKER. If so, it was not in order.

Mr. BROOKS. Very well; I will not make any further remarks at present.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] has taken a great deal of the time of the House in attempting to explain his position—to explain why he made a charge upon the floor of this House against a member-elect which he had no faith in himself. The gentleman knows better than anybody else when his position needs explanation, and for that reason he takes more time than anybody else in explaining his position. The gentleman has never done "harping upon his daughter." He will never forgive this House for once thwarting him in attempting to hold a seat here on this floor upon dead men's votes.

That I suppose is the reason why, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] said some hard things toward him, he got up and called me "mean." [Laughter.]

But he says that when I said to the House if any gentleman, acting upon his responsibility here as a member of this House, should so far forget his position as to be actuated by political malignity and make a false charge of disloyalty against any member elected here, and thereby exclude him from his seat, such member ought to be censured or expelled from this House; he thereupon gets up and says I say he himself should be expelled from this House. Very well; the gentleman makes his own comment upon that remark. He takes the coat home to himself, without any application from me. And he rounds off this application to himself by announcing to the House that if he should be expelled he would be sent back he thinks by ten thousand majority. He knows better than I do how much time they have in New York to count votes. I have no doubt, if they have time enough to count the votes in New York, the majority would be ten or fifteen thousand, just according to the facility and skill in counting.

I admit the gentleman's proposition. I know very well that if there is time there will be majority enough counted up for him if he should be expelled. I am glad to know that the gentleman himself feels that if, actuated by political malignity, he should make in this House a charge which he did not himself believe to be true, he would be a proper subject for such a vote of the House as I have indicated. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire, before this debate closes, to make a suggestion or two upon what is certainly a very important question, in regard to the organization of this House. The question that we are really dealing with now is the question whether the House can rightly disregard the requirement of the law prescribing the test oath; disregard it, I mean, to the extent of omitting a careful and thorough investigation, after a suggestion in good faith that any particular individual presenting himself as a member ought not to be allowed to take the oath; or whether, on the other hand, the House may do that to which my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] alluded—leave it to every member-elect to decide according to his own conscience whether he can take the oath or not.

Now, upon this question there are just two remarks which I wish to make. In the first place I shall neither dispute nor assent to the proposition that the House may rightly disregard the requirement of the act prescribing the test oath—may let down its standard and fix a lower one. Yet, while I do not discuss that question as a legal one under the constitutional provision that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," I do say, and to this proposition I ask the attention of my fellow-members, that we shall be doing a most dangerous thing if for any party or any side of this House we let down the high and important requirements of the law prescribing that test-oath. I assent to what was said by some of our friends on the other side, that there is danger that, in our admiration of such gentlemen as some of those who are now offering to be sworn in, on account of their "works meet for repentance," we may fall into the error of going back upon one of the best and wholesomest records that has been made since this terrible rebellion cursed our land. Let us not do it, my fellow-members. Let us, in the utmost good faith, hold up the standard where the law has fixed it, and require that vigilance shall be brought to bear to see that none shall be sworn in as members who cannot take that test-oath truthfully.

I do not assent to the proposition of my colleague from the Dayton district, [Mr. SCHENCK.] If I understood him aright, he said, in answer to a question of my other colleague, [Mr. MORGAN,] that it is left to the member's own conscience to determine whether he can take the test-oath.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. I did not suppose it possible for any one to misunderstand my proposition, stated in reply to the question of my colleague, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I am very glad if I have misunderstood my colleague.

Mr. SCHENCK. The first question before the House I had spoken upon. That was as to the present status, as made apparent by any showing to the House, of the member-elect asking to be sworn in, the object being to determine the question whether he should be permitted to come forward and take the oath. In reference to this question I said that when there is some showing of apparent disloyalty, while on the other hand there is in the possession of the House knowledge which explains all that away, it is no reason for not permitting the member-elect to present himself to take the oath. Then my colleague [Mr. MORGAN] inquired of me whether I thought Colonel Stokes could take the oath consistently with that letter previously written by him. My reply was, that I was not the conscience-keeper of Colonel Stokes; that it would depend upon his own judgment whether he could take the oath or not.

There I stopped. I went no further; and now my colleague compels me, in order that I may not be misunderstood, to go a little further on this point. I think we may make a preliminary examination on a proper showing as to whether a member is willing to come forward and take the oath. After he has come forward and is taking the oath, then it is for him upon his conscience whether what he swears to is true or not. If he swears to that which is subsequently shown to be manifestly untrue, then he is to be dealt with for what he has done.

Now, in reference to the case of Judge PATERSON, I do not hesitate to say what my opinions would have been. He was anxious to take the oath, and did take it, that he had never held office in any way under the authority of the confederate government. I would have permitted him to take that oath, and if I had been a Senator I would the next moment have moved to expel him for manifest perjury committed in the presence of the Senate.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I am glad that my colleague is not where I supposed he was, for he is a clear-headed lawyer as well as a sound statesman.

I wish to add only a suggestion or two to what I have already said. Let me say that I know nothing which could be more pernicious to the matter now under consideration than to adopt the suggestion of my colleague to permit the member claiming to be elected to take the oath, though that oath might be known to the House not to be taken in good faith, and to rely upon the power of expulsion as a punishment. It would defeat the important operation of the test-law so far as regards the organization of the two Houses of Congress. The position this House has already taken, and the position we are urged upon the other side to adhere to, is the true and only position we can take, to wit: we must exercise vigilance on the part of the House; and, as my friend sitting beside me says, the conscience of the House must be brought to bear on the question whether the oath shall be administered or not. When that is done, we secure ourselves against the very mischief the test-oath was designed to prevent. After a man has taken the oath, and is in, under the ruling, he may vote in his own case, and it will take a two-third vote to expel him.

No, sir; let us to-day do what we have done hitherto and remain firm and steadfast at the standard fixed by law. Let us not let it be departed from. If the gentleman whose case is now under consideration is objected to upon evidence that excites fair and reasonable suspicion of the House that inquiry is proper, in the name of the country let us have inquiry. If I understood the paper read by the gentleman from New York, he charges, and doubtless in good faith, disloyalty against this man. Let us have an investigation, for I tell you this preliminary investigation is to be of incalculable value, perhaps of vital value in future organizations of the several branches of Congress. I regret most heartily, as I expressed it at the time, the bad precedent set up by the Senate in the case alluded to, and I trust it will never be again repeated.

Mr. DAWES. I yield now for a few moments to my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER,] and will then call for the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER. Having voted for the reference in the case in the last resolution, although if left untrammelled by a former precedent I should have voted against it, I desire to call the attention of the House to what seems to me a vital distinction between the Kentucky case as presented at the last session and the case as now presented by the member from New York. In the Kentucky case the House settled the principle that if a member upon his responsibility or upon sworn testimony—necessarily ex parte, because no hearing had then been had—would charge a member-elect about to be sworn in with present disloyalty—mark, sir, present disloyalty—the House upon that showing would refer the case to the Committee of Elections. The case at bar, however, is a very different one. The gentleman from New York, admitting that he will not make any objection upon his own responsibility, asks the House to refer the question—upon what? Upon any sworn testimony? Oh, no; but he sends to your table to be read a letter from some person, whom we know not, not verified by oath; simply an apparent exhibition of spleen and political dislike. The gentleman from New York fails to say to the House that he will vote for this reference, or that he believes in the present disloyalty of the gentleman at the bar. He gives us nothing upon his responsibility; he produces no evidence; therefore the case is presented in a very different light.

But suppose that letter were sworn to. It by no means meets the precedent, because in the Kentucky case there was testimony of present disloyalty. All this paper goes to show is that a questionable speech was made in 1861, leaving six years, during which the gentleman may have entirely repented of any disloyal sentiment he may have entertained.

In the way the gentleman from New York presents his question, one would suppose he did not believe it possible for a member of this House or anybody else to change his political views. It would hardly seem possible that a man who for years was a leader of the Know-Nothing party, persecuting Irishmen, and holding that every Irish vote was improper and anti-American, would, after a few years, be found boasting in the House of Representatives by what a majority of Irish votes he could be returned in case he should be expelled for misconduct. Now, I believe in repentance, and I am very glad that gentlemen who have heretofore been identified with the dark-lantern anti-Catholic church-burning orphan-asylum-burning party shall change round and be the leaders of the cohorts of Irishmen, if they can find any Irishmen so deluded as to follow their leadership. That is one of those things which should not disqualify them from a seat on this floor, provided their repentance is genuine.

Now, I trust the House will call upon the gentleman in all fairness to say, can you vouch for the correctness of that letter? A portion of it I see has been erased. Is there any evidence in his possession upon which he can ask us to deprive a gentleman of his position as a representative of the people, except this semi-anonymous, unvouched-for letter? No man knows from whence it comes. We find it dated in Washington, on the 12th of November, 1867, apparently got up for this purpose. By whom?

when? where? how? Who vouches for it? We are asked to have this case investigated simply upon an apparently anonymous charge as to what a man said in a speech six years and more ago. Therefore it is not within the precedent of the Kentucky case.

I agree to every word that has been said by my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] as to the necessity of holding up this test-oath as the shield of the liberty of the people, and the very bulwark by which the purity of the House as to loyalty is to be protected. But there is nothing in that letter which interferes with the test-oath. The man who made that speech may well swear that he never voted to give aid or comfort to the enemies of the United States, for the speech as there reported, if true, was not of a character to afford aid or comfort to anybody. That kind of talk never did any harm except to the person using it. It harmed no loyal man, much less the country. Therefore I think a man could easily make such a speech and afterward say he gave no aid to the enemies of the country.

But the proposition to which I wished to call attention is this: we are not to be accused of inconsistency in voting in any of these members when the gentlemen who oppose their admission know no reason why they should be excluded, but propose to make some political legerdemain out of it. They want to administer a pill, as they say. Now, sir, we are not here to administer medicine to one side or the other. We are here to deal with grave matters of legislation, and the standard of the House is entirely lowered when gentlemen rise in their places and apparently standing on the dignity of their situation make assertions and asseverations against honorable men elected to this House, and then when they get through say, "Oh, I did not do that at all from any consideration of right or with the design of instructing the House, but simply for the purpose of seeing if I could catch somebody in inconsistency." We are not here for traps and catches. We are here for grave matters of legislation.

Let me say, further, that I speak in the utmost good humor. Do not let anybody accuse me of feeling otherwise than well. I am very glad some members are encouraged; they needed it. I hope they will have courage enough to meet their opponents fairly and above board. I am willing that the people shall judge of the declaration of the honorable member from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who has declared in effect here that he does not think disloyalty, if proved, is a disqualification for this House. That is his declaration in substance and effect. I take issue with him. I think disloyalty proved, present disloyalty, and, under the test-oath, past disloyal acts tending to aid the enemies of the country, a reason for exclusion. I trust it ever will be; and I shall never lose my good temper until it is decided by the House that it is not a good reason for excluding any member now or hereafter.

Mr. DAWES. It is due to the member from Tennessee whose credentials are now before the House, Mr. Mullins, and who has no opportunity to speak for himself, that I should speak for him and at his request to this extent, to enter his complete and full personal denial of all the matters alleged in the letter which has been submitted to the House. The letter is utterly unvouched for by anybody. The gentleman is a stranger to me; but I make this statement for him because he is unable to speak in his own defense, and it is proper that he should have it submitted to the House before the vote is taken. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to ask if that letter may be considered—

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the operation of the previous question, and no debate is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I merely wish to ask the question of the Chair, if the letter which was read—the original letter—is not in the possession of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is in the possession of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust the Clerk will retain it; we may want it.

The question was then taken; and the resolution was disagreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The members-elect from Tennessee, with the exception of Mr. Butler, namely, Messrs. MAYNARD, STOKES, MULLINS, TRIMBLE, ARNELL, HAWKINS, and NUNN, then appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are three Delegates from Territories present.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the motion.

DELEGATE FROM NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has had two papers sent to him in relation to the representation of the Territory of New Mexico, one from the Governor and one from the Secretary of the Territory. The Clerk will first read the paper sent by the Governor.

The Clerk read, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, TERRITORY OF NEW MEXICO,
SANTA FE, September 20, 1867.

Sir: This certifies that under the organic act and laws of the Territory of New Mexico there was held a general election on the second day of September, A. D. 1867, the same being the first Monday of said month, within the Territory of New Mexico, for Delegate to the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and that at said election Charles P. Clevier received a majority of the votes cast for said office.

Now, therefore, I, Robert B. Mitchell, Governor of said Territory, do hereby declare Charles P. Clevier to have been elected at said election to said office of Delegate to the Congress of the United States.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the Territory of New Mexico, the day and year aforesaid.

ROBERT B. MITCHELL,
Governor Territory of New Mexico.

By the Governor:

H. H. HEATH, Secretary New Mexico.

To the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. The Secretary of the Territory has furnished to the Speaker of the House of Representatives a statement that he was forced by the Governor to attest this certificate. The Clerk will read his communication.

The Clerk read, as follows:

OFFICE SECRETARY OF THE TERRITORY,
SANTA FE, NEW MEXICO, October 1, 1867.

Sir: At an election held in this Territory on the 3d day of September, A. D. 1867, for a Delegate to the Fortieth Congress, there were cast, as returned, 17,685 votes, as follows:

For J. Francisco Chaves, 8,794; for Charles P. Clevier, 8,891, such returns consequently showing said Clevier to have 97 majority.

But it is believed that J. Francisco Chaves was legally elected, and for the following reasons:

Fraud in the precinct of Santa Clara, in the county of Mora, of 209 votes—the same precinct at its first election last spring casting but about 40 votes.

Fraud in the La Junta or Fort Union precinct, where the polls were carried too near the Government military reservation of Fort Union, and where the men in the quartermaster's department and teamsters voted, irrespective of citizenship or conformity to the laws of this Territory. This precinct polled, as returned, 643 votes—of which 638 were for C. P. Clevier, and 5 for J. Francisco Chaves. In the first precinct named the return shows 190 for C. P. Clevier, and 19 for J. Francisco Chaves.

For fraud in the sixteenth precinct of the county of Rio Arriba, where, as the evidence shows, that but 85 votes were polled in all, 464 votes are returned as having been cast; 452 of which are returned as for C. P. Clevier, and 12 for J. Francisco Chaves.

These frauds, it is confidently believed, are substantiated by proof, which will be furnished herewith.

By section thirty-three of the election laws of this Territory it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Territory to give the certificate of election to the Delegate-elect. The Governor has assumed that duty, and it is held that the certificate given by that functionary to C. P. Clevier has no validity in law, and is consequently invalid. The seal and signature of the undersigned, as affixed to said certificate, were so affixed under written protest, hereto attached.

The conclusion, therefore, at which the undersigned has arrived is, that the votes of the three precincts above named, as returned, are false and fraudulent, and should be discarded; and that beings so discarded, Colonel J. Francisco Chaves is legally elected Delegate to the Fortieth Congress by a majority of not less than one thousand one hundred and three votes.

With great respect your obedient servant,

H. H. HEATH,

Secretary Territory New Mexico.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

And to the above I have hereto affixed my hand, and set the seal of the Territory, this 1st day of October, A. D. 1867.

H. H. HEATH,

Secretary New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. The House understands the purport of the documents. The additional papers are to substantiate the statement made.

Mr. DAWES. I will make a motion, in accordance with the precedent adopted in the Colorado case last spring, in which I have no doubt both of these gentlemen will acquiesce. But whether they do or not, I believe it to be right. I move that both of these papers in reference to the seats of Delegates from New Mexico be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that neither claimant be sworn in until the committee have reported.

The motion of Mr. DAWES was agreed to, and the papers referred accordingly.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the papers were referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALVAN FLANDERS, Delegate-elect from the Territory of Washington, and JAMES M. Cavanaugh, Delegate-elect from the Territory of Montana, then came forward and took the required oath of office.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is resuming the consideration of the business pending at the time of the adjournment on the 20th of July last, being in relation to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary upon the subject of the impeachment of the President.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to state to the House, in regard to that matter, that the report of the committee is not yet completed, but will be completed by Monday night, at which time the committee design to submit to the House the report of the committee, with the evidence and views of the minority. In making this statement I desire to say to the House that I am representing every member of the committee. It is the unanimous request of the committee that they be allowed until Monday next to make their report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa states that the Committee on the Judiciary will not be able to present their report before next Monday. The order of the House, made on the 20th of July last, was that the committee should report forthwith, and that order would operate now, this being the next legislative day. If there is no objection the execution of the order will be postponed till next Monday, after the morning hour.

There was no objection.

IMPEACHMENT OF MINISTER ADAMS.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which I believe involves a question of privilege, and if so I desire to make some remarks upon the subject, either this afternoon or at some other proper time.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Whereas Charles Francis Adams, United States Minister to Great Britain, has been charged with neglect of duty toward American citizens in England and Ireland by failing to secure their rights as such citizens; Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the foregoing charge and to report thereon forthwith, to the end that, if the charge be true, articles of impeachment against said Charles Francis Adams may be presented by this House to the Senate of the United States; that the President of the United States be requested to telegraph to the said Charles Francis Adams immediately, to demand his passports and to return home; that the Secretary of State be instructed to communicate to this House all correspondence to and from the Department for the two years last past on the arrest, imprisonment, trial, or conviction of any American citizen, or any person claiming to be such, in Great Britain and Ireland, without reference to its public effect, to be considered, if need be, in secret session of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that this resolution is a question of privilege, as it proposes the impeachment of an officer of the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am ready to make some remarks upon this question; but if, at this hour, the House desires to adjourn, I shall not insist upon going on at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there was a question of privilege pending when the House took its recess on the 20th of July, and probably that had better be disposed of before the House enters on the consideration of another question of privilege.

Mr. ROBINSON. Allow me to say, in regard to this question of privilege, that two men, who, as I understand, would never have been sentenced if Minister Adams had done his duty, are to be hanged to-morrow or next day. By moving in this matter now we might arrest that proceeding. I simply ask that I may be heard upon the general subject at the earliest time the rules will allow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order—that one question of privilege is already before the House, and until that is disposed of another cannot be entertained.

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege pending when the House took its recess must, if it be insisted upon, be decided before this.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist on it.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege pending at the taking of the recess on the last legislative day was upon the following resolution, which was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Covode,] and on which he moved to suspend the rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted, with their testimony in the matter of impeachment of the President, to present and have printed their report thereon, and also the views of the minority of the committee or of any member or members thereof.

Upon the motion to suspend the rules the yeas and nays were ordered. No quorum having voted, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] moved to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered. That was the pending question when the House took a recess. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I rise to a question of order. Did not the House a moment ago, at the request of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. Wilson, of Iowa,] postpone this whole matter until next Monday?

The SPEAKER. It postponed the execution of the imperative order that the committee should report forthwith, which would mean to-day, this being the next legislative day after the making of the order. But the resolution is still pending. Some action must be taken in regard to it as it is the unfinished business.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it not be in order to move the postponement of this subject until next Monday?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] is entitled to the floor.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania. My colleague [Mr. COVODE] yields to me, that I may ask leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. SCOTFIELD] for a few days, he being called away by sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, indefinite leave of absence will be granted.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COVODE] yield to me that I may make a motion for an adjournment till Monday next?

Mr. COVODE. I yield for that motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move, then, that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope not. I trust to be granted a hearing to-morrow.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, nays 45.

Mr. BINGHAM demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House agreed that when it adjourns to-day it shall adjourn to meet on Monday next.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER stated that on Monday morning, after the morning hour, he would announce the standing committees unless the House should decide to postpone it until the meeting of the regular session in December next.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. PAINE presented papers in the contested-election case of the second congressional district of Kentucky; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. KELLEY presented documentary testimony in the contested-election case of the fourth congressional district of Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

TENNESSEE CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE, ETC.

The SPEAKER presented papers in the contested-election case of the first congressional district of Tennessee; also in the Colorado case of Hunt vs. Chilcott; and also in the Kentucky case of Samuel McKee vs. John D. Young; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

MISSOURI CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. KERR presented papers in the Missouri contested-election case of Switzer vs. George W. Anderson; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

REDUCTION OF THE CURRENCY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to prohibit the further reduction of the currency; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means when appointed.

EFFECT OF IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill declaring the effect of an impeachment by the House of Representatives of the President, Vice President, or any civil officer of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made pending the consideration of another question.

SPECIAL AGENTS OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to report to this House the number of persons employed in his Department during the present fiscal year as special agents and detectives, their names, the compensation paid to each, and the locality in which they have been employed, and what amounts they have charged for their expenses.

REPEAL OF THE TAX ON COTTON.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed, be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the tax on cotton.

WHISKY FRAUDS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring), That the joint select Committee on Retrenchment be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and investigate the alleged whisky frauds in the city of New York; the causes which led to the detailing of a deputy commissioner of internal revenue for duty in New York city and to the organization of the so-called Metropolitan Board of Internal Revenue; the efficiency or non-efficiency of said board and the causes thereof; the manner in which the several officers constituting said board discharged their duties respectively in the collection of the internal revenue tax, and whether any of such officers or agents have been guilty of fraud, corruption, or neglect of duty in office; that said committee report the result of such investigation, together with the testimony by them taken, to Congress; and that for such purpose the said committee shall have and possess all powers heretofore granted them for other purposes.

Mr. SPALDING. I object; it is too long.

CENSUS OF THE REBEL STATES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be directed to inquire into the propriety and necessity of providing for taking a census of the inhabitants of the late rebellious States which are likely soon to apply for admission into the Union, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. COVODE. The object I had in view in holding the floor previous to the recess was to get in the report of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary in reference to the impeachment of the President. As the chairman has stated that both reports are to be presented I have nothing further to say, and therefore withdraw my motion.

EXCUSED FROM COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to be excused from further service on the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, for the reason that the duties of the Ordnance Committee are such that I have never been able to meet with the former committee but once.

No objection being made, the gentleman was accordingly excused.

JUDGMENTS IN COURT OF CLAIMS.

The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of July 17, 1867, a list of the judgments that have been rendered in the Court of Claims since March 31, 1863, with the amounts, &c.; which was referred to the Committee of Claims when appointed, and ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF MINISTER ADAMS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the resolutions offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] in reference to the impeachment of Hon. Charles F. Adams, upon which that gentleman has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON then proceeded to address the House. When he had spoken about ten minutes,

Mr. BOUTWELL said: If the gentleman from New York will yield, I will move that the House do now adjourn. I presume the gentleman would prefer to finish his remarks at some future day.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it would be impossible to get a vote or a proper consideration of this subject this evening, and I therefore yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MULLINS. I will ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, and then I will ask the Chair to recognize me on a question of privilege. I will not detain the House five minutes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield for that purpose. The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

No objection was made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Speaker, my political status has been brought in issue here by a gentleman who claims to belong to the Federal Army, and it was done, first in order, by the charge made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] I went to him after he had got through his remarks, making a personal charge and then generalizing it, and told him that I would like him, as my mouthpiece, to state that I denied the charge coming from that quarter charging me with disloyalty, either by act, word, or dream—that I totally denied it. The gentleman forgot, in his last remarks, to make the statement which I asked him to make as my mouthpiece; doubtless he forgot it, for he is too honorable a man not to have done it otherwise.

Now, that letter comes from a gentleman by the name of Troluger, who is a citizen of my county and whom I know. I have a letter from him written to me some time back and marked "confidential." I could not, if I had the letter here, publish it without his permission; but it fires a volley into the ranks on the other side, and shows that he looked upon me as an angel of purity, so far as loyalty is concerned, and that to me he could trust his heart. He knows that every word charged in that letter is false, and comes from the fountain that begat rebellion in that bright world above. I say, now, that never by word or deed have I put myself in harmony with that party that stood out against the Government of Washington, a Government for which my fathers fought and which they bequeathed to me, and I intend to keep it pure until we go down amid the wreck of rebellion, and then I will stand as a monument declaring that the best human government is that in which the will of the people is reflected. I want to maintain that Government and stand side by side with those who are fighting for it. That is my motto, and I never had any other on God's green earth.

It is said that I made a speech to the rebel company of one Captain James A. Moore. I made just such a speech to them as I would have made when I was a volunteer on General Rosecrans' staff at Stone river, and it dispersed their ranks and broke up the company. That is the speech I made; and this is the first mortal man in the whole record of our rebellious career in Tennessee who ever put his name to a document saying that I was a rebel by sympathy or by act. Where it comes from I leave to God, who reveals the future in the destiny of time. I know not how it was concocted and gotten up. It is astonishing to me, while this man's private letter to me throws bomb-shells on the other side and calls on me to fetch his little daughter from Tennessee under my care to him here; but I could not do it. I denounce every word of that letter as wholly untrue in any shape, sense, or form.

Mr. Speaker, I owe an apology to the House, and I ask its forgiveness for getting up before I was sworn in and asking the gentleman from New York to state to the House what I have now stated. I ask pardon for thus infringing the rules of the House.

I wish to state further that when Governor Brownlow was brought from East Tennessee through Bedford county, when the retreating confederates were there in untold thousands, when I saw him in a carriage under guard and in the midst of the rebels, I stood in the street and waved my hat and hurraed for Brownlow, and was threatened with death for it.

I will say, gentlemen, that I was the last man in Tennessee that ceased talking for the Government; that I stood before the people with fire-arms on the stand and made speeches to them, and that I was the first man to hail the flag with cheers when on the 27th of March it floated once more in triumph in my county. Then it was that the Federal cavalry came in under the lead of Buell. Captain King, of an Ohio regiment—Ohio, the grand Buckeye State—was there. He knows well that I mounted the rostrum when the stars and stripes were first given to the breezes of Heaven and gave vent to the rejoicing impulses of my nature, and as its folds floated forth in the sunlight the tears dropped like showers of rain from my eyes. This is the real feeling of Tennessee. This is what will carry the ship of state booming along amid the clouds and storms of rebellion, under whatever guise they may come.

I ask pardon of the House for thus taking up their time, and will say no more.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

He also presented a petition of Mary C. Ringgold, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas Edward E. Dunbar, of the city of New York, having appeared before the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, raised by concurrent resolution of the two Houses on the 11th day of October, 1867, and having been sworn, and having given certain testimony touching the matters of inquiry referred to said committee, and in the course of such testimony having stated that certain material facts stated by him upon information were communicated to him by various persons, and he having thereupon been asked and required to communicate to said committee the names of such persons, and he having thereupon, in contempt of the authority of said committee and of the two Houses of Congress respectively, wholly refused so to do; Therefore,

Resolved, That the President pro tempore be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, commanding him to arrest the said Edward E. Dunbar wheresoever he may be found, and have his body at the bar of the Senate, to answer for said contempt.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the joint select Committee on Retrenchment to report a joint resolution to require the payment of certain moneys into the Treasury of the United States, and to ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 67) was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the resolution be read at length.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which provides that all moneys which have been received by any officer or employé of the Government, or any Department thereof, from sales of captured or abandoned property in the late insurrectionary districts, under or under color of the several acts of Congress providing for the collection and sale of such property, and which have not been already actually covered into the Treasury, shall be immediately paid into the Treasury, together with any interest which has been received or accrued thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that I have any objection to the resolution; but at the same time I think it had better lie over until to-morrow, so that we may have time to examine it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to its going over if any Senator wishes that course to be taken; but I hope the resolution will be printed in the mean time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed, as a matter of course, under the rules.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 68) exempting goods imported on the second, third, and fourth days of March, 1867, from the operation of the act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imported wool, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSENGERS AND PAGES.

Mr. NYE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the salaries now due the special messengers and pages retained during the recess by special resolution out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or any fund not otherwise appropriated.

The Senate will recollect that a resolution was passed on the last day of the session in July—

Mr. CAMERON. I think this resolution had better lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. NYE. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to include the clerks of committees. I shall have no objection to that amendment if he moves it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution had better lie over. I ask that it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over, under the rules.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was Ordered, That Alexander J. Atocha have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That Henry E. Morse have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the petitions and documents of Charles J. Jack, praying compensation for services rendered as counsel in defending certain officers, sailors, and marines before the naval general court-martial at the navy-yard in Brooklyn, New York, in 1864 and 1865, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

UNITED STATES OF NORTH GERMANY.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if this can be done compatibly with the public interest, any official information which may have been received in regard to the formation and the functions of the Government of the United States of North Germany.

REDUCTION OF MILITARY FORCE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an immediate reduction of the standing military force of the United States.

VOLUNTEERS FOR THE PLAINS.

Mr. ROSS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire into the necessity of providing for the enlistment of volunteers for a limited period for the preservation of the peace on the plains, and to report by bill or otherwise.

USE OF HALL FOR A LECTURE.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution, on which I ask the action of the Senate now:

Resolved, That the Senate Chamber be set apart for a lecture from Rev. Newman Hall on the evening of Tuesday, the 26th of November.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that resolution passes, I ask that the rule of the Senate on the subject be read. I think there is a rule in reference to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule on the subject, but there is a resolution of the body.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I thought there had been some action.

Mr. SUMNER. I will read to the Senate what there is. There is no rule, but there is a resolution. The Senate will remember that there was an effort to secure the Chamber for the use of Mrs. M. C. Walling, and after some discussion it was granted in the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the use of the Senate Chamber be granted to Mrs. M. C. Walling for the purpose of delivering therein an address, on Thursday evening, the 10th instant, the floor of the Chamber to be for the exclusive accommodation of members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and their families; and that hereafter the Senate Chamber shall not be granted for any other purpose than for the use of the Senate."—Senate Journal, May 8, 1866.

You will observe that this provision relating to the "hereafter" was put on as a sort of rider to the concession of the Chamber for that evening. It is in the nature of a vote by the Senate, and, of course, may be rescinded or modified at any time. I think there can be no objection now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I confess that it is approaching me in rather a tender point when the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to give the use of the Hall to the distinguished gentleman named; but that Senator is quite as well aware as I am that when we commence opening the doors of the Chamber for lectures we cannot stop it. The Senate, very solemnly as I understood, decided sometime ago that the Chamber should not be used except for the business of the Senate. If there could be any occasion on which I would be willing to open the doors for any other purpose, it would certainly be to receive and listen to a distinguished gentleman from a foreign country who has borne so conspicuous a part in his native land in standing up for the rights of America and for the cause of humanity; and I am rather sorry than otherwise that the Senator from Massachusetts should have presented the resolution. This Chamber is not a very large one. It will not accommodate the throng that would like to listen to that gentleman. Some larger room would accommodate the public much better. I shall not interpose a single objection to the consideration of the resolution, but I wish to say to my fellow-Senators if you commence opening the doors in this way you will find it very difficult to close them. I should much prefer that the Senator from Massachusetts had not presented this resolution. If the Senate think proper to pass it, of course the doors will be opened, and we shall have these applications constantly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think, since this resolution has been offered, it would be very unfortunate for us to refuse to grant the use of the Senate Chamber to Mr. Hall, and in fact I was in favor of the presentation of the resolution. He has borne, as we all know, a very distinguished part as our friend in England; and whatever may be our view with reference to the conduct of the English Government, it is desirable to hear from him the sentiments of the plain people of England, as Mr. Lincoln called them. And as to the precedent, it seems to me that that whole matter will be relieved by adopting a rule, if it is desirable, after this, such a rule as they have in the House of Representatives preventing any application of this kind. There is no such rule existing now, and therefore this need not be a precedent to violate a rule. I hope that this application will be granted, and then such a rule be adopted as there is in the House of Representatives, which precludes them from suffering that room to be used on such occasions.

Mr. CAMERON. I have the very highest respect for the character of the gentleman who proposes to lecture here, but I cannot consent by my vote to invite him to come and occupy the Senate Chamber for an address. If we once establish a precedent of that kind we shall never get clear of it. We cannot admit into this Chamber, when the Senate is in session, the most respectable citizen of any one of our States. If we allow this gentleman to lecture in this Chamber, after a while somebody else quite as respectable in our own country will ask the same privilege, and if objection be made to it we shall give offense.

There is no necessity for this gentleman's coming to this Chamber to lecture. If it is intended to compliment him, I for one will very willingly contribute my share toward renting a hall, the best in the town; nay, I will pay one half the cost, if necessary. Let us go to hear him in one of the churches or one of the public halls; but let us keep this Senate Chamber for what it was intended—for the deliberations of Senators, the representatives of the States of the Union. Why, sir, imagine what would be said to any gentleman, no matter how distinguished in this body, who should go to London and ask to deliver a lecture in the House of Lords! He would be hooted at. We do not detract anything from our respect for this gentleman by refusing him this Chamber for the purpose of speaking to us; and I hope we shall not pass this resolution. I think the rider attached to the last resolution of this sort was a wise one, because it gave notice that from that time forth no more such applications should be granted.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose I voted for the resolution which has been read, though I do not remember whether I did or not. I certainly shall vote for this resolution even if it is in conflict with that. The Senate cannot bind itself not to reconsider or repeal any action it may have taken in the past. I can always trust myself, and I believe every member of the Senate feels as I do about it, to vote for or against any question that comes up; and if this is a precedent for improper applications in the future all we shall have to do will be to vote against them. For one, I could not feel justified in voting against a proposition to hear Rev. Dr. Hall. Even if such a thing could not be allowed to an American citizen in England we are rather more democratic than they are, and there is no peculiar sanctity or sacredness about this room that would be injured by an address from Dr. Hall.

I am glad that the Senator from Massachusetts has introduced this resolution, and I shall vote for it. That will not commit me to vote for another one to-morrow. If I choose, I shall vote against the use of the Chamber to-morrow for some other purpose. Each case should stand on its own merits, and no Senator should feel embarrassed or tied up by any former precedent or vote he may have given. We can always trust ourselves to vote for or against any measure that comes up when it comes. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Pennsylvania reminded us that a similar application for an American to speak in the Chamber of the House of Lords would be rejected; and I believe he used even stronger language. I have no doubt it would be; but that is no reason why we should reject such an application here. I believe that the Senator in this remark has touched to the very quick an essential difference between the two countries. In England a chamber like this is not open in any way to the public. I rejoice to believe that here, in our country, a chamber like this may be open to the public. Clearly, there is no rule against it. This is the admission of all Senators. If there were a rule, I should not seek to encounter it. The use of the Hall may be given by a simple vote of this body. There is no rule in the way.

Is there any reason, then, why it should not be given? We are reminded by the Senator from Illinois that it will be a precedent which will open these doors wide to a long line of speakers. I do not see it so. We always have the command of the doors. The doorkeepers are ours. The doors can never be opened except by our will. It seems to me, therefore, that the suggestion of my friend from Illinois should not prevail; it is not well founded. There is no danger in this precedent. There is no reason to fear that it will be made the occasion of repeated applications hereafter. Let each case be judged on its own merits. If, hereafter, another person of equal merits shall appear here, or a request shall be made in his behalf, then it will be for the Senate to consider it.

I need say nothing here of the beautiful and persuasive eloquence of this distinguished gentleman, or of his constancy in the support of our cause during its most perilous days in England. These are well known to all the Senate. It is, however, these circumstances which make this case exceptional. Do not be anxious about the precedent. You can always control it hereafter; and even if it be recognized as a precedent it will only be where you have opportunity to welcome a gentleman of such commanding character and influence, to whom we are all under such just obligations as we are to this stranger from another land, who comes with a message of peace.

Mr. TIPTON. I desire simply to say that, whatever may be our wishes in this behalf, it must be known to all Senators that this Hall will not accommodate the members of the Senate and the members of the House of Representatives, with other privileged persons in the city. It is utterly impossible to accommodate them in the Senate Chamber. Senators then will have to vacate their own seats, and leave their own families; for it is understood that every Senator has a wife or two female friends, and as a matter of course we expect to come here with our wives or our female friends. I am not willing to be separated from my wife any more than other Senators are willing to be separated from their female friends on such an occasion. Thus we with our families would occupy the body of the Chamber, and be compelled to exclude the members of the House of Representatives. It ought to be a sufficient objection to opening the Hall, as I apprehend, that its capacity is not sufficient to accommodate those who are primarily entitled to come here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] to state that in consequence of his official connection with the Indian commission he will not be able to be here until the latter part of this week. As he is engaged in official business I presume it is unnecessary to ask leave of absence for him.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Frelinghuysen, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Patterson of New Hampshire, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, and Yates—16.

So the motion was rejected.

BILLS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the bill (H. R. No. 127) in relation to additional bounty, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) concerning the government of the Army of the United States, were taken from the table, read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the following joint resolutions were taken from the table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 54) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Daniel E. Sickles;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 55) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John Pope;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General John M. Schofield; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 79) relative to the purchase of Hall's carbines.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the bill (H. R. No. 145) in relation to the district court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio was taken from the table, read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Thursday next. ["Thanksgiving!"] It has occurred to me that that is the day set apart for national thanksgiving. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to suggest that sometime during this month it would be well to take some action as to the day of final adjournment of the present session, and I think that ought to be done pretty early. We had better settle when we shall finally close this session, and that must be done by joint action of the two Houses.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better meet to-morrow, and perhaps we can then settle that question. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, November 25, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. Newman Hall, of Surrey chapel, London, England.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM KENTUCKY.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the calling of the States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for reference. The Chair will, however, lay before the House the certificate of an election in the State of Kentucky since the action of the House last July in regard to the Kentucky delegation.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF KENTUCKY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
FRANKFORT, August 26, 1867.

The undersigned, a board for examining the returns of the election held the 5th day of August, 1867, hereby certify that J. S. Golladay received a majority of the votes given in the third congressional district of the State of Kentucky for the office of Representative in the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and is therefore duly elected to that office for the term prescribed by the Constitution; which election was held in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Kentucky.

THOMAS E. BRAMLETTE, Governor.
JOHN M. HARLAN,
Attorney General.
W. T. SAMUELS,
Auditor Public Accounts.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire if that is the district to represent which the late Mr. Hise was originally elected, or claimed to be elected?

The SPEAKER. That is the district.

Mr. DAWES. I will state to the House that there is pending now before the Committee of Elections the application of a gentleman who claims to have been elected at the time the certificate was given to the late Mr. Hise. I do not know the merits of the claim. If it be a valid one, then of course this election of Mr. Golladay could not have been a valid election. That case is pending; it is the subject of inquiry and the taking of testimony. I suppose this gentleman would be also interested in the hearing of that case, because if it be decided one way it would put an end to his claim.

It seems to me it would be the proper way to have these credentials referred, in the first instance, to the Committee of Elections, in order that the whole matter may be examined and reported upon at one hearing. I therefore move that, before this man be sworn in, these credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections, and that he be not sworn in until report upon the case be made.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire in this case to call the attention of the House to the fact that Mr. George B. Blakey claims to have been elected a member of the Fortieth Congress at the May election in Kentucky. He, however, has not the certificate of election. Mr. Golladay, who comes here claiming the seat, has the certificate of election.

In order that the House may know how to act upon this matter I wish to make a brief statement, which I think will set forth the facts so plainly that the House will understand them. They are few and simple:

In May last, at the regular election in Kentucky for Congressmen, Mr. George B. Blakey was a candidate against Judge Hise, who was a former member of Congress. At that election, as the returns show, Mr. Blakey received about 1,200 votes, and Judge Hise received 7,700 votes, showing a majority in favor of Judge Hise of over 6,000. Shortly after the election, however, and before the certificate was awarded to Judge Hise, or to any one else, Judge Hise died. Dr. Blakey then made the point before the board at Frankfort whether or not he was entitled to the certificate of election, on the ground that Judge Hise had died before the certificate had been issued to him; not setting up the ground that he would have been entitled to it had Judge Hise lived, but admitting that Judge Hise had been legally elected, that had he lived he would have been entitled to the certificate, and basing his claim upon the contingency of Judge Hise's death; and that he had obtained the next largest number of votes.

Now, sir, Mr. Blakey was not the choice of the district. Whether Judge Hise would have been prevented from taking his seat had he lived, it matters not; in any event, Mr. Blakey would not have been entitled to the seat. I know not upon what ground Dr. Blakey now bases his claim. I know that at one time he based it upon the ground that Judge Hise had died without receiving the certificate. But whatever may be the ground of his claim at present, I know the Constitution of the United States says in emphatic terms that—and I know Dr. Blakey was not so chosen. On the contrary, the district has given emphatic expression of opinion to show, not only that it did not choose Mr. Blakey then, but that the probability is that it would never choose him. Out of about nine thousand votes he received only about twelve hundred votes.

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States;"

But, sir, while I think the House might, upon this statement of facts, decide now who is entitled to the seat, I ask the admission of Mr. Golladay upon a different ground. I do not ask that the House shall this morning, unless it feels so disposed, settle the final issue; I simply claim that Mr. Golladay is the accredited, authorized member, and is therefore entitled to be admitted to a seat. Whether he shall ultimately be declared entitled to the seat is another question. Mr. Golladay, however, comes here as the member-elect, bearing the certificate of election, and as such he is, in my view, entitled to be sworn in pending the contest, if there is to be a contest. The ground I take in the matter is that the man coming here accredited with the certificate of election is entitled to the seat pending the contest, unless there be objection in regard to his personal qualifications; and I presume there is no such objection in this case.

In support of this opinion I read from a report made last July by the Committee of Elections, of which the gentleman who has made this motion to refer is chairman:

"But all charges touching the disloyalty of a constituency in a State in which loyal civil government was not overthrown during the late rebellion, or the illegality of an election, are matters which pertain to a contest in the ordinary way; and should not prevent a person holding a regular certificate from taking his seat."

This was a report made by the gentleman who was last up, [Mr. DAWES;] this is the opinion which he then expressed in this body. The case which I present to-day is one exactly similar to that. Mr. Golladay holds the certificate of election. The opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in the report from which I have just read was that any person holding a certificate should be allowed to take his seat, and that any question as to the irregularity or informality of the election, or the disloyalty of the constituency, or any other matter of that kind, is to be decided in a contest. I hope that the House will adhere to the opinion expressed at that time by the Committee of Elections, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts, in view of the opinion which he then expressed, will withdraw the motion which he has made. I hope that Mr. Golladay, who comes here duly accredited as a member, bearing the certificate of election, will be permitted, in accordance with the usages of the House, to take his seat, however the House may ultimately decide any questions raised in the form of a contest.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, this is a case to which I had occasion to call the attention of the House at a former session of this Congress. It has this peculiarity: Mr. Hise, formerly a member of this House, to whom the Governor of Kentucky issued a certificate as having been elected to represent his district in this Congress, died without taking his seat, and, as I am informed, without receiving the certificate. Dr. Blakey came before this House, not for the purpose of contesting Mr. Hise's seat—as he would have done if Mr. Hise had lived, but to claim that he was duly elected by the people of that district. Now, we had provided by law rules for a contest where the member claiming the seat under the certificate had been admitted to it; but we had no rules for a case of this kind, where the claimant under the certificate was dead, where no person presented himself as entitled to the seat under the certificate. Accordingly, at a former session of this Congress, we made rules—as we had a right to do—for the trial of this particular case; and we submitted this case to the Committee of Elections, to be examined by them.

That committee has been taking testimony in this case in the State of Kentucky. I do not know what that testimony is; I have not yet had an opportunity to examine it. But I know, as I presume all the members of this House will readily see, that this is not the occasion to investigate the merits of that case as between Dr. Blakey and the gentleman to whom the certificate was first given by the Governor of Kentucky. But it is very plain that until that case shall have been decided we do not know whether there has been any vacancy or whether there will be any vacancy in the representation of that district. It is true that the Governor of Kentucky has assumed that there was a vacancy; that there was no one entitled under the former election to a place on this floor as a Representative of that district; he has ordered a new election and has given a new certificate. But it seems to me that it would be exceedingly improper to withdraw the case from the hands of the Committee of Elections, to whom it has been already intrusted, because of the Governor of the State, assuming that there was a vacancy, has ordered a new election and has issued another certificate.

Now, it is not true that in this House Dr. Blakey claims his seat because Mr. Hise is dead. On the contrary, as I had opportunity to know, having given attention to it at a former session of Congress, he claims his seat upon the ground of having received a majority of the legal votes cast at that election. He does not claim to have received a majority of the votes actually cast, but he does claim, whatever may have been said in Kentucky—he does claim here, sir, as I know, having read the document he has presented here, to have received a majority of the votes legally cast in that district at a former election; and he has undertaken to prove that before the subcommittee sent to Kentucky to investigate his case, among others. I think until that testimony is heard, until the report of the committee is received, until the case then made is known and submitted to the committee, we ought not to admit a new Representative from this district on this floor.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS. Let me make one more remark before you call for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman from Wisconsin seems to have misunderstood the point I intended to make in the matter. There are here two persons claiming a seat from that district in Kentucky, one having a certificate from the proper authority in the State of Kentucky, and the other having no such certificate. I do not propose, as the gentleman from Wisconsin seems to imagine, to withdraw this case from the Committee of Elections. Let it go to the committee. Let the committee go on and consider the matter, but pending the consideration of the matter, until it shall be decided who is entitled to the seat, I ask that the member who comes here as the authorized member, having the certificate, shall be admitted, and that the rule which has always been observed, a rule which the chairman of the committee, among others, committed himself to last summer, shall in this case be observed, as in all other cases.

Now, the proposition, so the gentleman may not be again mistaken, and so the House may understand it, is this, not that this matter may be finally decided this morning, not that the House shall take it from the consideration of the Committee of Elections, but that the member who appears here holding the certificate shall be sworn in and admitted to this House as all others are unless on the ground of personal disqualification, and I hear of no such ground as that. The question is shall he be admitted as a member bearing the certificate, and shall his certificate be referred and let the committee and the House determine as other like cases have before been determined?

Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me, and I ask this House whether, if Dr. Blakey came here claiming a seat and bearing the certificate, he would not be admitted. If so, ought not Mr. Golladay to be admitted? The question in this is simply as in all others where there is a contest and two men are claiming a seat, one having the certificate and the other not having it; and let this case go as all other contested cases have gone, and in the way in which the committee reported last year they thought they ought to go. And to refresh the recollection of some gentlemen, and particularly of the chairman of the committee who does not seem to have read it recently, I will again give the opinion entertained by the committee in July last:

"All charges touching the disloyalty of a constituency in a State, or the legality of an election, are matters which pertain to a contest in the ordinary way, and should not prevent the person holding the regular certificate from taking a seat."

The point made by the member from Wisconsin was this: that Dr. Blakey did not receive a majority of the votes cast, but that he did receive a majority of the legal votes. The opinion of the committee as then expressed was that the question of the legality of votes cast or of the loyalty of constituents was one that should be referred to the committee to be determined in the regular way, and should not prevent the member holding the certificate from taking his seat.

Mr. Golladay presents himself here to-day as a member-elect holding that certificate. I ask that he may be permitted to take his seat, and that the matter be then referred, with his credentials, if necessary, to the Committee of Elections. Pending the examination let him be allowed to be sworn in and take his seat, and then let the question be decided by the committee. There is no proposition to disturb the matter. Let Mr. Golladay hold his seat until the question is finally determined whether he is entitled to it or not.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I have no occasion to qualify anything set forth in the report made at the last session, which has been read by the gentleman from Kentucky. I think that report covers the present case, and what embarrasses the gentleman from Kentucky this morning, in my opinion, is his failure to make the application of it to this case. The question whether Mr. Blakey was entitled to be sworn in was one that was before the House at the last session. He claimed to be the regularly chosen member from the third district in Kentucky. The House referred the question to the Committee of Elections and instructed the committee, according to a rule it then laid down, to investigate the question whether Mr. Blakey was then, at that time, a duly elected member from the third district of Kentucky. Since that decision of the House the Governor of Kentucky has assumed to say that Mr. Blakey was not elected, and that this proceeding of the House of Representatives was without foundation and must stop, because he ordered an election to fill a vacancy, the question whether a vacancy existed or not being now investigated before the House of Representatives. And he, by a subsequent proceeding, furnishes another man with a certificate of election grounded upon an election, I suppose, according to the forms of law in Kentucky.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a case that has no precedent in any of the cases that have occurred heretofore. Pending a man's claim to a seat, pending an investigation of the legality of his election, there comes in a matter of fact which has occurred since that election has taken place. It is true that it is covered by the form of a certificate from the Governor of Kentucky, but it is not a certificate in the ordinary form, in this, that it certifies that a man has been elected at a special election, to fill a vacancy that has occurred since the regular election, and while there is pending before the House of Representatives the question whether there did occur any such vacancy since the regular election.

Now, sir, while anything which I had the honor to say in that report is entirely sound, I do not see how it is possible to apply the rules laid down there to this case without foreclosing Dr. Blakey from any further investigation of the question of a vacancy existing at that time. I express no opinion at this time upon the merits of Dr. Blakey's claim, nor upon the merits of the claim of the other gentleman.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire of him whether, if this party now holding the certificate be sworn in, with an order that his credentials be referred to the Committee of Elections, and with his right to a seat dependent upon its final decision upon the question of a vacancy, the question is foreclosed at all?

Mr. DAWES. My answer to the gentleman is this: that if you swear this man in and refer his credentials to the Committee of Elections, and there stop, what has the committee to do with the matter? There is where the gentleman from Ohio stops. The committee is now going on with the investigation of the previous case, according to a rule which the House itself, not the committee, prescribed. We go on with that investigation, these credentials lying on our table, with no instruction on the part of the House to touch these credentials, if we stop where the gentleman from Ohio stops. But we decide, for instance—I do not say there is the slightest reason to suppose we shall so decide, but the fact that it is referred to us to examine and report gives the occasion and the opportunity to so decide—we come in and decide, upon the investigation now pending and the testimony now taken, that Mr. Blakey is entitled to the seat, thereby putting two men into the same seat, which, according to the laws of natural philosophy, is an impossibility, because no two such bodies can occupy the same seat at the same time.

I have no care about this matter at all; but I see what an awkward predicament the House would be placed in if perchance the committee should report that Mr. Blakey is entitled to the seat by virtue of the investigation in which this man has had no hand, no opportunity for a hearing, while he has been at the same time occupying a seat. Therefore, I think the safest way is to refer this gentleman's credentials to the committee and let them consider it along with the other cases, and make but one report. It will decide either that Dr. Blakey or this gentleman, Mr. Golladay, is entitled to the seat, and that ends the matter. I will now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire simply to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question, and it is this: if the validity of the applicant's credentials must not depend upon the fact whether a vacancy exists, and if no vacancy is found to have existed at the time when he was elected, if that does not decide precisely the question which the gentleman says would involve us in the difficulty of having two men in the same seat at the same time?

Mr. DAWES. I thought I answered that question. We have pending before us a case. It is the case of Dr. Blakey, claiming to have been elected from Kentucky at a certain time to a certain seat in this House. We are hearing him. The House has prescribed how he shall take his testimony. He has taken it. It is before the committee. Suppose the committee come in here, for instance, and report that Dr. Blakey was at such a time elected to this seat and the House should see fit to adopt that report, the report itself and the adoption of the report would not exclude either man; or if it would exclude Mr. Golladay, it would work manifest injustice to him, because his case would have been decided without an opportunity for a hearing on his part; and therefore justice to him requires that he should be made a party, an interlocutory party, so to speak, a party having his right in consequence of something which has happened since the last continuance of the case.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Cannot that as well be done while he is occupying his seat under the credentials with which the sovereign State of Kentucky has sent him here?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know but it may; I do not mean to say that it may not. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in the first place, to correct what seems to be a misapprehension on the part of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] on the subject of the duties of the sub-committee of the Committee of Elections which went to Kentucky to investigate certain cases. He seems to suppose that it was part of the duty of that sub-committee to investigate the claim of Dr. Blakey to the seat now in controversy. That is a mistake. It was no part of the business of that sub-committee to investigate this case, and they did not in any degree whatever investigate the case or give any attention to it at all. They did not take one word of evidence on this subject; they did not consider it at all; indeed, it was not before them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the difficulty suggested by the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in no way involves a necessity on the part of this House of establishing a new or different rule from that which ordinarily governs and regulates cases of this kind, to wit: that the member having a prima facie title to the seat shall be permitted, pending the contest, to be sworn in, and to occupy the seat. Now, applying that rule to this case, it becomes apparent to every gentleman that Mr. Golladay is the person occupying that relation before the House now. He comes here in possession of a prima facie title to this seat. He comes here with credentials upon their face regular, in due form, and attesting a regular and legal election.

Now, it is suggested that if this gentleman is allowed to be sworn in and to keep the seat pending further controversy about it the House may be involved in the singular anomaly of having at the same instant of time two men entitled to the same seat. But that cannot result at all, sir, for the very obvious reason that if Mr. Golladay is permitted to occupy this seat pending the contest the moment that contest is determined by the action of the appropriate committee of the House, and their action is approved by the House, if it be against Mr. Golladay, he must retire from the seat and Dr. Blakey must take it. But is it not as necessary in this case as in any other case that there should be a contestee as well as a contestant? Who is the contestee here? Judge Hise is dead; he is not here to contest the right to the seat with Dr. Blakey. Who then is now interested as contestee or in any other capacity? Certainly, Mr. Golladay. Nobody else has any interest now in this seat except the people of Kentucky. Mr. Golladay is the only gentleman besides Dr. Blakey who is entitled to come here and claim this seat. He comes here in the possession of a prima facie title, while Dr. Blakey comes here in possession of no shadow or color of title. It seems to me, therefore, that the rule and precedents require the House to suffer this gentleman to be sworn in and occupy the seat, and that Dr. Blakey shall be allowed to contest with him the right to the seat. The fact that Mr. Golladay's claim has intervened since the origin of the case of Dr. Blakey cannot change the legal relations of the parties to the House. Suppose that Dr. Blakey should be allowed to go on and make his case as well as he can, would that be doing justice to Mr. Golladay, who has a prima facie right to occupy the seat here, or to the State of Kentucky, to refuse him the right to be heard in connection with the case of Dr. Blakey? It appears to me that upon every principle of justice, and every precedent established by the House during the last fifty years, the regular course would be to allow Mr. Golladay to occupy the seat pending the contest; he then becomes the contestee, and let Dr. Blakey go on as the contestant and make out his case. And then, when the committee decide the one case they will also decide the other, and the controversy will be ended, and no injustice to either party can be done pending the contest.

It is clear that Mr. Blakey is not now entitled to be sworn in. It is clear, as a prima facie case, that Mr. Golladay is entitled to be sworn in. I submit, therefore, that the positions taken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ADAMS] are fair and just. In my judgment, without expressing any opinion whatever upon the merits of the case in relation to either of these gentlemen, it is the duty of the House to allow Mr. Golladay to be sworn in, and then to suffer the contest to go on in the regular course. In this way, and in this way alone, the House can vindicate its own law and maintain its own consistency in reference to cases of this kind.

Mr. DAWES. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was upon referring the certificate to the Committee of Elections.

IMPEACHMENT OF MINISTER ADAMS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the question of privilege pending on Thursday last, when the House adjourned, in relation to impeachment of Minister Adams, and upon which the gentleman from New York [MR. ROBINSON] is entitled to the floor for fifty minutes.

The resolution offered by Mr. ROBINSON on Thursday last is as follows:

Whereas Charles Francis Adams, United States minister to Great Britain, has been charged with neglect of duty toward American citizens in England and Ireland by failing to secure their rights as such citizens: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the foregoing charge and to report thereon forthwith, to the end that, if the charge be true, articles of impeachment against said Charles Francis Adams may be presented by this House to the Senate of the United States; that the President of the United States be requested to telegraph to the said Charles Francis Adams immediately to demand his passports and to return home; that the Secretary of State be instructed to communicate to this House all correspondence to and from the Department for the two years last past on the arrest, imprisonment, trial, or conviction of any American citizen, or any person claiming to be such, in Great Britain and Ireland, without reference to its public effect, to be considered, if need be, in secret session of this House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, when I yielded the floor, on Thursday last, for a motion to adjourn, I had stated that, for years past, efforts had been made in Congress, and to our ministers at the English Court, to secure or vindicate the rights of American citizens visiting Great Britain. Hitherto these efforts have proved fruitless. During the March and July sittings of this session of Congress, by resolutions which I had the honor to introduce, this House called upon the President for such correspondence as had taken place between this Government and that of Great Britain relative to the arrest, imprisonment, trial, conviction, or punishment of American citizens in that country. The Secretary of State, through the President, if I remember correctly, refused to transmit that correspondence, on the ground of some dreaded detriment to the public good.

While we have failed to obtain either information or satisfaction, outrages have continued and are now being perpetrated upon our citizens in Great Britain. I have resolved, therefore, to make one more effort to call the attention of Congress, and intend to keep calling attention to it until Congress shall declare, and our ministers abroad shall vindicate, the will of the American people on this subject.

And now, sir, what are the facts upon which I have grounded these resolutions? For many years, and more particularly within the two years last past, no American citizen has been permitted to visit Great Britain or Ireland without an extraordinary and insulting examination of his person and effects. His footsteps have been dogged, and spies and informers have hung around him like his shadow. Numerous arrests have been made, not only without any sworn information being lodged against them, but even without any decent grounds for suspicion. They have been cast into loathsome prisons; marched through the streets, heavily manacled, the groans of the mob making deep bass to the treble of their clanking chains, which were peeling the flesh from the bones of American citizens, both native and adopted; clothed in felon uniforms itching on the backs of unconvicted and unaccused American citizens, whose blood had deepened the crimson on the stripes and whose valor had brightened the radiance in the stars of that flag which failed in this hour of their shame and degradation to protect them. The American who sees or hears or reads these details of insult and degradation and does not feel like avenging them, or turns a deaf ear from his fellow American citizens, with the plea that the victims are Irishmen or Fenians, is unworthy of a flag for his country, or a grave beneath its soil.

Now, sir, let me call the attention of this House to some recent occurrences which I believe justify the moving and adoption of the resolutions which I have offered.

In February last Stephen J. Meany, claiming to be an American citizen, having been kidnapped in London, was tried in Dublin and convicted of treason felony. The attorney general in his opening speech, as I find it reported in the Dublin Irishman of February 23, 1867, to the jury—such a jury only as is produced in England on State trials—detailed the actions of Mr. Meany in New York; stated what he had done at Clinton hall in that city January 8 and 11, 1866; showed what he had done at the Apollo rooms in that city in March of that year; what he had done and said in Sixth avenue April 4 of that year; and through the whole opening speech of the attorney general not one single reference to or insinuation of anything ever done on British soil by Mr. Meany was made; but on the recital of words spoken and acts done in the city of New York he closed his address in the following words:

"Now, if you believe the evidence that will be given, there is an end of this case. Every natural born subject of her majesty who goes to another country cannot, with impunity, hatch treason against his own country. At all events, if he does he had better stay there. The Crown thinks it right that the public should know this, and, if the facts I have stated are proved, Stephen J. Meany will become an example to the parties who do so."

Witnesses such only as are produced in England on State trials were called. Not a single act or word done or spoken in her majesty's dominions was proved against him. The evidence being all in, Baron Fitzgerald, one of the judges presiding, inquired of the attorney general what offense had been proved? After a long discussion Baron Fitzgerald made the following note of the point reserved, and refused to sentence till the appeal was heard:

"The Crown gave evidence that the prisoner was a member of a society in America called the Fenian brotherhood, having for its object the several objects set out in the several counts in the indictment; gave evidence of the existence of an association in Ireland of similar denomination, and evidence of its connection with that in America. Then proved a number of acts in the county of the city of Dublin in promotion of its objects by members of the association in Ireland, but proved no, otherwise, acts of the prisoner himself done in Ireland, or even that he was in Ireland during any part of the period that the associations were shown to exist either in America or Ireland."

This point, so reserved, was argued in the courts above and was decided against Meany by six to four of the ten judges, and on the 21st day of June last he was brought up for sentence. In reply to the usual question why sentence should not be pronounced against him, he said:

"I protest against the right to pass any sentence in any British court for acts done, or words spoken, or alleged to be done or spoken, on American soil, within the shadow of the American flag, and under the sanction of American institutions. I protest against the assumption that would in this country bind the right of thought or control the liberty of speech in an assemblage of American citizens in an American city. The United States will doubtless respect and protect her neutrality laws and observe 'the comity of nations,' whatever that may mean, in practice; but I repeat, I protest against the monstrous fiction, the transparent fraud that would seek in ninety years after the evacuation of New York by the British to bring the people of New York within the vision and venue of a British jury in a British law court. I protest against the 'supposition' that, in ninety years after the last British bayonet had glistened in an American sunlight; after the last keel of the last of the English fleet plowed its last furrows in the waters of the Hudson or the Delaware, would restore that city of New York, its people and institutions, to the dominions of the Crown and Government of Great Britain. That is the meaning of this case. And so, disguise it as the Crown may, will it be interpreted in America. Not that the people of America would care one jot that Stephen Joseph Meany were hanged, drawn, and quartered to-morrow; but there is a great principle involved. Personally, I am of no consequence in the affair; politically, I represent in this court the Irish-adopted citizens of America; for if, as the New York Herald, writing on the case, has observed, the acts done in my regard are held to be justifiable, there is nothing to prevent the extension of the same justice to any other adopted citizen visiting Great Britain. It is, therefore, in the injustice of the case the influence lies, and not in the importance of the individual."

Meany, at the close of his address, was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. An attempt has been made to get away from the real question at issue here by insinuations that Meany was only an inchoate, and not a respectable citizen. The attorney general did not think worth while to make any distinction between degrees or kinds of citizenship, but boldly declared that every natural-born subject of her majesty returning to his native country would be held for words spoken in his adopted country. What did our minister do? If an appeal was made in behalf of Meany, as I have no doubt there was, and he did not demand his instant release or his own passports home, he deserves the severest punishment which the citizens of this country, whose rights were thus trampled on, can inflict upon their servants.

Take another case. Henry Quinn, an American citizen, was arrested and thrown into prison, in Dublin, in August last. He was charged with no crime; he had violated no law, and he could not see why he should be imprisoned. He wrote to Minister Adams, and here is Minister Adams's reply:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
LONDON, August 22, 1867.

SIR: I am desired by Mr. Adams to acknowledge the reception of your letter of the 16th instant, and to express to you his regret at your painful situation. He is in hopes that the reestablishment of quiet in Ireland, and the subsidence of agitation in America, will soon open the way for the renewal of an application for a trial in your case, if not for your liberation. He will seize the earliest opportunity that may appear to him to promise a favorable result.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
BENJ. MORAN,
Secretary of Legation.

Mr. HENRY QUINN, Mountjoy Prison, Dublin.

Now, citizen Quinn had not asked Minister Adams for his regret at painful situations. Nor did he ask him to wait for any subsidence of agitation in America or reestablishment of anything in Ireland. He demanded that his minister, his servant for that purpose, should demand that if charges of any crime committed by him on British soil existed he should be speedily tried or his prison doors opened. I ask, sir, was it not the duty of our minister to inform the foreign secretary of Great Britain that if there existed no charges against him, or if they did exist and were not speedily tried, he should be set at liberty, and should no longer be kept imprisoned except on fair trial and due conviction, or he would send Farragut and Grant with their Yankee key to open the doors of their jails that the imprisoned American might go free?

Another case is that of Colonel Warren. In a letter which I received from him, dated Kildmainham prison, August 2, 1867, duly visited and corrected by some prison official, he says:

"I have violated no English law; my ambition is the obeying and protecting the laws of my adopted country. I have been in America since my boyhood, and was arrested a few days after my landing here. It is plain, then, that they hold me for opinions expressed in America, and ignore the United States right to confer citizenship."

After long delay, he was, on October 30 and 31, and on the 1st day of the present month, tried, and in his case the grossest insult has been offered to the United States, without rebuke or remonstrance from our minister. By section forty-seven of 6 George IV, chapter fifty, the jury array may be challenged if the prisoner be an alien, and an order made on his application for a jury de medietate lingue. Blackstone says this is a privilege as ancient as the time of King Ethelred. Deacon on Criminal Law, published in London in 1836, page 704, says:

"By section forty-seven nothing contained in the act shall deprive any alien indicted of any felony or misdemeanor of the right of being tried by a jury de medietate lingue. But on the prayer of every alien so indicted the sheriff shall return for one half of the jury a competent number of aliens, if there are so many in the town or place where the trial is had; and if not, then so many as shall be found there. And no such alien juror can be challenged for want of any of the qualifications required by the act; for this would indeed totally defeat the privilege, as an alien is incapable of holding lands. But any alien juror may be challenged for any other cause, such as partiality or the like."

This provision, which is worthy of all the praise Sir William Blackstone bestows upon it, is necessary in securing justice to Americans above all other people in the world; for, disguise it as you may, there is no people in the world against whom England manifests such antipathies. Her conduct in our recent struggle proves this too plainly. Warren challenged the array of his jury on the ground that they were all British subjects. Had the challenge been made by a Spaniard, a Turk, a Frenchman, a Brazilian, a Sandwich Islander, a Japanese or a Hottentot, it would have been granted. It was refused to the American. The report of the trial, in the Cork Examiner, states that the prisoner suggested that he was born in Cork of American parents. But at all events it was admitted that he was an American citizen, and Chief Baron Pigot met the question as follows:

"The chief baron said the bench had no doubt as to the course they should adopt. According to the law of England, he who was once under the allegiance of the Crown remained so forever. His lordship read a passage from Blackstone, which laid down that a natural born subject of the British Crown could never shake off that allegiance, no matter where he might take up his residence. The learned judge also quoted from Judge Story's 'Conflict of Law,' (page 23,) an eminent American authority, which stated that 'every nation had a right to bind its own subjects at all times and in all places.' Kent's Commentaries also affirmed that it was not in the power of any subject to shake off his allegiance. The same work, referring to America, laid down a similar doctrine, and concluded by saying: 'On this historical review of the discussion on American jurisprudence, the better opinion would seem to be that a citizen cannot renounce his allegiance to the United States Government without the permission of the Government be declared by law, and that, as there is no existing regulation in the case, the rule of the existing English law remains unaltered.' The application made for the prisoner was certainly a proper one, if he were entitled to it; but it was perfectly plain that a person who claimed such a jury should be an alien. He (the learned judge) could not, however, allow that proposition to be put forward on the present occasion without meeting it by a prompt and immediate denial. According to the law of England, a person born in the United Kingdom owes his allegiance to England forever, and no matter where he might be."

Warren then protested against being tried, proclaimed his American citizenship, and withdrew his counsel. A lawyer named Adair appeared to watch the case for the American Government, but was insulted by Chief Baron Pigot and Judge Keogh. The farce of trial went on; the prisoner in court, in reply to some observation, denounced the attorney general. He said such an act toward a man in his position was cruelty and cowardice; and he denounced it as the act of a liar and a coward. The report proceeds as follows:

"As the judges were rising on the bench, the chief baron—whose natural dignity, mildness, and conscientiousness were never more manifest, as they were never more valuable, than on this occasion—addressing the prisoner, said: "Prisoner, if, notwithstanding what has occurred, you, on reflection this evening, should decide, as I do indeed hope you may, to recall your resolution of not making defense or being defended, the court will freely permit you to do so, and, entirely and solely for your sake, I hope that you may reconsider that resolve—"

"Prisoner, (bowing profoundly.) My lord, with the deepest and most sincere respect for your lordship, I thank you; but I cannot alter that resolution."

"Chief Baron. Whether you do or not will not alter the procedure of the trial."

"Prisoner. Oh, I know that; but the real question at stake affects millions of my countrymen. I have acted on principle. I cannot be inconsistent with myself—"

"Chief Baron. Well, I am sorry; solely on your account."

"Prisoner. My lord, I am prepared for the consequences. I may be convicted here after any fashion the Government pleases; but (raising his voice) the case will be settled by a higher court—the American nation!"

Of course the prisoner was convicted. A correspondent, describing the closing scene, says:

"The scene in the Dublin court when Colonel Warren, finding that his status as an American citizen was deliberately ignored, and that the old and, as many supposed, exploded British doctrine of 'Once a subject always a subject' was audaciously enunciated by the court as the rule that was to govern his case, instructed his counsel to withdraw, is described as one of thrilling interest. No wonder; for, as was well remarked by a bystander, 'it was the first motion in a great writ of error to be tried by international law.'"

On the 7th of November, in the trial of Augustine Costello, who had landed with Colonel Nagle, Colonel Warren, and others, at Dungarvan, Judge Keogh, in his charge to the jury, said:

"The prisoner, through his counsel, had put on record an objection to the composition of the jury, not as objecting to any one individually, but claiming the right on behalf of the prisoner that he should have been tried by a jury half English or Irish and half foreign or American. If it be true that the prisoner at the bar, admitting himself to be a natural born subject of this realm, although since he had obtained letters of citizenship in America, ought to have had the jury he demanded, then he would have the full benefit of the entry on the record. It was their duty to say that there was no ground whatever for giving any such jury to the prisoner, or any person so circumstanced as he was; it was their duty, as administering the law here. He stated that it was not in the power of any jury subject of this realm to throw off his allegiance to the Crown. That was a subject which had been discussed, he might say, from the days of Cicero down to the present moment. It was a fact which should be borne in remembrance by all persons situated as the prisoner was."

"The trial of General Halpin commenced on the 8th of November. Halpin asked that his plea should be placed on the record: 'It was that he refused to plead.' The plea of not guilty was entered, and paper, pens, and ink supplied to the prisoner at his own request. Halpin then said, 'I am an American, and demand a jury of American citizens.'"

"Chief Baron. Do you allege that you were born in America?"

"Prisoner. I leave that to the Crown lawyers to discover."

"Chief Baron. Unless you state that you were or were not born in the country we must reserve your application."

"Then (said Halpin) I will permit the attorney general to pack a jury as he likes."

I beg leave to read the following extract from a letter of the Dublin correspondent of the New York Tribune, dated October 26, 1867, and published in the daily Tribune of November 8, 1867. It gives some idea of the public interest taken in the trial of these American citizens:

"Of these men General William Nagle and Colonel John Warren are regarded by the Crown as the most important, and their trials, it is expected, will follow immediately after those of Halpin and Fariola. I have reason to think that the question of the value to be attached to their American citizenship is one which will occupy a large space in those proceedings. General Nagle is a native-born American, and can claim that half his jury be composed of foreigners; Colonel Warren is a naturalized citizen of America, but of that fact the British Government will take no account whatever. They care not a pin for the naturalization papers which the prisoner can produce; he might just as well hand them in an old ballad, or a pawnbroker's ticket, or the programme of a performance by the Christy's Minstrels. They repudiate and scoff at those naturalization papers, and hold boldly to the doctrine that every born subject of the British sovereign is her or his subject all the days of his life. But is not this pretension inconsistent and absolutely irreconcilable with the declaration and the compact to which the American Government and those naturalized citizens are parties? Do not those men, when being accorded the status of American citizens, solemnly swear that they renounce all allegiance to all other Governments, and to that of Queen Victoria in particular? And does not the American Government, which has drawn up that form of pledge, and which accepts it, and exacts it as the condition and the very basis of naturalization, thereby undertake a certain responsibility which it is bound to make good against all the world? Does it not manifestly undertake to become in all respects the Government of these citizens for the future, and to ignore utterly the claims of any other Government on their allegiance? Just observe what is the position of the Irish race in America if those pretensions of England in their regard are to be allowed. Should a war break out at any time between America and England the latter Power could hang as traitors any Irishmen whom she might be able to capture from the American Army or Navy. At the same time the Americans could shoot any Irishman in their service who would refuse to fight against the British! Surely there is in this condition of things something for Mr. Seward to look to."

"This whole subject is keenly and eagerly discussed among Irishmen at this side of the water, and it ought to have a still more profound interest for the millions of the Irish race who have chosen their homes under what they supposed to be the protecting folds of the stars and stripes. It will be raised, as I have already intimated, during the approaching trials, and in a manner that will bring it prominently under the notice of both Governments."

"I had nearly forgotten to mention the curious circumstance that, while Colonel Warren and General Nagle are to be defended at the expense of the American Government, no such provision is being made for the defense of other men who stand in precisely the same position. They are American citizens; they have their papers to prove that fact; the charge against them is just the same; they were literally in the same boat."

"Why are two men only to have the aid of the Government, and several others, who are equally incapable of facing counsel for themselves, and who, just as much as their more fortunate companions, were American citizens and American soldiers, to be left to the tender mercies of British Crown prosecutors?"

I now come to the cases of the prisoners recently tried and convicted, and three of them, since this House last adjourned, hanged at Manchester for the release of Kelly and Deasy from a prison-van in the city of Manchester. In the rescue an officer named Brett was shot, and Justice Blackburn laid down the law that though one shot killed Brett, yet all who were present, aiding or abetting, though they had no ill-will against Brett, or even did not know of his existence, were equally guilty of constructive murder."

Application was made to the American minister by some of the prisoners claiming to be American citizens, but it does not appear that he took any trouble to aid them. On the contrary, he wrote to one of them the following letter. He had been indicted under the name of Gould, but his real name was O'Brien:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
LONDON, October 23, 1867.

SIR: By the direction of Mr. Adams I have the honor to acknowledge the reception of your letter to him of the 14th instant. From information received from a trustworthy source he finds that you are the same Michael O'Brien who was tried and claimed American protection at Liverpool in 1866. You then received sufficient warning from the United States consul at that place not to put yourself again in any danger, and Mr. Adams regrets to learn that you have failed to follow that prudent advice."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN MORAN,
Secretary of Legation.

I dare not trust myself with language to comment on that letter. I leave it to the American people, who require from him that his patience should not be exhausted in defending an American citizen only once. If an American citizen's rights are invaded seventy times seven it is the duty of the American minister to come to his aid seventy times seven; and neither the American consul nor the American minister has any right to tell an American citizen where he shall go or how often he shall come into danger. Wherever he goes, and how often soever he may be in danger, his flag owes him protection if he violates no law."

The man to whom that letter was written was on trial for his life. He was tried by jurors taken from an excited and ignorant crowd of stupid Anglo-Saxons. No decent time was given to prepare for trial, and by a packed jury on the testimony of the most degraded witnesses, testifying falsely for the shining reward offered for conviction, that American citizen, with that letter from the American minister, the last message from a country bound to protect him in his rights, was hung at Manchester day before yesterday."

Just before being sentenced, to the usual question why sentence of death should not be pronounced, he said:

"I shall commence by saying that every witness who has sworn anything against me has sworn to what is false. I have not thrown a stone to my recollection since I was a boy. I had no pistol in my possession on the day when this outrage was committed. You call it an outrage—I do not. I am a citizen of the United States of America, and if Charles Francis Adams had done his duty toward me, as he ought to do in this country, I would not be in this dock answering your questions now. Mr. Adams did not come, though I wrote to him. He did not come to see if I could not find evidence to disprove the charge, which I positively could if he had taken the trouble of sending or coming to see what I could do. I hope the American people will notice that part of the business."

"There is nothing in the close of my political career which I regret. I do not know of one act which could bring the blush of shame to my face, or make me afraid to meet my God or fellow-man. I would be most happy, and nothing would give me greater pleasure, than to die on the field for my country in defense of her liberties. As it is, I cannot die on the field, but I can die on the scaffold, I hope, as a soldier, a man, and a Christian."

Another prisoner named Shore, but whose real name was Condon, followed, and in the course of his remarks said:

"Now, sir, with regard to the opinions I hold on national matters—with regard to those men who have been released from that van, in which unfortunately life was lost—I am of opinion that certainly, to some extent, there was an excess. If those men had been in other countries, occupying other positions—if Jefferson Davis had been released in a northern city, there would have been a cry of applause throughout all England. If Garibaldi, whom I saw before I was shut out from the world, had been arrested, was released, or something of that kind had taken place, they would have applauded his bravery of the act. If the captives of King Theodore had been released, that, too, would have been applauded. But as it happened to be in England, of course it is an awful thing. We have been found guilty, and as a matter of course we accept our death as gracefully as possible. We are not afraid to die; at least, I am not."

"Nor I! 'Nor I!' 'Nor I!' said the other prisoners, with an electric enthusiasm."

"He continued: 'I have no sin or stain upon me, and I leave this world at peace with all. With regard to the other prisoners who are to be tried afterward, I hope our blood, at least, will satisfy the craving for it.'"

"I, too, am an American citizen, and, on English territory, I have committed no crime which makes me amenable to the Crown of England. I have done nothing, and, as a matter of course, I did expect protection, as this gentleman [pointing to Allen] has said, the protection of the ambassador of my Government. I am a citizen of the State of Ohio; but my name is not Shore. My name is Edward O'Meara Condon. I belong to Ohio, and there are loving hearts there that will be sorry for this. I have nothing but my best wishes to send them, and my best feelings, and assure them that I can die as a Christian and an Irishman, and that I am not ashamed or afraid of anything I have done, or the consequences, either before God or man. They would be ashamed of me if I was, in the slightest degree, a coward or concealed my opinions. I only trust again that those who are to be tried after us will have a fair trial, and that our blood will satisfy the craving which I understand exists. You will soon send us before our God, and I am perfectly prepared to go. I have nothing to regret, nothing to retract or take back. I can only say, 'God save Ireland.'"

"God save Ireland!" shouted the others by a common impulse; "God save Ireland!"

"The two judges put on their black caps, and in the hushed silence Mr. Justice Meller read the sentence of death against the five prisoners. They rose not only calm and defiant, but triumphant, and passed quickly from our sight, with one more cry, as they faced the crowd, before descending the staircase, of 'God save Ireland!'"

God save Ireland, shouted these brave American citizens from beneath the gallows, surrounded by a scowling mob of anti-Irish and anti-American Englishmen, and here from beneath this dome in these Halls of legislation, whose decrees shall yet govern the world, we reecho that cry, whether it leaps from our lips or heaves in our hearts, "God save Ireland!"

Mr. Speaker, I shall not go at length into the history of other cases, but I think I can safely say that hundreds of American citizens have been within the last two years arrested and imprisoned in Ireland. Among those American citizens now immured in British prisons, besides General William J. Nagle, a gallant officer of the Army of the Potomac, a native of the State of New York, and a resident of Brooklyn, I may mention Captain Joseph O'Carroll, Captain Michael Doherty, Lieutenant Joseph Lawlor, Lieutenant Morgan Burke, and Lieutenant Michael O'Brien. Of these five, all American citizens, and of the bravest of our Army, some have been in prison over twenty months and no charges made against them, nor any effort made, as far as we know, to have them tried or set at liberty. A large number of our arrested citizens have been released, there being no facts found against them, on condition of quitting the country; and when agreeing to quit the country were escorted to the ships by police, which is quite as great an outrage as their continued incarceration.

Since I offered these resolutions I have received a letter from Captain Michael Boyle, a resident of my district, stating that he had been imprisoned for eleven months with all the indignities which the minions of tyranny could heap upon him, and that in the place of receiving assistance from Minister Adams and Consul West of Dublin, he was treated with indifference or opposition in all his appeals to them. There is hardly a district represented in our Congress in which victims of this insult to America may not be found.

Now, sir, what would be the conduct of England toward her citizens if treated as ours has been? We have the answer in her preparation of the magnificent expedition she is fitting out to rescue her prisoners from the King of Abyssinia. It seems there are some Fenian Englishmen who were caught encouraging the enemies of King Theodorus to revolt against him. Even the English consul took sides against Theodorus, calling him a murderer, and communicating with his Turkish enemies. In fact he interfered in dangerous broils, and provoked the alarm and enmity of the Emperor, and so, having more cause than England ever had against any emissaries from this country, Theodorus of Ethiopia imprisoned several British subjects. And now all England is arming for the rescue. An army of thirty thousand of Punjab infantry and cavalry, with battalions of Europeans and batteries of royal artillery, with five thousand camels, or twice that number, to be furnished by the Viceroy of Egypt, to the saddles of which parks of artillery are to be fastened, longitudinally on pivots, and the camels taught to kneel while the gunners take aim and fire.

A light railway is, according to late English newspaper reports, to be included in the equipments. Rockets and hand-grenades are to be used. A great many other contrivances, adapted to the circumstances in which the army may find itself and the nature of the country through which it must pass, will doubtless be heard of. Lieutenant General Sir Robert Napier, Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay Army, has been nominated to the command of the expedition.

Sixteen large steamers are already under survey for the carriage of the expedition. These are scarcely a fraction of what will be required. Animals will have to be transported in numbers almost equal to those of soldiers and attendants, and vast quantities of coal will be needed. It is intended to put the entire army, with all its stores and munitions, in Abyssinia sometime in November instant. Then will begin the tug of war.

What sort of a tug it is likely to be we can partially learn from the contradictory information communicated by travelers in Abyssinia to the English journals and periodicals. The sea-coast of Abyssinia, like the Nubian coast above, is intensely hot, and the country, from fifty to two or three hundred miles inland, a hideous jungle. The tsetse-fly, fatal to every brute save the ox, is supposed to abound in some localities. The existence of the guinea-worm, which burrows in the tender parts of the human body, and usually makes some joint its crypt, causing terrible pain and permanent lameness, is both asserted and denied. The tape-worm is known to afflict the natives, but as it is presumed to result from eating raw or underdone meat, Europeans will not be so likely to suffer from it. Malaria, fevers, lack of water, horrors of all sorts have been enumerated as among the obstacles to the march of an army to the highlands.

The routes from Amphila Bay, on the Red sea, and from Edd, each run through a wide distance of hot low country to Aspa and Veju. The route from Massowah to Debra Tabor—where Theodorus most abides, and where, or at Magdala, the prisoners are supposed to be confined—is the one most popularly spoken of for the expedition. It is certainly the most direct of all, and a description of it is rather interesting.

Massowah, on the Red sea, is understood to be one of the most unhealthy spots on the globe's surface. But the water there is deep and suitable for landing; transports could ride in security, and the strip of intervening space between the sea and the highlands is here at its minimum—twenty-five miles. A plain, ten miles long, extends to Taranta mountain. The sands of this plain dry up most of the year a torrent called the Hadas. Water can be obtained anywhere along it by digging a few feet. At the foot of Taranta mountain a defile begins, closely hemmed in by cliffs. Its average breadth is only twenty or thirty yards. Troops would have to march in single file fifteen hours to the summit. Five hundred brave and well-armed natives could hold the pass against an army. The rocks and foliage on either side form an excellent ambush, and the former could be hurled directly down upon the heads of an enemy in many places.

The Abyssinians are heroes, intrepid, indefatigable, and almost invulnerable. They can march twenty leagues in ten hours, fight for a whole day without food or drink, sleep in the water and in the mud, and inspired with a fanaticism equaled only by their hatred of the foreigner. The women are the modern Spartans. In battle they form a sort of rear rank, taking care of the wounded and bringing up ammunition under the hottest fire. "The coward who retreats is no longer a man; his wife divorces him, his betrothed rejects him, his priest curses him. Paradise is the lot of the fallen hero: the coward goes to the other place."

The Queen's message to Parliament, just received by telegraph, while she is hanging our citizens for crimes less flagrant than her subjects are perpetrating against her brother monarch, thus alludes to the expedition:

"King Theodorus having rejected all the demands of Great Britain for the release of her subjects, cruelly and without just cause imprisoned by him, her majesty had no alternative but to send a military expedition to Abyssinia, and reference is made to the supply bills needful to defray the expenses of the war."

And while all this pomp and circumstance are exhibited by England to rescue her subjects, our armies and Navy are not moving; our minister is playing reticent; Napier is moving on the enemy, while Grant's sword is rusting in its scabbard, and Farragut's fleet fires salutes to the very forts which he should be bombarding.

England is consoling herself that in this expedition she will have to contend only with the Christian population of Abyssinia proper; that is to say, with the people of the high table lands. As auxiliaries they may reckon on the Beni-Amr, all the Bichari tribes, the Baggara Hamran, all the Arabs of the province of Gedaref, the Chaghie around Mechref, the Galla Abyssinians, all old enemies of the Amharas or Abyssinians of the high plateaux.

It is thus that England gives protection to her citizens and inspires respect in foreign nations; it is thus she calculates the aid she will receive in the country she is invading; while we, crazy in our insane quarrels at home, are permitting our flag to be used for wiping the boot of Europe. Our ministers stand by in silence, and the eagle's beak is full and her wings are wet with the filth of the gutter in which her representatives kneel to beg for mercy when they should be up and striking for right.

The fact that Baron Pigot, Judge Keogh, and others refer to American laws to sanction their assertion of the doctrine of perpetual allegiance, and which may be relied upon in some measure to justify the conduct of our minister, deserves notice. My attention had long since been attracted to it, and when in college at New Haven I corresponded with one of the most distinguished of our New England judges, Roger Minot Sherman, of Connecticut. I have before me a letter which I received from him, dated Fairfield, December 28, 1842. After some introductory personal remarks, he says:

FAIRFIELD, December 28, 1842.

DEAR SIR: * * * * * Allegiance, in the general and unqualified form in which it now exists by the laws of England, had its origin when government was considered as intended for the benefit of those in authority only, and the good of the great mass of population was little, if at all, regarded. From that selfishness which is so extensively influential, not only in Governments, but in all human actions, both social and personal, we might readily infer that while legislative power was withheld from subjects their interests would be no further regarded than they involved the welfare of their rulers. This was the character and spirit of the feudal system in its earlier stages, and in that the doctrine of allegiance, as it now exists in England, had its origin. The allegiance due to the Government is absolute and unchangeable by the act of the subject.

Whether the law is the same in the United States is hardly an open question. In the cases in which it has been the subject of judicial consideration the opinions of judges, so far as they have been expressed, are that the English law of allegiance is our own. The disinclination to give an opinion on this point manifested by some of the judges of the Supreme Court would seem to indicate a doubt in their minds whether this could be recognized as American law. But I presume their hesitation generally resulted from the belief that the case did not require a settlement of that important question. This delicacy is generally felt and shown when there is no doubt in the mind of the judge, if the subject is discussed as if unsettled, and there is no previous decision of binding authority.

But in the case of Shanks vs. Dupont, in 3 Wheaton, Mr. Justice Story, in giving the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, says, on page 246, that "the general doctrine is that no persons can, by any act of their own, without the consent of the Government, put off their allegiance and become aliens." I consider this as the law of the United States; and whether it be considered as grounded on national right or as a rule of policy it is a just and necessary rule of law. The fault lies not in the general law, but in the want of such a legislative rule of consent on the part of the Government as is necessary to mitigate its severity, by allowing expatriation to the citizens, with such forms and solemnities as may be prescribed, in all cases where such allowance is consistent with the interest and safety of the country. It is essential to national organization that every one's country should be known. Individual rights and liabilities, and the rights and obligations of the Government, require this. With such limitations as sound political wisdom might devise the present unreasonable and unjust restraints upon one of the sacred rights conferred by the law of nations—the right of choosing our own country—would be removed, as far as would be consistent with the just claims of the Government to which its allegiance is due. Some of the States have attempted this; but they cannot affect the allegiance due to the United States. Such was the law of Virginia, passed in 1792. (3 Dallas, 136, note.) A proper regulation is more imperiously demanded in many other countries than in this, because the great tide of emigration is setting toward this country, not from it. It is very unjust that those who select this country as a home, often with the virtual acquiescence and even with the connivance of their Governments, should, in the event of war between us and the nation which they leave, be subjected to the severities which are in such cases visited upon those who honestly become the residents and citizens of another country while in friendship with their own. We have provided for their reception, and prescribed the terms of their new relation. We require a renunciation of their allegiance to their former Government, and an oath of fidelity to this. This is all we do, and is no more than we ought to do. The laws of a foreign State we cannot alter, nor can the emigrant complain that we leave it to him to become embarrassed with a double allegiance or not, as he pleases. So far as he is affected the grievance results from the laws of his own country, not ours. But in justice to the few citizens of the United States who may wish to change their country, and as an example to other nations, Congress ought, without delay, to enact laws prescribing the forms of renunciation and the terms on which the consent of this Government should be given to the transfer of allegiance to a foreign sovereignty. The law that expatriation shall never be effected without the consent of the Government is just. To withhold that consent in cases where the change of allegiance is a rightful exercise of personal liberty is unjust and oppressive. This is the point where legislation is necessary, and its early provisions are loudly invoked in behalf of the rights of man in all the nations of the earth.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ROGER M. SHERMAN.

Mr. W. E. ROBINSON, New Haven, Connecticut.

Accompanying this letter was a memorandum of a case pertinent to the subject and familiar to lawyers, as follows:

1 Dodson Reports, 221, case of the Ann.

This ship, under American colors, was seized in the river Thames on August 1, 1812, as an American ship. By an order in council issued on the 26th of Noember, 1812, "all vessels under the flag of the United States of America which are bona fide and wholly the property of his majesty's subjects, and not purchased by them subsequent to the date of hostilities on the part of the United States of America," &c., were, if captured, to be restored to the British Crown.

A claim had been given for this ship by Mr. Smith, describing himself to be a British subject. It appears he was a native of Scotland, but that he had been admitted a citizen of the United States about sixteen years before; that he sailed in this vessel as master from Charleston, in the United States, to the river Thames.

Sr W. Scott: "The question, therefore, comes to this—Whether the claimant is, quoad this property, to be considered a British subject.

"For some purposes he is undoubtedly so to be considered. He is born in this country, and is subject to all the obligations imposed upon him by his nativity. He cannot shake off his allegiance to his native country, or divest himself altogether of his British character by a voluntary transfer of himself to another country. For the more purposes of trade he may, indeed, transfer himself to another State, and may acquire a new national character.

"It never could be the intention of his majesty's Government that the benefit of this order should be extended to a person who has thrown off his allegiance and estranged himself from his British character as far as his own volition and act could do.

"Ship condemned."

Prior to this I had called the attention of Congress to the subject. I hold in my hand the original draft of a petition which I presented through Senator Clay, of Kentucky. It goes over the question now involved, and is dated New Haven, January 15, 1842. Though written over a quarter of a century ago, when I was at college in that city, it may not be out of place to print it now as it was written then.

I have before me the Senate Journal of the second session of the Twenty-Seventh Congress, February 18, 1842, and on page 176 appears the following:

"Mr. CLAY presented the memorial of W. E. Robinson, praying that the rights secured to native citizens may be extended to naturalized immigrants from foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations."

The memorial was as follows:

To the honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled on the first Monday of December, 1841.

The undersigned, a native of Ireland and a naturalized citizen of the United States, now resident in New Haven, Connecticut, would respectfully ask the attention of Congress to the situation in which the naturalized citizens of this Republic would be placed by the occurrence of a war between this country and England. Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries on American law, referring to the naturalized citizen, says:

"If there should be war between his parent state and the one to which he has attached himself, he must not arm himself against the parent state; and if he be recalled by his native Government he must return, or incur the pain and penalties of a contempt."

Sergeant in his "Constitutional Law," says:

"Congress has never passed any act regulating the manner and terms according to which the right of expatriation shall be exercised, although several judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have expressed their opinions that such a law is much wanted. In the few cases that have occurred in the courts of the United States in which this important point has been agitated it seems admitted that Congress has power to determine the mode in which expatriation may be exercised, but with regard to the law at present it is not easy to deduce a general rule from the opinions expressed." The law as here stated by such eminent jurists places a large portion of our citizens in great danger and difficulty between this and other countries. Irishmen, particularly, have given their allegiance with their hearts to this country; they beg that the law which would divide this homage of their hearts may be rendered null and void by an act of Congress. They would not serve two masters. They are bona fide citizens of this country; citizens, too, by acts of the supreme power of the State; and yet our courts have never decided that the acts of Congress which tender to them the right to be naturalized would secure the blessing of permanent citizenship in this free Republic. No act of Congress, no decision of our courts, has shaken the power of the feudal principle of perpetual allegiance—a principle at war with the spirit of our Revolution, which makes man the vassal of the lord, and chains him to the soil on which he was born as the property of his superior. Such is the still living principle of English common law, which our courts have strengthened rather than weakened. In 1795 the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Talbot vs. Janson, appear to have been of the opinion that, without a special law of Congress, the doctrine of perpetual allegiance must still prevail. In 1797 Chief Justice Ellsworth of this State, in the case of Isaac Williams, gave his opinion that if the immigrant by complying with our naturalization laws became embarrassed by contracting contradictory obligations it was his own folly or his fault. Several decisions and opinions, from that of Chief Justice Ellsworth in 1797 to that of Mr. Justice Story in 1822, have either avoided the question or have confirmed the common law doctrine.

That England would still assert her power over our naturalized citizens in case of a war may be seen from the proclamation issued by George III in 1807, by which he recalled from foreign service all seamen and sea-faring men who were natural-born subjects of Great Britain, and ordered them to withdraw themselves from such service and return home, on pain of being proceeded against for a contempt, and that no naturalization papers would be respected. If we still owe allegiance to the parent country, why do our naturalization laws compel us under oath to renounce it? Why make laws by an American Congress which an English monarch may and would trample on? Surely it should not be the opinion of our courts that it is folly or a fault to do what American law has made right to be done. Surely it is right to render sure the boon so liberally granted. England asserts the omnipotence of her own Parliament, and she must admit that the American Congress can alter or define the course of the common law with regard to American citizens, whether native or adopted. A war may arise between England and this country at no distant day. If such should be the case Irishmen would arm against England, and would not return home, even if called under fear of pain and penalties for a contempt. The contempt would certainly exist. The memory of oppression (which is all that Ireland owes to England) and the love for American freedom would nerve every Irish arm to strike for "liberty at every blow." Montgomery and others of Ireland fought for this country of old, and their fellow-countrymen would do so now, in defiance of threats from a Power which would grind them in the dust at home, nor suffer them to enjoy liberty abroad.

Irishmen know of no such thing as divided allegiance to this country; they should not be liable to its consequences. They owe, they acknowledge none to England. It is bad enough to be born under misgovernment, misery, and rags without owing to them perpetual allegiance. Convictions under this law are usually followed, both in this country and England, by pardons. If it dare not exact its penalties it is not too good to be abrogated. Nor should native citizens of this country, if any should wish to sell their birthright, be held to perpetual allegiance. If no stronger principle than this binds them to her, she is better without them. Your petitioner knows that you cannot alter the laws of England, but you can set the example in repudiating this anti-republican doctrine. You can set your own countrymen free from its shackles, and thereby show to England and to all other nations, that you recognize the principle that man is his own master and no man's vassal. If you cannot change the law of England you can deny its power at least over the naturalized citizens of this Republic. It would be hard indeed to see Irishmen and other naturalized citizens hazarding their lives in the Navy and Army of this country, as their inclination and your laws would urge them to do, and then to see them taken prisoners while defending our stars and stripes, to meet the fate of traitors under the sanction of American law. Your petitioner knows that Irishmen will be grateful to you for passing such a law as shall secure to them perpetually what they hold dearer than life, the blessings and rights of American citizenship. He would, therefore, respectfully ask your honorable body to frame such a law as in your collective wisdom you may think best calculated to secure the blessings of American liberty, without reversion, to those who are willing to live or, if need be, to die for their adopted country; and your petitioner, as in duty and by inclination bound, will ever pray for glory and prosperity to our common country and wisdom to her statesmen.

W. E. ROBINSON.

NEW HAVEN, January 15, 1842.

This petition I had followed up by similar petitions from other parties. I beg leave to refer to the remarks of Mr. Clay, on presenting one of these from the Hibernian Providence Association, of which I was a member, to the Senate, on the 29th of March, 1842. They will be found in the Congressional Globe, second session Twenty-Seventh Congress, (1841-42,) page 365, and are as follows:

"Mr. CLAY presented a memorial from the New Haven Hibernian Providence Society. Mr. C. said the memorial was similar in character to that presented by him a few weeks ago. The memorialists represent that by the common law England claims perpetual allegiance from all those born on her soil, and the same law obtains here, as may be seen from Kent, Story, Sergeant, and other writers on common law, as well as from various decisions in the courts of the United States. The petitioners ask the passage of a law repudiating this odious doctrine. The petitioners feel that it is wrong to make them, by their naturalization, renounce their allegiance, when the jurists and the courts of the country say they cannot shake it off. They hope that Congress will pass a law declaring that Congress do not recognize the doctrine of perpetual allegiance. Mr. C. remarked that the petitioners are fearful, in the event of a war with England, and in the contingency of any of them falling into the hands of the enemy, if the doctrine of perpetual allegiance hold, it might subject them to be arraigned and punished for treason, if found in arms against England. They ask protection against such an emergency. Mr. C. did not know that any amendment could be made to existing law to give more protection to them. The only protection that we could give them against such doctrines would be such as would be given with the cannon of the country. He asked that the reading of the petition be dispensed with, and that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

"Mr. LINN desired to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Kentucky to a circumstance which occurred during the last war, when thirty-three soldiers of the American Army were made prisoners by the British troops, and sentenced to be executed, because they were of British origin. A number of officers of the British army having been made prisoners by the American Army would undoubtedly have been executed in retaliation, and very properly, had the execution of the soldiers taken place. Peace, however, very fortunately intervened, and the matter was allowed to pass off without further notice. It served, however, as a practical illustration of what that Government was disposed to do upon the occurrence of similar circumstances.

"Mr. CLAY said he recollected the incident, and it suggested certainly one of the modes which might be employed to vindicate the rights of the adopted citizens of the United States. But he (Mr. CLAY) did not believe that, in the event of a war, which he hoped might be averted, the British Government would venture to act upon the doctrine of perpetual allegiance—a doctrine belonging to an age gone by, an exploded doctrine, a doctrine which could not be maintained in practice. It would be a detestable course on the part of Great Britain if she should attempt to enforce it. What had been her policy in years past? What was her policy now? It was to afford every encouragement to emigration, principally to her own colonies, it was true; but to encourage emigration everywhere, she induced her subjects to leave the British empire and incorporate themselves as members of foreign communities; and if afterward she was to get hold of them and punish them as traitors, it would be an act of treachery on her part most execrable. He did not apprehend that there would be any particular difficulty in the event of a war, still the solicitude which the petitioners severally feel we must all sympathize with, and if it be practicable to add to their security by any legislation, he was sure there would be a disposition on all sides of the Senate to afford further protection. The petition was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary."

Now, you will see that Mr. Clay's remedy for the difficulty a quarter of a century ago was American cannon, and as I was then a Clay Whig, in that doctrine at least, as in most other respects, I am a Clay Whig still.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that time will not allow me to review the services these brave men, now suffering under British oppression, have rendered our country in sustaining our flag against our enemies; how, through the smoke of battle and the carnival of death, they rushed into the very jaws of destruction to preserve untarnished that flag which they hoped would protect them throughout the world. Colonel Nagle, one of these brave fellows, fought in the army of the Potomac throughout the war, and in some of the bloodiest battles in which that army fought he went in with a full complement of men under his command and came out almost alone. Four brothers entered the service of the Union; two of them died in the service of the country upon which he now calls for the vindication of his rights almost in vain.

Two or three more topics I must briefly touch upon. You will observe that I have not referred to the case of Koszta, whom Captain Ingraham rescued from claims of perpetual allegiance at the mouth of our cannon in the bay of Smyrna. Our cases are too strong to be compared with his. He was not a full citizen, having only declared his intentions, and had committed some political crimes before coming to this country against the country to which he returned. Our cases are all American citizens and most of them American soldiers, fully, some of them doubly, naturalized by the law and by the service of their swords, who have committed no crime on British soil before or since their emigration; and yet while Koszta was rescued and ably vindicated, these men fail in obtaining protection or rescue.

In the remarks of one of the prisoners executed at Manchester day before yesterday Garibaldi was referred to. The conduct of the American minister toward that Italian outlaw, who though claiming American citizenship never drew his sword in defense of this country, was in marked contrast with that of our minister to England toward these naturalized American citizen soldiers.

And now, sir, what do we demand from our Government or from England? Nothing that is unreasonable. I do not claim that naturalized American citizens may invade England and there commit crimes with impunity. What we do demand may be summed up in three sentences:

1. No American citizen traveling in Great Britain, or elsewhere, on business or pleasure, shall be imprisoned without proper charges or sworn information being made against him, and upon these charges or information, even under their suspensions of habeas corpus, a fair and speedy trial shall be secured to him.

2. That no American citizen, thus traveling, shall be ordered to quit the country where he may be, or be escorted to ships going thence, or be placed in any position compelling or inducing him to accept that degrading alternative.

3. That the benefit of English law shall be fully accorded to all American citizens, whether native or adopted, the same as to aliens or strangers from other countries.

And if any of these three rights are invaded, evaded, or denied, let our minister be recalled, and apply Henry Clay's specific, American canon, or shut them out from our country, and let them perish, as they speedily would only for their intercourse with us, for England could not live without us. I have no wish to injure England; I have never advocated any invasion of her soil or any violation of her laws. I have no hatred against her people; but if she does not behave herself we must compel her. She must respect our citizens, and learn that we have a flag. She must learn, also, that we sympathize with Ireland, and that we have a right to do so. We have just as much right to Ireland as she has. Any claim she has to Ireland is founded in fraud; and no matter how long she has possession, being founded in fraud, it is void ab initio. The statute of limitations never runs in favor of fraud. We have really more right in Ireland than she has. We have Ireland's heart, which she never had. We have more of her people. Besides, England has been trying for seven centuries to conquer and govern Ireland. In this she has never succeeded, and never can. An inferior race, as the English certainly is, never did, and never can, conquer a superior race like the Irish—superior to the English in all the arts of war and peace, as soldiers, statesmen, orators, poets, painters, and sculptors.

And this country, too, is Irish. I venture to say one half of the members of this House and of this Congress are Irish, either wholly or partially so. One half of the people of this country are such. There are from fifteen to twenty million people either wholly or in part of Irish blood, and looking forward we can easily guess what it will be. Why, you talk of the colonies of Plymouth Rock and Jamestown! The whole colonies of Plymouth and Jamestown, with all their descendants, for one hundred years, all counted, living and dead, did not equal the number of Irish emigrants frequently landing at Castle Garden in New York in five minutes! Now, then, what will this country do with Ireland when her children number here one hundred million, as they very soon will? They will not stand quietly by and see an alien enemy whose claims, founded in fraud, oppress or injure her.

I have introduced these resolutions with no feeling against any one. If I have spoken in condemnation of any one it is to vindicate a great principle. Our ministers abroad—many of them—seem to have forgotten the stubborn love which Americans at home have for right and justice, and the absolute unconcern with which they treat all the tinsel of royalty and the pretensions of rank. We want men for foreign ministers of more backbone and stiffer knees than some we have had. We want such men of backbone for Congressmen and committees. "Are we a nation?" If so, let us show it, not by broils at home, but with backbone abroad; and let the world know that our honor is wounded in the slightest insult to any of our citizens, and that all such insults shall speedily be avenged.

Sir, I have performed my duty in this respect. This whole matter will now go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and from that committee, from this House, and from Congress I implore prompt attention and such action as their wisdom may suggest.

The country is aroused on this subject. A meeting of thousands of naturalized American soldiers was held on Saturday evening at Cooper Institute, in New York city. The resolutions, including one approving of our action in this House, were adopted with great enthusiasm. Another meeting will be held at the same place to-morrow evening. Others still will follow throughout the entire country.

My time has now expired and I must close, though I have not had time to do justice to the subject under discussion; but give me one minute to conclude with a verse from a poem recited at the New York meeting, and published in yesterday morning's New York Herald. It is from the brilliant pen of that gallant soldier, genuine Irishman, and true American, "Miles O'Reilly":

"Oh, as citizens—Americans—
We gloried in the name,
And on many a field our blood we shed
To guard your flag of fame;
But to-day we lie in bonds, as if
More felons we had been—
The only charge that England brings,
'Those boys were for the Green!'

"We are citizens twice over,
By the law and by the sword,
By adoption and by service;
But our claims are now ignored;
Say, Uncle Sam, is this your wish,
And do you really mean
That you've outlawed all your faithful sons
Whose birth was of the Green?"

I now move that the pending resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, together with the following, for their immediate action:

Resolved, That the committee be requested, at their earliest convenience, to report a bill or declaration to this House providing for the expatriation of such of our citizens as may wish to be naturalized in other countries, and how far we shall protect the rights of natives of other countries naturalized in the United States.

Mr. BANKS. I move the previous question on referring the resolutions of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to refer was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the execution of the order directed to the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to the impeachment of the President.

Mr. BOUTWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment, to introduce a resolution?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If it will consume no time.

Mr. SPALDING. It will meet with no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield to hear the resolution read.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask leave to submit the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas there are an unusually large number of special committees of this House, which, with some standing committees, are authorized to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses under oath; and whereas many of said committees have pursued their investigations in places remote from the Capitol, and at great expense to the people; and whereas the pressure of taxation renders retrenchment in public expenditures not only a virtue but a necessity on the part of Congress:

Be it therefore resolved, That no committee of the House shall be authorized hereafter to send for persons and papers, to examine witnesses, or to travel at the public expense, without the further order of the House be first had and obtained.

No objection was made, and the resolution was received.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the preamble and resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask to offer an amendment, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object to the amendment. I yielded simply for the offering of a resolution.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] whether this resolution is intended to prevent committees sitting in this city from taking testimony in the regular course of their duties? It seems to me it will have that effect. It is so sweeping in its terms as to cover all committees, whether sitting here or elsewhere.

Mr. SPALDING. The resolution means what it expresses—that, without the order of the House, committees shall not have the power to subject the people to such expenses as the resolution indicates.

Mr. PRUYN. It seems to me that the resolution proposes to limit the powers of the committees to an unprecedented extent.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like to say a word:

Mr. SPALDING. I object to any discussion.

The SPEAKER. No debate can be allowed except by unanimous consent, the previous question having been seconded. The question now is, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask whether this resolution will repeal the authority heretofore given to committees in regard to this matter?

The SPEAKER. The House must construe the resolution for itself.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I rise to a question of privilege. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report the testimony taken by that committee in the matter of charges made against the President of the United States relative to impeachment. That testimony I present, together with a report and a resolution adopted by the majority of the committee. In presenting the report I desire to say to the House that all that part of the report which relates to the testimony taken, and to the consideration of the law involved in the case, was prepared by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] a member of the committee. It has fallen to my lot to present the report to the House, for the reason that it was the pleasure of the Speaker to place me second upon the Committee on the Judiciary; and the chairman of the committee, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa,] dissenting from the report of the majority, it was, by general consent of the members forming the majority, agreed that I should present the report to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] that this report should take the ordinary course—that it be laid on the table and printed. I have never known a report of this kind to be read in extenso when presented.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield to the gentleman to make the motion he indicates. I have no choice myself in regard to the matter.

Mr. ELIOT. I hope the report will be read. I doubt whether we can appropriate the time more judiciously than by hearing this report. I call for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, under the ruling of many occupants of the chair, on a motion that a report or other document be laid on the table and printed, any member may demand the reading of the document. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] demands the reading of this report, and the Clerk will read it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will agree to sit here and hear the report read through I will not object to the reading.

Mr. BROOKS. It is perfectly evident from past experience that the House will get tired of having this report read in fifteen or twenty minutes. Let me suggest, then, that the several branches of the committee state in substance what it is they report, so that the curiosity of the House and the country may be gratified. If this be done it will answer all purposes and be a saving of time. I am told that this report alone will occupy five hours to read it. I think the public curiosity and the curiosity of the House will be satisfied by a substantial statement of what are the various recommendations of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Read.

Mr. ELIOT. I think myself we ought to have it read, but gentlemen around me here say that it will occupy too much time. If there is any public business that ought to be transacted to-day I will withdraw the call; if not, I persist in it.

Mr. MILLER. I insist on the report being read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report for some time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to suspend the further reading of these reports, and that they be ordered to be printed. I understand it will take ten hours to read them, and the reading will be of no good to any one if they take that long. If any one makes objection, I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands from the author of this report that it will take five hours to read it.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is another report to be read. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] to withdraw his demand for the reading, so that these reports may be ordered to be printed, and not delay the public business with this useless reading.

Mr. MILLER. I withdraw the demand.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest that the summary and resolutions of the several reports be read.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no objection to that.

The Clerk read accordingly, concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

[Applause and hisses in the galleries and upon the floor.]

The SPEAKER. Any person in the galleries manifesting applause or hissing will be removed from the gallery by order of the Speaker, who is determined to maintain the order and decorum of this Hall, if possible; and the Doorkeeper will direct his deputies to remove any person manifesting applause or dissent in regard to the proceedings of this House. As both sides were guilty, the Chair thinks it a proper time to state that fact.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask that the consideration of this resolution shall be postponed until Wednesday of next week after the morning hour, and from day to day till disposed of. I move also that the report be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present in behalf of myself and my colleague on the committee, the honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE], a minority report. I will not consume any time, sir, in making a statement with reference to it. I will barely state the conclusions at which we have arrived; which are that we declare that the case before us presented by the testimony and measured by the law does not disclose such high crimes and misdemeanors within the meaning of the Constitution as requires the interposition of the constitutional power of this House, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the proposed impeachment of the President of the United States, and that the subject be laid upon the table.

This is signed by the name of the gentleman from Vermont and my own. I ask that it be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and the honorable member from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] of the Judiciary Committee, I am authorized to say that we fully concur in the resolution just offered by the chairman of the committee, and that in the main we entirely concur in the argument presented by the chairman in regard to the law governing the case and the application of the evidence thereto. But on some points there are matters of difference between ourselves and associates of the minority of the committee, and on part of myself and the gentleman from Wisconsin of the Judiciary Committee, I ask to introduce and have printed separate views. As I have said, we concur in the resolution offered by the chairman.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay upon the table will be reserved; as otherwise it must be at once acted on.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My purpose is to offer it before the final vote.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If it be proper to do it, I will modify my motion so as to embrace all the reports—the majority and the two minority reports. I move that they be printed together, and that the whole subject be postponed until next Wednesday week, after the morning hour, and made the special order from day to day till disposed of.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be directed to furnish to the House a list of the several investigating committees now acting under the authority of the House; and also a list of the regular committees of the House authorized to summon witnesses and take testimony, together with a statement of the number of clerks, agents, and employees of each committee, the authority under which they are employed and paid, and at what rate of compensation; and further, to furnish a full statement of all the expenses of all the investigations of the said committees, and all the items thereof, and out of what fund said expenses have been paid.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EFFECT OF IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. KELSEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill declaring the effect of an impeachment by the House of Representatives of the President or Vice President or any of the civil officers of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. What position does that put it on the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is not on the Calendar; it is only referred to the committee.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. KELSEY. I hope the motion to lay on the table will not pass.

Mr. BLAINE. My object is to keep the bill from being brought back into the House by a motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

BUILDING SHIPS OF WAR.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House it is unnecessary to proceed further at present in building or equipping ships of war.

Mr. PIKE. I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that resolution will be put on its passage.

Mr. ELIOT. I object to its passage, but not to its reference.

Mr. PIKE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the resolution now.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to—ayes 81, noes 40.

Mr. PIKE. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELIOT and Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SPALDING asked for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

The resolution was then referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PURCHASE OF TERRITORY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That in the present financial condition of the country any further purchases of territory are inexpedient, and this House will hold itself under no obligation to vote money to pay for any such purchase unless there is greater present necessity for the same than now exists.

Mr. BANKS. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I move to suspend the rules, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANKS. For the information of the House, I would like the gentleman from Wisconsin to state what he understands by the word "further." I do not think it implies what he has stated to me as his intention.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend that resolution to apply to the purchase of Walrusia. That is something that has already transpired, and it may be that this House will feel itself under obligation to sanction what has been done there. I certainly shall never feel under such obligation. But it is rumored in the papers—whether it is true or not I cannot say—that the Secretary of State has been making another purchase without consulting with any one, in the absence of any public sentiment requiring it, or of any demand from any quarter. I intend that that action shall be covered by the resolution. I intend to serve notice upon the kingdom of Denmark that this House will not pay for that purchase; and I mean to serve notice upon the world that we will pay for no purchase that the Secretary of State, on his own motion, may see proper to make—that no purchase will be sanctioned that is not demanded by the public sentiment and the best interest of the country. That is what I mean by the resolution. It does not, as I understand, commit any one concerning Walrusia. Upon that subject I will have something to say at some future time.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow me one word, I will say that the resolution does not accomplish the purpose he intends. It does not and cannot prevent the House voting any appropriation of this kind that it may choose hereafter, and it implies what it ought not to imply—that if territory should be purchased by the executive department, and the purchase be confirmed by treaty and approved by the Senate, this House would be obliged to make the appropriation, which I do not admit; certainly if this resolution fails to pass it will at least imply that, and if it pass it will not bind the House in any way whatever. I trust that the rules will not be suspended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. This is a declaration of the opinion of this House; it is serving notice upon the world. I offer it in that view, and I want to see who is willing to vote against it.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were—yeas 93, nays 43, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnett, De los R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Benton, Blaine, Boutwell, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Butler, Cake, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Culjom, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Perry, Fields, Gravely, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Halburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, McClurg, Mercer, Moore, Morgan, Morrell, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Polsey, Price, Sawyer, Shanks, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Tribble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Axtell, Banks, Barnes, Birchard,

Blair, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Eldridge, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Richard D. Hubbard, Jenckes, Johnson, Kerr, Kofotham, Maynard, Miller, Mullins, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Prayn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, Upson, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Woodbridge, and Woodward—43.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Archer, Ballwin, Barnum, Benjamin, Cobb, Cornell, Dawes, Dixon, Eggleston, Eliot, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hoffman, Humphrey, Kitchen, Koontz, Ladin, Lincoln, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Orth, Raun, Robertson, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taft, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—46.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAILS TO FOREIGN PORTS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill amendatory of certain acts for carrying the mails to foreign ports; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

THE SINKING FUND.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas by the act of February 25, 1862, providing for the issue of legal-tender notes, one per cent. of the coin revenues of the United States are set apart as a special fund to be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House the amount of such sinking fund, when, where, and how the same has been invested according to the terms of said act.

THE SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reception of the resolution?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not object, but I wish to remark, for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that an effort was made to have this sinking fund or reserved fund established under that law when one or two finance bills were pending, but it was opposed by a large majority of the House, and the Secretary, no doubt acting upon the vote of the House, has not made any such reservation. I think the information is patent to everybody without official inquiry, but if the gentleman desires it I have no objection.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish also to say, for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that when the gold bill was under discussion in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, I called the particular attention of the House to the clause in the act of 1862 with a view to inquire what was the condition of the sinking fund to which his resolution refers. It was then said, I think by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, at any rate by somebody who claimed to understand the matter, that the fund had not been raised, and no attempt had been made to raise it, for the reason that the Government was still issuing its evidences of indebtedness and selling them; and therefore it amounted simply to reducing the Government indebtedness so much if they failed to raise the sinking fund. I confess the answer was not at all satisfactory to me.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to get an authoritative answer why a law of Congress is not obeyed, if, as it is said, it is not obeyed, and to have before this House and before the country exactly the condition in which the public debt stands. The law of Congress requires that one per cent. of the entire coin revenue of the United States shall be set apart as a sinking fund. Some gentlemen say that has not been done. If not, then I want to know why not. I trust there will be no objection to obtaining this information in an authoritative form.

Mr. PRUYN. Certainly not. I entirely agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The resolution was then adopted.

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

Mr. PILE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill declaring the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, a port of entry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HIGBY. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BURR: The petition of Solomon M. Murphy, late sergeant company D, third Illinois cavalry volunteers, for compensation for property lost during the war to suppress the rebellion.

Also, affidavits of David R. Sparks and George M. Sanders supporting the same.

By Mr. FERRY: The petition of William H. Conover, of the fourth Michigan cavalry, praying for the payment of the reward to the captors of Jefferson Davis, the so-called president of the late Confederate States.

By Mr. HIGBY: The petition of the Terminal Central Pacific Railway Company.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of 100 citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, for the impeachment and deposition of Andrew Johnson from the office of President of the United States.

Also, a petition upon the same subject from 40 citizens of Pennsylvania.

By Mr. PIKE: The petition of Eliza Hudson and others, relative to pensions of naval officers.

By Mr. PLANTS: The petition of the members of the court and bar for the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida, and a number of citizens of said State, praying for a change in the times and places of holding the courts in said district, and for other purposes.

By Mr. SCHENCK: A memorial of Captain R. W. Riell, United States Navy, asking to be placed on active service.

Also, the petition of colored citizens of Paducah, Kentucky, for the impeachment of the President of the United States.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

The following notice for leave to introduce a bill was given under the rule:

By Mr. WINDOM: A bill to amend the fifth section of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,' passed March 2, 1867, and to facilitate reconstruction," passed March 23, 1867, by striking out of said section the words "at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification."

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, November 26, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the 21st instant, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate any facts or reports in possession of the Department relative to the tax on cotton, transmitting a report from David A. Wells, special commissioner of the revenue; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of Alabama, now in session, in favor of a repeal of the tax on cotton, and that the taxes collected since the 1st day of September, 1867, may be refunded to the producers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Georgia for a repeal of the tax on cotton; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of women of Indiana for such legislation as will secure to woman equal suffrage with man in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CHANGE OF A NAME.

Mr. HARLAN. I present the petition of Samuel Chase Barney, jr., praying that his name may be changed from Barney to De Kraft. It is accompanied by a short bill to effect that object. I suppose that there will be no objection to it, and I therefore ask that the bill may be read a first and second time and put on its passage.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 143) to authorize the change of a name, and it was read twice. It proposes to authorize Samuel Chase Barney, jr., to change his name to Samuel Chase De Kraft, and provides that the act shall take effect from December 1, 1867.

Mr. SUMNER. Where is the person's domicile?

Mr. HARLAN. He lives in this District; and I hold in my hand a letter from his guardian which explains the matter.

Mr. SUMNER. Should not the domicile be mentioned in the bill, so as to read "Samuel Chase Barney, jr., of the District of Columbia?"

Mr. HARLAN. Perhaps that would be better.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HARLAN. I ask that the letter of Dr. Lindsly, his guardian, be read. That will explain the whole subject.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, November 25, 1867.

DEAR SIR: The petitioner in this case is my ward, and is anxious to have his name changed on account of the bad character of his father and an uncle, who have brought disgrace, as he thinks, on the name. His paternal grandfather was Commodore Barney, a distinguished officer in the Navy. His maternal grandfather was Edward De Kraft, formerly printer to Congress, who left quite a large property, which is inherited by my ward (the petitioner) and a brother and two sisters. His mother was divorced from his father and assumed her maiden name, De Kraft. As stated in the petition, the circumstances are all well known to Judge Purcell, of the Supreme Court, as many points in relation to the divorce, guardianship of the children, &c., were contested in long trials in their respective courts.

A precedent as to change of name by Congress was set in the case of a grandson of Mr. Nathan Sargent, Commissioner of Customs, which was changed by the last Congress from Nathan Sargent Dustin to Nathan Sargent, a student in the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Asking your attention to the petition as early as convenient, I am, very truly, yours,

H. LINDSLY.

Hon. JAMES HARLAN,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the bill had better be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to refer the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN subsequently reported the bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment, and by unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was in the fourth line of the bill, after the statement of the name to be changed to insert the words "of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest that the name which is to be changed ought to be stated in the title of the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to amending the title as the Senator from Maryland suggests.

The title of the bill was amended to read: "A bill to change the name of Samuel Chase Barney, jr., to that of Samuel Chase De Kraft."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 144) granting the right of way through the lands of the United States at West Point to the Hudson River West Shore Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial of citizens of the city of New York, members of the Union League Club, asking the action of Congress to prevent the muster out of the volunteer service of the United States of Major General Daniel E. Sickles. Accompanying the memorial is a bill, which I ask leave to introduce and have referred, with the memorial, to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 145) to continue Major Generals Howard and Sickles in the military service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the memorial, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 146) to provide for the appointment of the Assistant Attorney General; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I am not clear that there ought to be an Assistant Attorney General, and I am very much of the opinion that assistants in several other Departments are unnecessary. I can hardly see why one should be needed in the Navy Department, one in the Interior Department, and two in the Treasury Department. There is none in the War Department. I would very willingly vote to dispense with them all. But if we are to have an Assistant Attorney General I wish to have him confirmed by the Senate of the United States. I do not think there should be an Assistant Attorney General unless he passes before this body. The country has been disgraced by a person filling that office during the past few months, by opinions that have been slanderous and libelous upon the men of the country. I think, if we are to have an Assistant Attorney General, that he should at least be a person sent to the Senate of the United States for confirmation. This bill proposes that the Assistant Attorney General shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF MR. MOTLEY.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, any correspondence with Mr. Motley, late minister of the United States at Vienna, or with the Austrian Government, not heretofore communicated, especially so far as the same relates to the removal of Mr. Motley from his post.

MESSENGERS AND PAGES.

Mr. NYE. I should like to call up for consideration the resolution that I had the honor to introduce yesterday, with a view of amending it and passing it now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution for the payment of the salaries now due the special messengers and pages retained during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. NYE. At the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] I move to insert "clerks of committees."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified at the request of the mover. It will be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the salaries now due to the clerks of committees and special messengers and pages retained during the recess by special resolution out of the contingent fund of the Senate or any fund not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DIXON. I call the attention of the Chair to the thirty-fourth rule, which requires that resolutions of that character shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I think the rule is positive with regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is very true; but the Senate can by unanimous consent dispense with that, I suppose, and that was done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; there has been no rule dispensed with. The resolution was merely called up for action.

Mr. NYE. So far as a portion of that resolution is concerned, I will state that a resolution was passed on the last day of the session in July authorizing the Sergeant-at-Arms to retain the pages and special messengers during the recess of the Senate. I suppose that by the passage of the resolution the Senate intended they should be paid, and be paid the same as during the existence of the session.

Mr. GRIMES. Have you got that resolution of the last session?

Mr. NYE. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the Clerk read that resolution.

Mr. NYE. It seems that the Secretary of the Senate did not feel authorized to pay them from any fund, as the fund for that purpose was exhausted, and this resolution is to authorize him to pay from another fund what these pages and messengers have earned. So far as the clerks of committees are concerned, I introduced that amendment at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who is absent necessarily to-day, and who asked me to offer that as an amendment, which I promised to do. There has been no objection, I think, to the payment of these pages and messengers. The per diem or rate of payment, I suppose, is fixed by a rule of the Senate. If it is thought necessary to have the resolution referred I have no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that would be better.

Mr. NYE. The standard of payment is well established for these poor boys, and they have not got their pay, and are suffering for the want of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we passed a resolution of the kind stated by the Senator from Nevada I have no sort of objection to passing any resolution that may be necessary to pay those employed under it, but I am certainly opposed to going further and letting in others whose employment was not authorized; and as there is no immediate hurry about the matter, I think it had better be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I am a little doubtful about our authority to designate payment out of the particular fund indicated. That ought to be looked into. Can it be done by order of the Senate, so as to enable the Secretary to pass his accounts? That question had better be settled.

Mr. NYE. I have no objection to the reference, but I hope action will not be delayed long, because these boys need the money very much.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A few days will not make much difference; we shall continue in session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a motion to refer the resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

Mr. GRIMES. I offer the following resolution for adoption:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House do adjourn their respective Houses without day on Monday, the 2d of December next, at half past eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest "at twelve o'clock."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to object to its consideration, but I have a serious question whether we should leave even the break of half an hour between the two sessions. The point in my mind is just this: will you leave to the President of the United States one half hour within which he may take advantage of the absence of Congress, and issue commissions which would then run perhaps—I do not undertake to decide the point now, but which I say might run then to the last day of the next session of the Senate. That may be mid-summer or autumn; we may not leave here before autumn. I take it that an appointment made during that interim of half an hour might possibly be valid to the last day of the next session of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the law takes no notice of parts of a day.

Mr. SUMNER. Why open the question? That is a technicality.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think the question is worth having a debate about, and I am content that any amendment should be made to the resolution which the Senator from Massachusetts chooses to suggest.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not say "twelve o'clock?"

Mr. GRIMES. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa so modify the resolution?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot see any object in passing this concurrent resolution. The Constitution provides that the regular session of Congress shall be on the first Monday of December, and according to law, I believe—or at any rate such is the usage—the hour for meeting on that day is twelve o'clock. We shall meet at that time in a new session. The recent law has not changed that regular time of meeting, and the result is that the next session of Congress will commence necessarily at noon on Monday. Why not allow the two sessions to merge? Why not have this session go on and expire by the necessary limitation fixed by law and the Constitution? I think that would be better. I do not see any object to be gained by passing a resolution for adjournment sine die. I would vote with pleasure for a recess until Monday at half past eleven o'clock, and let one session blend with the other. I see no objection to that course, while the passage of a resolution for an adjournment sine die may raise questions which we shall have to meet hereafter. I have not examined the question, nor thought about it, but I have supposed that by a recess or some process of that kind, this session would be continued till Monday and terminate at the beginning of the other without a formal vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It strikes me that there should be, in accordance with universal usage, (though to be sure this is rather an exceptional case,) a joint resolution fixing the time when this session shall terminate. I am perfectly agreed that it is not advisable perhaps to have any very appreciable interval of time, or any very considerable time, at any rate, between the termination of this session and the commencement of the next regular session. Still I think that there should be an appreciable distinction, and that we should fix the time of adjournment and adjourn accordingly. I have no very fixed opinion in relation to the matter that I am not willing to give up to the opinion of others if they choose to take the responsibility. I see no objection to fixing the time at five minutes before twelve o'clock, if you please, so as to have some little interregnum or interval between the expiration of one session of Congress and the commencement of another. This is the idea I have entertained and expressed to several gentlemen in conversation on the subject, and my own opinion is that it would be better, because in accordance with usage. I do not think that five minutes would be a time within which any very great harm could be done. It is with reference rather to the record and to keeping things in order on the record that I suggest that it would be well to have the usual joint resolution of adjournment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I merely desire to say that I am indifferent as to what particular time we adjourn sine die. This session, I suppose, will close at some time, and individually it is immaterial to me whether it is to-day or next Monday, but I wish to put in my protest against any such reason as is advanced here in the Senate. I think the Congress of the United States should pursue the even tenor of its way, and while we have a President I am for treating him as President, and I will not anticipate that he is going to do some terrible thing during five minutes, between eleven o'clock and fifty-five minutes next Monday and twelve o'clock. Let him take the consequences of his acts. Let us legislate, do our business, and adjourn without any reference to any rumors about the town that a certain thing is to be done or not to be done. I care nothing about it. I do not believe this country is to be ruined or destroyed in any five minutes; and therefore I hope that whatever time we fix, and I am indifferent about it, will be fixed in reference to our own convenience and the business of Congress, and not in reference to what somebody may suppose that some other department of the Government is going to do.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that what we may do may be done with reference to the welfare of the country, and with no particular reference to any rumors or reports. There I agree with my friend; but then I do not agree with him when he says, give the President another chance. We have already been giving him chances, and we cannot act now in any way without taking into consideration his character and position. Those are now matters of history. I wish to speak with proper delicacy, with proper reserve, when I allude to him, but I must speak under the responsibility of a Senator. A large portion of our country believe the President to be a wicked man, of evil thoughts and unpatriotic purposes, and in spirit and conduct the successor of Jefferson Davis, through whom, at this moment, the rebellion is revived. Those are the sentiments of a large portion of our people.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to ask the Senator if that is the opinion of a majority of the American people, in his judgment?

Mr. SUMNER. Well, that does not belong to the question. I say it is unquestionably the opinion of a large portion of the people of the United States, whether a majority or not the future may disclose. I do not wish to go in advance or anticipate any such judgment. I speak now simply with reference to what is before us. The question is, whether we shall give him another opportunity. I say no. In arriving at that conclusion I do not act on any rumor that is afloat, to which the Senator from Illinois refers; I act with reference to the character of the Chief Magistrate as displayed in his public acts; and it seems to me that it will be something like rashness in the Senate if they concede to him another occasion to practice on the country in the carrying out of his policy, as we know that he has practiced in times past. I feel that we ought to stop the way; we should not give him a day; we should not give him five minutes—I am ready to say that—not five minutes for the chance of an exercise of illegitimate power. I will not allow him to exercise it and then take my chance hereafter of applying the corrective. "An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." Such is an old saying, and now is an occasion for its application.

And that brings me to the exact point as to whether the present session should expire precisely at the time when the coming session begins. I see no reason why it should not. I see no reason why we should interpose the buffer even of five minutes. Let one session come right up close upon the other, and then we shall exclude every possibility of evil consequences from the character of the Chief Magistrate. It is well known that in other Governments, when, for instance, the king dies, the moment the breath is out of his body power is in his successor, so that there is a common saying, "The king is dead; long live the king." Now I know not why, when this session expires, we may not at the same time announce its expiration and announce the beginning of the new session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that there is any practical importance whatever in this discussion. The Senator from Massachusetts chooses to govern his action in his legislative capacity as a Senator here by some supposed action of another department of the Government. That may be the consideration which governs him. I merely desired to say that I should give my vote upon this question having reference to the discharge of my public duties here as a member of this body, and that I would not undertake to anticipate the doing of illegitimate acts by another department of the Government. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I am not here—it is not my purpose nor my province, nor consistent with my sense of public duty—to make any assault upon the President of the United States, or to defend the President of the United States. I am not to be put in the position of doing either on the present occasion. So far as I am concerned, I shall vote upon this resolution without reference to the President of the United States; but I shall be governed in my action by what seems to me to be proper, convenient for Congress, and best for the interests of the country.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the resolution be read now.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House do adjourn their respective Houses without day on Monday, the 2d of December next, at twelve o'clock meridian.

The resolution was agreed to.

JOHN H. OSLER.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 147) for the relief of John H. Osler, of Guernsey county, Ohio; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is very short. It is for the relief of a wounded soldier, giving him three months' pay. The facts are substantially stated on the face of the bill, and perhaps if it is read the Senate will consent to pass it; but if any one objects to that I will move its reference to a committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend that motion by referring it to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust the Senate, at the commencement of the session, will go back to the rule we used to have a few years ago, and make a proper reference of all bills introduced. The Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs, and divers and sundry other committees, are constantly having petitions, memorials, and bills sent to them that do not pertain to their business at all, but do pertain to the Committee on Claims. That committee is so constituted as to be capable of comprehending all these questions more thoroughly than a committee who represents some particular working branch of the Government; and it is for that reason that I make this motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio consent to that disposition of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, November 26, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONVENTION OF FEDERAL OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, presented a communication, transmitting proceedings of a convention of the Federal officers and soldiers of the State of Kentucky, held at Louisville, Kentucky, on the 26th of August last; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF SECRETARY STANTON, ETC.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the General commanding the armies of the United States be directed to communicate to this House any and all correspondence addressed by him to the President of the United States upon the subject of the removal of Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, and of General P. H. Sheridan, commander of the fifth military district; and also any correspondence or orders in his office showing the condition of the fifth military district prior to the passage of the military reconstruction bill, and any recommendation that he may have made thereon; and what steps, if any, were taken by civil authority in regard to such recommendations; and also all correspondence in regard to the difficulties in Baltimore touching the police commissioners and other matters prior to the election in 1866; and further, all correspondence in regard to a proposed mission of the General of the Army to Mexico in the year 1866.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest that this resolution should include a call for the correspondence in reference to the removal of General Sickles.

Mr. BLAINE. I will modify my resolution by including the inquiry suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEEKLY PAYMENTS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the practicability of paying the Army once a week, instead of every two months, as now provided by law, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs be directed to ascertain whether any, and if any, what, reasons exist why the Freedmen's Bureau should be continued beyond the time now limited by law, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. BROMWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Whereas the confined and poisonous air of the Hall and corridors of the Representative wing of the Capitol has caused much sickness and even several deaths among the members of this House, and under present arrangements must continue in a poisonous condition:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to examine at once and report to this House by what means a sufficient supply of pure air may be obtained for said Hall; and that said committee be empowered to use the present modes of ventilation to the best advantage for the present, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope that this resolution will be adopted. We ought, if possible, to take some action on this subject.

Mr. BANKS. I wish the gentleman who proposes this resolution would include in it an inquiry what changes are necessary in the Hall to adapt it to the purposes of legislation, making a general inquiry, instead of a particular inquiry, in regard to the atmosphere.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "a committee of three," and inserting "the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] accept that amendment?

Mr. BROMWELL. No, sir.

The amendment was adopted; there being, on a division—ayes 54, noes 38.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

LA FAYETTE C. BAKER.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. It will be remembered that on the last day of the July session a resolution was passed directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody La Fayette C. Baker, who was subpoenaed as a witness before the Judiciary Committee and failed to appear. I am directed by the committee to state that since that time he has appeared and testified, and they do not consider the case of sufficient importance to ask further action on the part of the House. I move, therefore, that he be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms on payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House papers in the Kentucky contested-election case of McKee vs. Young; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

DELEGATE FROM NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House papers pertaining to the seat of Delegate to the Fortieth Congress; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

TAX ON COTTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a memorial from the constitutional convention of Alabama, asking that the tax on cotton be repealed to operate back to the 1st of September; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the call of committees for reports.

STEPHEN F. CAMERON.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an adverse report on the case of Stephen F. Cameron; and the same was laid on the table.

The call of the committees being concluded, the Speaker then proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States for resolutions, beginning with the State of Maine.

CUSTOMS, FINES, AND FORFEITURES.

Mr. ELIOT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary concerning the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes," and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain that resolution. I did not hear it very well.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution gives rise to debate, it must lie over one day under the rule.

Mr. ELIOT. It is only a resolution instructing the committee to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution gives rise to debate it must lie over one day under the rule, unless, by unanimous consent, the rule is waived. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain the resolution.

No objection was made.

Mr. ELIOT. I understand that the objection to the resolution is not insisted on.

Mr. ROSS. I hope it will be read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. ELIOT. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

DISTILLERY METERS.

Mr. MUNGEN. I offer the following resolution:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House whether under the provisions of section fifteen of the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to amend the existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," he has adopted or prescribed any meter or meters to be attached to stills used for distilling spirits; if so, to communicate such information as may be in possession of his Department relative to the practical working of such meter or meters, and the effect thereof upon distillers and distilling, and the collection of the tax on distilled spirits.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information it requires unanimous consent for its consideration to-day.

No objection being made, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

TAXES ON COTTON, ETC.

Mr. KELLEY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the welfare of the people and the maintenance of the faith and credit of the Government require the repeal of the taxes imposed by existing laws on cotton and the productions of manufacturing and mechanical industry except distilled spirits, malt liquors, and the productions of tobacco.

Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois: I move that that resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMIRAL GOLDSBOROUGH.

Mr. SCHENCK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform this House whether Louis M. Goldsborough was, while a midshipman in the Navy, appointed to an acting lieutenantancy therein; and if so, when, where, and by whom he was so appointed, and how long he served in that capacity; and whether he received a lieutenant's pay during the period of his acting lieutenantancy; and whether, when he was so appointed, there was on board the same vessel with him any midshipman the date of whose appointment or warrant as such was junior to his, but whose period of actual service was longer than said Goldsborough's had then been; and whether, when the question of said Goldsborough's right to be retained on the active list of the Navy as rear admiral was submitted to the President and Cabinet as stated in the letter of said Secretary to said Goldsborough, dated June 18, 1867, and heretofore communicated to this House, the fact was known and communicated to the President and Cabinet that said Goldsborough had while a midshipman been appointed to an acting lieutenantancy; and that the said Secretary be further directed to transmit to this House copies of all official entries, documents, or letters in his Department having reference to said Goldsborough's appointment as an acting lieutenant.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, it requires unanimous consent for its consideration to-day.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not object; but this seems to be a personal matter. Will the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means give some reason for making this call?

Mr. SCHENCK. The Secretary of the Navy has been overruled by a decision of the Cabinet in respect to the right of Admiral Goldsborough to remain upon the active list, and a good deal of information came to the House upon that subject, presenting the views upon the one side and upon the other of the question, upon a call made at the last session, but some other correspondence and facts are supposed to exist in the Navy Department throwing light upon the question, and I propose to call for further information that the whole may go together to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

No objection being made, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

PARDON OF COUNTERFEITERS, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution calling for executive information:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House a full and exact list of all pardons that have been by him granted since the 14th day of April, 1865, to any person or persons charged with, or convicted of, making or passing counterfeit money, or having counterfeit money, or tools or instruments for making the same in his or their possession, or charged with or convicted of the crime of forging or criminally altering papers, accounts, or other documents, or of the crime of perjury; and that such list be accompanied by a particular statement in each case of the reasons or grounds of the pardon, with a disclosure of the names of the persons, if any, who recommended or advised the same.

No objection was made to the reception of the resolution; and it was adopted.

EQUALIZATION OF TAXATION.

Mr. PIKE submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of equalizing taxation, in part as follows: first, taxing the bonds of the United States one per cent. per annum, the tax to be assessed and collected by the officers of the internal revenue department; second, by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds subject to State and municipal taxation and not subject to congressional taxation, and exchangeable for any bonds now outstanding, at the pleasure of the holders; third, by providing that the tax paid by the national banks, except so much as is necessary to pay the outlay on their account by the Government, shall be paid to the treasurers of the States in which the banks are located, and applied by them to the debts of those States.

REGISTRY OF VESSELS.

Mr. SPALDING introduced a bill granting registers to the bark Thermutis and schooners Etowah and Wirrillite, of Cleveland, Ohio; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS, ETC.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to declare the sense of an act entitled 'An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermasters' stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the armies of the United States,'" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. JULIAN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the homestead law of 1862 as to prohibit the further sale of the public lands of the United States except upon conditions requiring their settlement and improvement.

WITHDRAWAL OF NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. ROSS. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and they are hereby, instructed to report at an early day a bill providing for withdrawing from circulation the national currency, and to supply the place with Treasury notes, usually known as "greenbacks."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon seconding the demand for the previous question. If the previous question should not be seconded the motion to refer will be in order.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the resolution be laid on the table, unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] will consent to modify it so as to make it simply a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest that we had better refuse to second the previous question, and then refer the resolution.

Mr. ROSS. I think we had better adopt the resolution at once.

Mr. SPALDING. In view of the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] I withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

On the question of seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 19, noes 82.

Mr. ROSS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the resolution be laid on the table, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 16, noes 95.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Ross and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I believe the resolution refers to "national currency," not bank currency.

Mr. ROSS. If there is no objection, I will modify my resolution so as to read "national bank currency," instead of "national currency." The meaning, as I understand, is the same.

The SPEAKER. As the previous question is not operating, the gentleman has the right to modify his resolution; and it will be modified accordingly.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. Ross that the resolution be laid on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 101, not voting 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Bottwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Churchill, Covode, Dawes, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Halsey, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Ketcham, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marvin, Miller, Morrill, O'Neill, Perham, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Trowbridge, Twichell, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Woodbridge—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Benton, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Butler, Cary, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Getz, Glossbrenner, Haight, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Hill, Higby, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McCullough, Mercor, Moore, Morgan, Mullins, Munger, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Schenck, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—101.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Benjamin, Cake, Cornell, Dixon, Ela, Finney, Fox, Gravely, Griswold, Holman, Humphrey, Jencks, Kitchen, Koontz, Moorhead, Morrissey, Phelps, Raum, Robertson, Scofield, Selye, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taffe, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, and Wood—28.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, stated that, as he understood the resolution was mandatory, he would vote in the affirmative to lay it on the table.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ROSS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois to strike out "instructed" and insert "requested."

Mr. ROSS. I do not think it amounts to anything in that way. I want the committee instructed.

Mr. RANDALL. After the decided vote to-day, I think the committee would consider that they must act promptly.

Mr. PIKE. I rise to a question of order. If the call for the previous question be not seconded, will it not then be in order to refer the resolution to the committee?

The SPEAKER. That will be the first question, the motion to refer being now pending.

Mr. ROSS. If I have the authority, at the request of several members, I strike out the word "instructed," and in lieu thereof insert "requested." I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make a further modification. I do not see that there is any difference between "requested" and "instructed." I ask him to modify it so that the committee will be instructed to inquire into the expediency of substituting, &c.

Mr. ROSS. I do not accede to that.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope no change will be made in the resolution. I hope the committee will not be requested, but instructed. It is the duty of the committee to act under the instruction of the House when the House deems it necessary to instruct.

Mr. ROSS. That is my idea.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House to request or instruct.

Mr. LYNCH. If we refer the resolution, that does not commit the House for or against it?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. ROSS. If we refer the resolution, then, it will really be a vote against the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It leaves the whole matter to the committee for its investigation and report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I submit the following resolution, and demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Rules be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by a rule of the House that no testimony taken by any committees of this House shall be printed until the same shall be referred to the Committee on Printing, and they shall report thereon whether the printing of such testimony is called for by any public necessity.

Mr. ROSS. I ask my colleague to consent to the addition to his resolution that all the select committees which have been appointed shall be discharged. I refer to the roving committees that we have had.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not rule that to be germane to the resolution.

Mr. ROSS. I know my colleague is in favor of the principle of discharging these roving committees.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am. I have been on one of them myself, and so has my colleague.

Mr. DAWES. Allow me to make a suggestion. I am in favor of the principle of the rule, but its broad application, I think, will embarrass some of the committees. For instance, the committee of which I am a member—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the previous question. I have no objection to hear my friend from Massachusetts, but it is only a resolution of inquiry, and goes to the Committee on the Rules. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that it is only in the interest of endeavoring to save something in this printing. We have been printing the greatest amount of trash which no one looks into, and it costs a vast amount of money. I do not think it ought to be printed, as a general principle, until some committee has passed on it.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask whether the committee that investigates and takes evidence is not as well qualified to judge as to its printing as the Committee on Printing?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to debate.

Mr. DAWES. So do I.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to offer another resolution, to which I think there will be no objection:

Resolved, That in the present financial condition of the country it is the judgment of this House that there should be no further appropriation of public lands to States or corporations for the purpose of building railroads; and that all such lands should be held for private sale, and actual settlers, or for homesteads.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to ask the gentleman from Illinois to state how many millions of acres have been appropriated for building railroads in his State? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

The question was put, and the Speaker announced that two thirds had not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 66, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Baldwin, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Broomall, Buckland, Cary, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Kelley, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, Koontz, Lincoln, Moorhead, Morgan, Morrissey, Phelps, Poland, Raum, Robertson, Scofield, Selye, Sitgreaves, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Taffe, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, James F. Wilson, and Wood—45.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

CURRENCY, TAXATION, AND REVENUE.

Mr. BAKER offered the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, 1. That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so changing the law as to arrest contraction of the currency.

2. That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the tax on distilled spirits, and to inquire whether a more efficient and economical means may not be devised for the collection of said tax.

3. That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the tax on cotton.

4. That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting as a criterion of the measure of taxation a scale of revenue which will yield a sum, taken in connection with the sum now in the Treasury, sufficient, and only sufficient, to pay the expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt during the current and next succeeding fiscal year.

5. That said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of adopting as principles of taxation, first, the levying of taxes on the smallest practicable number of articles or sources of revenue; second, the imposition of the lightest practicable burden of taxation on primary, productive labor, whether agricultural, mechanical, or manufacturing; and, third, the adoption of the least complex or simplest practicable means for the collection of taxes.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

CENSUS OF THE REVOLTED STATES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be directed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of providing for taking the census of the inhabitants of the recently rebellious and revolted States, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

JOHN SEWARD.

Mr. HARDING submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812 are instructed to report a bill, if they deem it expedient, to relieve John Seward, a soldier of the war of 1812, who is wholly disabled by wounds received in battle in said war.

PAPER CURRENCY.

Mr. BROMWELL. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That gold and silver not being in sufficient quantity in this country to furnish a circulating medium adequate in amount to the wants of the people, the deficiency shall be at all times supplied by Treasury notes of the United States called "greenbacks," to the exclusion of all other paper currency, and in sufficient amount to promote the energies and enterprise of all classes of the community.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution lies over under the rule.

Mr. BURR submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so modifying existing laws as to impose a tax on distilleries according to their several manufacturing capacities, in lieu of the present taxation per gallon on distilled liquors, and that they have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MYERS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, In view of the extensive frauds in whisky returns, and in order to obtain a surer and greater revenue from that source, that the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to inquire into the expediency of taxing distilled spirits upon the capacity of the distillery, and of reducing the present rate of tax, and to report by bill or otherwise.

REDUCTION OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. INGERSOLL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the military establishment of the United States to the lowest possible number consistent with the present demands of the public service.

IMPEACHMENT REPORT.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the majority and minority reports of the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject of impeachment be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There are several gentlemen anxious to make speeches, and as we are pretty much through with all business, I shall move in a few moments that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

EMPLOYÉS IN DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. NEWCOMB. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of the Departments of State, Treasury, War, Navy, and Interior, be, and are hereby, directed to report to this House, at their earliest convenience, the names and number of employés in their respective Departments, with the amount of salary and date of appointment in each case, and the State and congressional district in which they were appointed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask if that information is not already before the House in the Blue Book?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution on this day?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir. I think the matter had better be inquired into a little.

The SPEAKER. The resolution goes over under the rule.

WHISKY FRAUDS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. COBB. I submit the following resolution, and call the previous question upon its adoption:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the joint select Committee on Retrenchment be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into and investigate the alleged whisky frauds in the city of New York; the causes which led to the detailing of a deputy commissioner of internal revenue for duty in New York city, and to the organization of the so-called "metropolitan board of internal revenue;" the efficiency or non-efficiency of said board, and the causes thereof; the manner in which the several officers constituting said board discharged their duties respectively in the collection of the internal revenue tax; and whether any of such officers or agents have been guilty of fraud, corruption, or neglect of duty in office; that said committee report the result of such investigation, together with the testimony by them taken, to Congress; and that for such purpose the said committee shall have and possess all powers heretofore granted them for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is a concurrent resolution. The Chair will suggest to the mover that the usage has always been to instruct joint select committees by a simple resolution of either House.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will not press the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COBB. I insist on the demand.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were—ayes 23, nays 27; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. COBB and SPALDING.

Mr. ROSS. Would it be in order, before the vote is taken, to inquire what authority has heretofore been granted to this committee?

The SPEAKER. If the resolution gives rise to debate it must go over under the rule.

Mr. ROSS. I understand that the authority heretofore given to this committee has been to travel over the country, hear testimony, and draw upon the Treasury for the expenses; a pretty extensive authority.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 37, noes 65.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. SPALDING. I rise to debate the resolution.

REDUCTION OF THE CURRENCY.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 89, relating to the reduction of the currency.

Mr. BLAINE. Within the past few months, Mr. Chairman, some erroneous and mischievous views have been put forward in regard to the nature of the public obligation imposed by the debt of the United States. Without stopping to notice the lesser lights of the new doctrine, and not caring to analyze the various forms of repudiation suggested from irresponsible sources throughout the country, I propose to review, as briefly as may be, the position contemporaneously assumed by two able and distinguished gentlemen—the one from the West, the other from the East—the one the late candidate of the Democratic party for the Vice Presidency—(Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio)—the other a prominent member of this House from one of the strongest Republican districts of the State of Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The position of these gentlemen I understand to be simply this: that the principal of the United States bonds, known as the five-twenties, may be fairly and legally paid in paper currency by the Government after the expiration of five years from the date of issue.

A brief review of the origin of the five-twenty bonds will demonstrate, I think; that this position is in contravention of the honor and good faith of the national Government; that it is hostile to the spirit and the letter of the law; that it contemptuously ignores the common understanding between borrower and lender at the time the loan was negotiated; and that finally, even if such mode of payment were honorable and practicable, it would prove disastrous to the financial interests of the Government and the general prosperity of the country. I crave the attention and the indulgence of the House while I recapitulate the essential facts in support of my assertion.

The issue of the five-twenty bonds was originally authorized by the act of February 25, 1862, which provided for the large amount of $500,000,000. It was this series which was sold so successfully by Jay Cooke & Co. in 1863, and of which so great a proportion was subsequently purchased by foreign capitalists. It will be borne in mind that up to that time in all the loan bills passed by Congress not one word had ever been said in regard to gold payment either of bond or coupon; and yet it will be equally borne in mind that gold payment, both of the principal and interest of the public debt, had been the invariable rule from the foundation of the Government. No instance to the contrary can be found in our history. In the pithy language of Nathaniel Macon, "our Government was a hard-money Government, founded by hard-money men, and its debts were hard-money debts."

And it will be still further borne in mind that when the bill authorizing the original issue of five-twenties was under discussion in Congress no man of any party, either in the Senate or the House, ever intimated that those bonds were to be paid in anything else than gold or silver. The issue of legal-tender notes of contemporaneous origin was regarded as a temporary expedient, forced upon us by the cruel necessities and demands of war, and it was universally conceded that the specie basis was to be resumed long before the bonds should mature for payment. And in order that the public creditor might have the amplest assurance of the payment of both principal and interest in coin it was specially enacted that all duties on imports should be paid in coin, and the amount thus raised was distinctly pledged, not only to the payment of the interest in coin, but to the formation of a sinking fund for the ultimate redemption of the principal in coin. This provision is so important that I quote it entire. After providing that the duties shall be paid in coin, the act devotes that coin to the following purposes:

"First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds of the United States.

"Second. To the purchase or payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall be in like manner applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

"Third. The residue thereof shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States."

Considerable carping and criticism have been expended on the second clause of this provision, mainly by those who seem desirous of wresting and distorting its plain and obvious meaning. Brushing aside all fine-spun construction and cunning fallacy, it is quite manifest that the sinking fund herein authorized was primarily to be formed from gold, and that it was only to be invested and reinvested in securities whose interest was equally pledged and guaranteed in gold; that this process was not to be confined to any specific number of years, but was limited only by the amount and the duration of the debt which was ultimately to be redeemed by the sinking fund thus constituted. The sinking fund was thus to receive an annual increment in gold amounting to the one hundredth part of the entire debt of the Government; and this increment was to be invested only in securities which would yield gold interest for the further increment of the fund. It would be difficult to conceive how the language of an enactment could more distinctly recognize and provide for the ultimate coin payment of the entire bonded debt of the nation. And instead of the Government having the right at this late day to change its gold obligation into one of paper, it seems to me that the public creditors could with far more consistency allege that the Government had not fully kept its faith with them in failing, as it has, to provide the sinking fund which was thus guaranteed at the outset as one of the special securities of the loan.

But we do not rest merely on the after construction of a statute to prove that the principal of the five-twenties is payable in coin. The declarations in Congress at the time the measure was under consideration were numerous, direct, and specific. Indeed, no other possible mode of payment was even hinted at, and Mr. STEVENS, as chairman of the Ways and Means, was emphatic and repeated in his assertions to the effect that the bonds were redeemable in gold. He stated this fact no less than three times in his speech of February 6, 1862, giving it all the prominence and emphasis that iteration and reiteration could impart. He spoke of the "redemption in gold in twenty years" as one of the special inducements for capitalists to take the loan, and he gave, in every form that language could assume, the sanction of his influential position, and still more influential name, to the maintenance of the gold standard in the payment of the bonds.

It may astonish even the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself to be reminded that within less than three years from the date of these declarations he asserted on this floor—referring to the five-twenty bonds—that "it is just as clear as anything is clear that the interest is payable in gold, but the principal in lawful money." He made this startling statement in answer to a question addressed to him by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts has quoted it in his argument on this question as though it had been made when the five-twenty bill was originally introduced, and was to be taken as the authorized opinion of the Ways and Means Committee at that time. I have shown that at the outset the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a firm advocate of gold payment, and a considerable period had elapsed before he experienced his marvelous change of opinion on this question. But it is due to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that, late as he was in this declaration, he was in advance of other gentlemen who have since figured so prominently as advocates of the doctrine. And should this scheme of repudiation ever succeed, it is but just to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania the honor of first proposing it. He announced it on this floor while yet the gentleman from Massachusetts was doing honorable service on the tented field, and while Mr. Pendleton was still adhering to those hard-money theories of which he was a conspicuous and eloquent defender during his service in this House.

But I digress. I was stating that while the original five-twenty bill was pending the declaration that the bonds were redeemable in gold was constantly repeated. It was the ground assumed by every member of the Committee of Ways and Means, so far as the record shows, and it was likewise the ground taken by the Finance Committee of the Senate, Mr. Fessenden and other members being on record in many ways to that effect. And while so many gentlemen in both branches of Congress were repeating that these bonds were redeemable in gold, it is a very significant circumstance, as already intimated, that no one ventured the opposite opinion. The universality of the understanding at that time is that which renders a different construction now so reprehensible. Mr. Pendleton was present in his seat during the whole discussion of the measure, and he was an active and frequent participant therein. Then was his time to have enunciated his scheme of greenback payment if he ever intended it in good faith. As a gentleman of candor, however, I am sure he will confess that he never dreamed of such an idea till long after the bonds were purchased by the people, and possibly not until some prospect of party advantage lured him to the adoption of a theory which is equally at war with the letter of the law and with sound principles of finance.

After the bill became a law Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, proceeded to place the loan formally on the market, and following the uniform previous practice of the Government, and especially adopting the language used by Mr. Stevens, and other gentlemen in both branches of Congress, he officially proclaimed through the loan agents of the Government that the five-twenty bonds were "a six per cent. loan, the interest and principal payable in coin." And it was on this basis, with this understanding, with this public proclamation, that the people were asked to subscribe to the loan. They had the assurance of an unbroken practice on the part of the Government, rendered still more significant by the provision for a sinking fund in coin; they had the general assurance of both branches of Congress, especially expressed through the appropriate channels of the chairman of Finance in the Senate and the chairman of Ways and Means in the House, and further and finally enforced by a distinct declaration to that effect by the public advertisement proposing the loan to the people, issued by the authority and under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. If anything could constitute an honorable contract between borrower and lender—between Government and people—then was it a contract that the five-twenty bonds should be redeemed in coin.

I have been thus minute, and possibly tedious, in regard to the facts attending the issue of the first series of five-twenties because in effect that established the rule for all subsequent issues. Ex uno disce omnes. The principle laid down so clearly in the proposal for the first loan was not departed from afterward. It is quite true that the chairman of Ways and Means, [Mr. Stevens,] as I have already said, changed his ground on the question, but he failed to influence Congress, notwithstanding his parade of terrible figures showing the utter impossibility of ever paying gold interest, to say nothing of gold principal. The gentleman can recall his statistics with amusement, if not with advantage, from that grave of unfulfilled prophecies to which he, in common with the rest of us, have sent so many baseless predictions.

The next loan bill passed by Congress was that of March 3, 1863, authorizing the borrowing of $900,000,000. This is commonly known as the ten-forty act, and it contains the special provision that both principal and interest shall be payable in coin. But this provision was never inserted by way of discrimination against the five-twenties, implying that they were to be paid in paper currency. The origin of the provision palpably discredits any such inference. It was moved as an amendment by Mr. Thomas, of Massachusetts, and it was moved to meet and repel the first covert insinuation that any bond of the United States was redeemable in anything else than coin. The chairman of Ways and Means, in apparent forgetfulness of his declaration the preceding year, had for the first time intimated that the principal of United States bonds was payable in paper money, and the amendment of Mr. Thomas, as the discussion reported in the Globe clearly discloses, was intended as a sharp protest against this heresy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and as such it was adopted by the House by a majority so overwhelming that its opponents did not call for a division. During the discussion, Mr. Horton, of Ohio, a distinguished member of the Ways and Means, and a gentleman of very high character in every respect, said:

"I wish to state here that the Committee of Ways and Means, in framing this bill, never dreamed that these twenty-year bonds were to be payable in anything other than gold until the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] told it yesterday upon the floor of the House." * I say to the gentleman, and to this House, that I never heard an expression by any member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the possibility that these bonds were to be payable in anything other than coin." * "The form here proposed is the form always used by Government in the issue of these bonds, and they have always been paid in coin up to this day."

In this connection I desire the special attention of the House to one fact of conclusive import, and it is this: at the time this ten-forty loan bill was passed, March 3, 1863, only $25,000,000 of the five-twenty loan, authorized the year before, had been disposed of. It was in the succeeding summer and autumn of 1863, especially after the triumph of the Union arms at Vicksburg and Gettysburg, that those marvelous sales of $500,000,000 were effected through the Government agency of Jay Cooke & Co. And yet the gentleman from Massachusetts would have us believe that the people subscribed for a loan of $500,000,000 that was payable in five years in paper currency, when another loan, for a larger amount, to run forty years, absolutely payable in gold, was already authorized and about to be put on the market. Such a conclusion cannot be reconciled even with the common sanity, to say nothing of the proverbial shrewdness, of those who invested their money in the five-twenty loan. Why, sir, every one sees, every one knows, that not one dollar of the five-twenty loan could have been disposed of on the understanding that the bonds were redeemable in currency, when another loan for a longer and more favorable period, possibly at the same rate of interest, for the bill so allowed, and absolutely redeemable in gold, was already authorized by Congress, and immediately to be offered to the public.

The next loan bill in the order of time was the act of March 3, 1864, which was merely supplementary to the ten-forty bill, whose history I have just reviewed. It covered the amount of $200,000,000, and, like the bill to which it formed a supplement, it provided for both interest and principal to be paid in coin. Under this bill more than one hundred and seventy-five million dollars were negotiated, partly in ten-forties, and partly in five-twenties; by far the greater part in the former. But as some five-twenties were negotiated under it, the gentleman from Massachusetts, even on the line of logic which he has sought to travel, will be compelled to acknowledge that they were payable in coin, and hence, according to his theory, some of the five-twenties are redeemable in coin and some in paper—a distinction which has never yet been proclaimed, and the equity of which would hardly be apparent to the holders of the same description of bonds—precisely identical in phrase, and differing only in the subordinate and immaterial circumstance of date.

The last loan bill to which I need specially refer is that of June 30, 1864, under the provisions of which the five-twenties bearing that date were issued. The seven-thirties, authorized by the same act, as well as by the subsequent acts of January 28 and March 3, 1865, were convertible into five-twenties of the same tenor and description with those whose issue was directly authorized; so that in reviewing the history of the loan bill of June 30, 1864, I shall in effect close the narrative of congressional proceedings in regard to five-twenty bonds. And the history of that bill shall be brief. It was discussed in its various provisions very elaborately in both branches of Congress. As reported from the Ways and Means Committee it was worded like all previous bonds, promising to pay so many dollars to the holder, without specifying that they were to be anything else than gold dollars, in which United States bonds had always been paid. Toward the close of the discussion Mr. Brooks, of New York, then, as now, a member of this House, moved to insert an amendment providing especially that the bonds should be "payable in coin." Mr. Brooks was answered by Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts, on behalf of the Ways and Means Committee, as follows:

"The bill of last year, the $900,000,000 bill, contained these words, but it was not deemed necessary or considered expedient to insert them in this bill. I will send to the desk and ask to have read, as a part of my reply to the gentleman from New York, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury giving his views upon this point."

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 18, 1864.

SIR: Your letter of the 13th instant, making inquiries in regard to the kind of currency with which the five-twenty years six per cent. bonds, and the three years seven-thirty per cent. notes are to be redeemed, has been received.

It has been the constant usage of the Department to redeem all coupon and registered bonds, forming part of the funded or permanent debt of the United States, in coin, and this usage has not been deviated from during my administration of its affairs.

All the Treasury notes and other obligations forming part of the temporary loan are payable, and will be redeemed, in lawful money; that is, in United States notes, until after the resumption of specie payment, when they also will doubtless be redeemed in coin or equivalent notes.

The five-twenty sixes, payable twenty years from date, though redeemable after five years, are considered as belonging to the funded or permanent debt, and so also are the twenty years sixes, into which the three years seven-thirty notes are convertible. These bonds, therefore, according to the usage of the Government, are payable in coin.

The three years seven-thirty Treasury notes are part of the temporary loan, and will be paid in United States notes, unless holders prefer conversion to payment.

Very respectfully,

S. P. CHASE, Secretary.

Mr. Brooks, apparently satisfied with this statement, withdrew his amendment, regarding the point as conclusively settled, I suppose, not only by the uniform practice of the Government, but by the special declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury, who immediately afterward proceeded on the basis of that letter to put the bonds on the market. Mr. Hooper stated the case well when he said it was "not deemed necessary or considered expedient" to insert coin payment in this bill; "not necessary," for the practice of the Government, and the assurances of the Treasury Department in its advertisements in proposing for loans, conclusively settled the point; and not "considered expedient," for to specially insert gold payment in all the loan bills except that of February 25, 1862, under which $500,000,000 of five-twenties had been sold, might, in the end, by the exclusio unius, give some shadow of ground for the mischievous inference which is now sought to be drawn without any ground whatever.

We thus find that the voice of Congress has been uniform and consistent in support of the principle of paying the bonded debt in gold. No vote in Congress, even implying the opposite theory, has ever been given; even the weighty influence and conceded ability of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania failing to carry with him any support whatever when he made his surprising and unprecedented change on this question. But the public creditors did not rely solely on the declarations of leading men in Congress in regard to gold payment, nor did they rest wholly on the past practice and the good faith of the Government. They had, in addition to both these strong grounds of confidence and assurance, the more direct and explicit guarantee of the Treasury Department, the authorized agent of the Government, speaking ex cathedra, with the knowledge and assent of Congress.

I have already quoted Secretary Chase's significant declarations in his letters and his public proposals for loans, and I have now to quote one of his equally significant acts. At the close of 1862 the twenty year loan of 1842, amounting to nearly three million dollars, fell due. Nothing was said in that loan about coin payment, and thus a grand opportunity was afforded to test the theory of paper payment. Circumstances all conspired to favor such a policy if it could be honorably adopted. Gold was at a high premium, and the Government was passing through the darkest and most doubtful hours of the whole struggle. Could there have been even a decent pretext to pay the debt in paper currency the temptation was surely great enough to resort to it, if not fully to justify it. But in the face of all the adverse circumstances; with gold very high and daily rising; with expenses enormous and daily increasing; with resources already embarrassed and daily growing more so, and with a military situation rendered well nigh desperate by months of almost unbroken disaster, Secretary Chase decided that the faith of the Government demanded that its funded debt, falling due no matter when and owned by no matter whom, must be paid in coin. And it was paid in coin; and no voice but the voice of approval was raised in either branch of Congress. The course of Secretary Chase was not only honorable to himself and the country, but it was in the highest degree wise merely from the stand-point of worldly wisdom; for it created such a profound confidence in the good faith of our Government that it aided as incalculably in the negotiation of all our great loans for the war. When the Government paid its debt to the uttermost farthing at such a time capitalists at once argued that there never could come a crisis when any evasion or denial of public obligation would be resorted to. It has been reserved for the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, jointly and severally, to propose that our Government should adopt a policy in the calm sunshine and prosperity of peace which it scorned to resort to in the terrible storms and dark adversities of war.

The course of Secretary Chase in guaranteeing gold payment on all bonds of the United States was followed, indorsed, and repeated by his successors, Secretary Fessenden and Secretary McCulloch. The words of Mr. FESSENDEN are entitled to great weight in the premises, for he had been chairman of Finance during the passage of all the loan bills, had elaborately discussed them in turn, and had as largely as any single member in either branch of Congress shaped their provisions. His views on the question at issue may be briefly and conclusively presented by the following extract from his report as Secretary of the Treasury, made to Congress in December, 1864:

"Though forced to resort to the issue of paper for the time, the idea of a specie basis was not lost sight of, as the payment of interest on long loans in coin was amply secured. And though in several of the acts authorizing the issue of bonds at long periods payment of the principal at maturity in coin is not specifically provided, the omission, it is believed, was accidental, as there could have been no intention to make a distinction between the different classes of securities in this regard."

It will be noted that this declaration of Mr. FESSENDEN, made in his formal official report, was at the very time that the five-twenties of 1864 were being negotiated, and preceded the large sale of seven-thirties which were convertible into five-twenties. So that in effect it was an additional guarantee of gold payment on the part of the Government, operating at once as the condition and the inducement of the loan.

It is well known that Secretary McCulloch entertains precisely the same opinions that were so freely expressed by Messrs. Chase and FESSENDEN, and he placed himself on record very pointedly on the question by his letter to

L. P. Morton & Co., of New York, wherein he says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 15, 1866.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of the 13th instant is received.

I regard, as did also my predecessors, all bonds of the United States as payable in coin. The bonds which have matured since the suspension of specie payments have been so paid, and I have no doubt that the same will be true with all others. This being, as I understand it to be, the established policy of the Government, the five-twenties bonds of 1862 will either be called in at the expiration of five years from their date and paid in coin, or be permitted to run until the Government is prepared to pay them in coin.

I am, very truly, yours,

H. McCULLOCH, Secretary.

In view of the uniform declarations of the Treasury Department, made through official reports, through public proposals for loans, and through personal letters of assurance, all guaranteeing coin payment of the five-twenties bonds, I submit that the Government is bound thereto even if there were no other obligation expressed or implied. These official and unofficial promulgations from the Treasury Department were made with the full knowledge of Congress, and without the slightest expression of dissent on the part of Congress. It is too late for Congress to declare now that the Government is not bound by the stipulations which the Treasury Department proclaimed to all lenders of money—proclaimed with the full knowledge and the full assent of Congress. Had Congress not believed or intended that the five-twenties bonds were to be paid in coin the Secretary should not have been allowed with its evident assent to so advertise; and for Congress, after this permission and warrant so significantly given, to step forward at this late day and declare itself not bound by the conditions published by the Secretary is simply to place the United States Government in the position of a man playing a "confidence game" of the meanest description, in which the Treasury Department and Congress are the confederate knaves, and the whole mass of bondholders the unfortunate victims.

With these statements I conclude what I have to present to the House in regard to the public obligation to pay the principal of the five-twenties bonds in coin. That obligation is established, I may repeat, in very brief summary, by the uniform and unbroken practice of the Government of the United States to redeem all its funded debt in coin; it is established by the fact that in the first of the five-twenties loan bills Congress directed the formation of a sinking fund in coin for the purchase and payment of the bonded debt of the United States; it is established by the general understanding in Congress and in the country when the five-twenties loan bills were passed; and it is conclusively and irreversibly established by the pledge of the Secretary of the Treasury when the loan was negotiated—a pledge made with the knowledge, and rendered binding by the assent, of Congress.

But now, Mr. Speaker, suppose, for the sake of argument, we admit that the Government may fairly and legally pay the five-twenties bonds in paper currency, what then? I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to tell us, what then? It is easy, I know, to issue just as many greenbacks as will pay the maturing bonds, regardless of the effect upon the inflation of prices and the general derangement of business. Five hundred millions of the five-twenties are now payable, and according to the easy mode suggested all we have to do is to set the printing presses in motion, and "so long as rags and lampblack hold out" we need have no embarrassment about paying our national debt. But the ugly question recurs, what are you going to do with the greenbacks thus put afloat? Five hundred millions this year, and eleven hundred millions more on this theory of payment by the year 1872, so that within the period of four or five years we would only have added to our paper money the trifling inflation of $1,600,000,000. We should all have splendid times doubtless! Wheat under the new dispensation ought to bring twenty dollars a bushel, and boots would not be worth more than $200 a pair, and the farmers of our country would be as well off as Santa Anna's rabble of Mexican soldiers, who were allowed ten dollars a day for their services and charged eleven for their rations and clothing. This $1,600,000,000 of greenbacks, added to the amount already issued, would give us some $2,300,000,000 paper money, and I suppose the theory of the new doctrine would leave this vast mass permanently in circulation, for it would hardly be consistent to advocate the redemption of the greenbacks in gold after having repudiated and forsworn our obligation on the bonds.

But if it be intended to redeem the legal tenders in gold, what will have been the net gain to the Government in the whole transaction? If any gentleman will tell me, I shall be glad to learn how it will be easier to pay $1,600,000,000 in gold in the redemption of greenbacks than to pay the same amount in the redemption of five-twenties bonds? The policy advocated, it seems to me, has only two alternatives: the one to ruinously inflate the currency and leave it so reckless of results; the other to ruinously inflate the currency at the outset, only to render redemption in gold far more burdensome in the end.

I know it may be claimed that the means necessary to redeem the five-twenties in greenbacks may be realized by a new issue of currency bonds to be placed on the market. Of results in the future every gentleman has the right to his own opinion, and all may alike indulge in speculation. But it does seem to me that the Government would be placed in an awkward attitude when it should enter the money market to negotiate a loan the avails of which were to be devoted to breaking faith with those who already held its most sacred obligations! What possible security would the new class of creditors have that, when their debts matured, some new form of evasion would not be resorted to by which they in turn would be deprived of their just and honest dues? Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus would supply the ready form of protest against trusting a Government with a new loan when it had just ignored its plain obligation on an old one.

Payment of the five-twenties in paper currency involves, therefore, a limitless issue of greenbacks, with attendant evils of gigantic magnitude and far-reaching consequence. And the worst evil of the whole is the delusion which calls this a payment at all. It is no payment in any proper sense, for it neither gives the creditor what he is entitled to, nor does it release the debtor from subsequent responsibility. You may get rid of the five-twenties by issuing the greenback, but how will you get rid of the greenback except by paying gold? The only escape from ultimate payment of gold is to declare that as a nation we permanently and finally renounce all idea of ever attaining a specie standard; that we launch ourselves upon an ocean of paper money, without shore or sounding, with no rudder to guide us and no compass to steer by. And this is precisely what is involved if we adopt this mischievous suggestion of "a new way to pay old debts." Our fate in attempting such a course may be easily read in the history of similar follies both in Europe and in our own country. Prostration of credit, financial disaster, wide-spread distress among all classes of the community, would form the closing scenes in our career of gratuitous folly and national dishonor. And from such an abyss of sorrow and humiliation it would be a painful and toilsome effort to regain as sound a position in our finances as we are asked voluntarily to abandon to-day.

The remedy for our financial troubles, Mr. Speaker, will not be found in a superabundance of depreciated paper currency. It lies in the opposite direction; and the sooner the nation finds itself on a specie basis the sooner will the public Treasury be freed from embarrassment and private business relieved from discouragement. Instead, therefore, of entering upon a reckless and boundless issue of legal tenders, with their consequent depression, if not destruction of value, let us set resolutely to work and make those already in circulation equal to so many gold dollars. When that result shall be accomplished we can proceed to pay our five-twenties either in coin or paper, for the one would be the equivalent of the other. But to proceed deliberately on a scheme of depreciating our legal tenders, and then forcing the holders of Government bonds to accept them in payment, would resemble in point of honor the policy of a merchant who, with abundant resources and prosperous business, should devise a plan for throwing discredit on his own notes with the view of having them bought up at a discount ruinous to the holders and immensely profitable to his own knavish pocket. This comparison may faintly illustrate the wrongfulness of the policy, but not its consummate folly; for in the case of the Government, unlike the merchant, the stern necessity would recur of making good in the end, by the payment of hard coin, all the discount that might be gained by the temporary substitution of paper.

Discarding all such schemes as at once unworthy and unprofitable, let us direct our policy steadily, but not rashly, toward the resumption of specie payment. And when we have attained that end—easily attainable at no distant day if the proper policy be pursued—we can all unite on some honorable plan for the redemption of the five-twenty bonds, and the issuing instead thereof of a new series of bonds which can be more favorably placed at a lower rate of interest. When we shall have reached the specie basis, the value of United States securities will be so high in the money markets of the world that we can command our own terms. We can then call in our five-twenties according to the very letter and spirit of the bond, and adjust a new loan that will be eagerly sought for by capitalists, and will be free from those elements of discontent that in some measure surround the existing funded debt of the country.

As to the particular measures of legislation requisite to hasten the resumption of specie payment, gentlemen equally entitled to respect may widely differ; but there is one line of policy conducive thereto on which we all ought to agree, and that is on a serious reduction of the Government expenses and a consequent lightening of the burdens of taxation. The interest-bearing debt of the United States, when permanently funded, will not exceed $2,100,000,000, imposing an annual interest of about $125,000,000. Our other expenses, including War, Navy, the pension list, and the civil list, ought not to exceed $100,000,000; so that if we raise $250,000,000 from customs and internal revenue combined we should have $25,000,000 annual surplus to apply to the reduction of the public debt. But to attain this end we must mend our ways and practice an economy far more consistent and severe than any we have attempted in the past. Our military peace establishment must be reduced one half at least, and our naval appropriations correspondingly curtailed; and innumerable leaks and gaps and loose ends that have so long attended our Government expenditure must be taken up and stopped. If such a policy be pursued by Congress, neither the principal of the debt, nor the interest of the debt, nor the annual expenses of Government will be burdensome to the people. We can raise $250,000,000 of revenue on the gold basis, and at the same time have a vast reduction in our taxes. And we can do this without repudiation in any form, either open or covert, avowed or indirect, but with every obligation of the Government fulfilled and discharged in its exact letter and in its generous spirit.

And this, Mr. Speaker, we shall do. Our national honor demands it; our national interest equally demands it. We have vindicated our claim to the highest heroism on a hundred bloody battle-fields, and have stopped at no sacrifice of life needful to the maintenance of our national integrity. I am sure that in the peace which our arms have conquered we shall not dishonor ourselves by withholding from any public creditor a dollar that we promised to pay him, nor seek by cunning construction and clever afterthought to evade or escape the full responsibility of our national indebtedness. It will doubtless cost us a vast sum to pay that indebtedness, but it would cost us incalculably more not to pay it!

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to state to the gentleman from Maine (and my recollection is very distinct of the debate and the conversation that ensued upon it) that my distinguished colleague, [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania,] now absent, when we were discussing the five-twenty bill, maintained the position that the true interest of the Government required the interest should be paid in currency and provision made for the ultimate payment of the bonds in gold; and he regretted the policy of the Government was the reverse of that, to-wit: the interest being paid in gold, and no definite provision made for the character of the currency in which the bonds were to be redeemed.

Mr. BLAINE. That was in 1864. I referred to what Mr. STEVENS said in 1862, when the original five-twenty bill was under discussion.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not wish to interrupt the gentleman in the course of his remarks, but I want an opportunity to say that I was very much dissatisfied with the course of things with which he says I was "apparently satisfied."

Mr. BUTLER addressed the House, [see Appendix,] but without concluding gave way to

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the gentleman desires it I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad if the committee would rise, for I am getting weary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BUTLER. Before the motion to rise is put, will the committee have the kindness to allow me an extension of time? [Cries of "Oh, yes," and "we will give you all the time you want."]

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman ask for?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the gentleman have another hour.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like another hour, if you please. [Cries of "Agreed."]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be extended one hour.

No objection was made.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 89, relating to the reduction of the currency, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted for an indefinite time to Mr. TWICHELL.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

By Mr. WARD: The memorial of Aaron R. Hughes and others, asking a restoration of said Hughes to the active list in the Navy.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

The following notices for leave to introduce bills were given under the rule:

By Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio: A bill to organize the Territory of Alaska, recently purchased from Russia.

By Mr. CARY: A bill to call in and cancel the national bank circulation, and pay off in legal-tender notes the five-twenty bonds redeemable in 1867.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, November 27, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FITZ JOHN PORTER.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the acting Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of any papers on file at the Department relating to the application of Fitz John Porter, an officer in the Army of the United States, dismissed for misconduct on the sentence of a court-martial, approved by the late President Lincoln, and now seeking a revision of his case.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Friday next.

Mr. SHERMAN, (after a pause.) As there appears to be nothing to do, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 27, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TILL SATURDAY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next; and I wish to make a further proposition, which I trust will meet with the unanimous consent of the House, that there be no business done on Saturday, and that the session of that day run through until Monday. We cannot, under the Constitution, adjourn from to-day until Monday. I am quite certain that gentlemen do not want to meet here on Saturday for business. Of course we want to adjourn over to-morrow, which will be Thanksgiving day.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would suggest that we meet on Friday, and adjourn from that day till Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remind members that there cannot be a formal session on Monday. The proceedings of this session which may take place on Monday must be journaled as of Saturday.

Mr. HARDING. I object to the motion made by my colleague, [Mr. WASHBURNE.] I object to any understanding that on Saturday we shall not proceed with the public business. For one, I am anxious to perform the duties which devolve upon me as a member of this House, so as to be able to go home early next summer.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. As objection is made to the full effect of the motion I desire to make, I will first move that when this House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Saturday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the order be made that no business shall be transacted on Saturday next except to take a recess until Monday morning.

The rules were suspended, (two thirds voting in the affirmative,) and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for Mr. HILL and Mr. HALSEY, of New Jersey.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House, which, with the accompanying documents, were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, July 20, 1867.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, together with the resolution of Congress entitled "Joint resolution to carry into effect the several acts providing for the more efficient government of the rebel States," which resolution, having been returned by the President, with his objections, to the House of Congress in which it originated, is certified to have been reconsidered and passed by two thirds of each of the two Houses of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution. The resolution is filed, and will immediately be promulgated as one of the laws of the United States.

I am, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

EDWARD MCPHERSON, Esq.,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of March 11, 1867, a statement of expenses incurred for the revenue-cutter service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, value of seizures made, &c.

The SPEAKER. If no objection be made, this communication will be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it had better be referred to the Committee on Retrenchment. I think $1,000,000 can be saved in the revenue service.

The SPEAKER. As the communication bears upon appropriations for future revenue service, the Chair supposed it would be proper to refer it to the Committee on Appropriations. But the Committee on Retrenchment has charge of that subject.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to have it referred to the Committee on Commerce. I think it properly belongs to that committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I have entire confidence in the Committee on Commerce; but I think it is important the subject should be brought before the House as early a day as possible. I think $1,000,000 can be saved to the Government in this service. That is my reason for moving the reference to the Committee on Retrenchment. I am not tenacious about it. If the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois] desires to have it go to his committee, I have no objection. I hope he will take the hint I have thrown out, and try to save something to the Government in this service.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will merely say, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL], that the Committee on Commerce has jurisdiction of all subjects connected with the revenue. It has already passed upon many of those questions; and I regard this subject as properly belonging to that committee. I think the gentleman had better consent that the subject should go to that committee. I agree with him that there may be a great saving in the expenses in this respect, and that this matter ought to be thoroughly overhauled.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, was agreed to; and the communication was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STOKES. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

Several MEMBERS. How long?

Mr. STOKES. I cannot tell exactly. I promise the House that I will make my remarks as brief as possible.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will state how much time he desires the Chair will propound to the House the question whether it will grant consent.

Mr. STOKES. I ask one half hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to granting the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] one half hour for a personal explanation?

There was no objection.

Mr. STOKES. I rise for the purpose of discharging a duty which I feel that I owe to myself, to my constituents, to my State, and to this House.

On last Thursday, Mr. Speaker, when you called the members from Tennessee to present themselves to take the oath prescribed by law, we were met by gentlemen on the other side of the House entering their protests against the admission of a portion of the delegation; and in fact one of the gentlemen entered his protest against the whole delegation. Consequently we were forced to retire to our seats and await the action of this House.

It is well known that the Thirty-Ninth Congress passed a law convening the Fortieth Congress on the 4th of March, the day on which the Thirty-Ninth Congress expired; and it is well known that the present Congress had a short session in March and July. But the election in Tennessee did not take place until August. Consequently the members-elect could not apply for admission until the beginning of the present session—last Thursday. At that time the eight members-elect from Tennessee appeared here with the certificates of the Governor, having received the largest majority ever received by any members from that State. Their election was duly certified according to the laws of the State of Tennessee and the laws of the United States. Yet they were met here by gentlemen who refused to permit them to take their seats. In addition to that, grave charges were preferred against some of the members, and in fact all the members; and the State government of Tennessee was denounced upon this floor as a disgrace to civilization and a disgrace to the United States. For this reason I have availed myself of the opportunity to make some remarks to meet the charges that have been preferred. The three gentlemen to whom I wish particularly to allude in my remarks are the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

I might say here that I should perhaps be contented with the vindication of the members from Tennessee that was made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES;] but I feel it due to the people of my State and the delegation from that State that I should submit some remarks upon this question.

I have no complaints to utter in regard to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] He did nothing more than what he had the right to do. I will read a part of the remarks of that gentleman as published in the Globe of last Friday:

"The gentleman is mistaken about the House having ever investigated this letter. Another subject was before the House when it was read before. It was read but once. It was read before on the question of the admission of the Senator from that State, modifying the test-oath so that he might take his seat in the Senate. It was after Mr. STOKES had taken his seat."

Now, mark the language, Mr. Speaker:

"I should not have introduced it now were it not that Judge Trimble, having sat in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, was on a similar allegation prevented from taking his seat."

The only point that I wish to make upon the gentleman from Wisconsin is this: he has condemned the members of the Republican party in this House for the course they pursued toward Kentucky; yet he comes forward and proposes to do the very same thing which he condemns the Republican party for having done. He makes an attack upon a member from Tennessee, and enters his protest against his admission. With this remark I leave the gentleman from Wisconsin.

I next come to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.] He used the following language during the discussion to which I have referred:

"I do not deny that during the rebellion, and subsequent to the writing of that Duncan letter, he did enter the Federal service and perform his duty well in the Federal Army. But that does not affect the question here presented. Can he conscientiously take the oath? Can he swear that he never, at any time, gave aid, countenance, or support to the armed rebels of the United States?"

I say to the gentleman from Illinois and to this House that I can stand here and swear I can take the oath prescribed with a clear conscience that I have never given any aid, countenance, or support in any shape or form to the rebels against the Government of the United States.

They have alluded to the Duncan letter. The honorable gentlemen do not choose to point out in the Duncan letter what portion of it they construe to be disloyal. They make the clear, broad, sweeping charge without pretending to argue the question to this House or attempting to show what I wrote in that Duncan letter which would forbid my taking the oath and my seat in this House.

The gentleman from Illinois goes on to say:

"He cannot so swear, for that letter would give the lie itself to any such oath. It is utterly impossible for him to do so, and it is clearly the duty of the House to step in, as they did in the case of the Kentucky members, if the majority do not intend to abandon the precedent made in that case, and inquire into the fact whether this letter, admitted to be genuine, is not utterly inconsistent with the oath to be taken by every member."

I was sorry, sir, to hear my distinguished friend from Illinois use that language. When I took that oath, sir, as a Federal soldier and officer, there was no objection made. I took it twice when mustered in as an officer of the United States. I took it twice when a candidate for Congress, once in 1865 and again in 1867. I took that oath in this House as a member of Congress from Tennessee, and at this late day I say I was sorry to hear the gentleman from Illinois use such language in this House without showing in that letter wherein I was guilty of swearing to a falsehood or in what manner I was guilty of perjury.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said in regard to the Duncan letter, and I propose to take it up and read it paragraph by paragraph to the House, and if this House will decide that there is anything in that letter reasonable I bind myself to prove that the Democratic party was guilty of treason when they assembled in convention at Chicago. This letter was written on the 10th of May.

Mr. ROSS. Will the gentleman permit me—

Mr. STOKES. Not now, as my time is limited. I will state nothing but the facts from the records here. That letter was written on the 10th of May, and on the next day the ordinance of secession reached me. Then, sir, before Duncan had received the letter, long before it was published, I said to my people that they had but one alternative—that they were now compelled to choose between Jeff. Davis and Lincoln.

The ordinance of secession was submitted to us, and I told the people that they could take their own course; but that for myself I would stand by the old flag of my country, come weal or come woe. I made a vigorous canvass up to the 8th of June, and then voted against separation. In November the two others—we being the only three in the county—voted against the ratification of the confederate constitution; so that I could not have given much aid and comfort to the rebels in the short time from the 10th of May to the 11th, the next day.

I propose briefly to run over this letter to see where the disloyalty and treason may be:

"LIBERTY, May 10, 1861.

"Mr. JOHN DUNCAN, McMinnville, Tennessee:

"DEAR SIR: I have just learned from a friend that there is some gross misrepresentation going the rounds of your section in regard to my position in this trying crisis; and for the benefit of yourself and others I write this."

There is no treason in that.

"I have been a zealous advocate of the Union up to the time of Lincoln's call for seventy-five thousand troops; that being in violation of the law and for the subjugation of the South, I commend Governor Harris for his course, and for arming the State and for resisting Lincoln to the point of the bayonet."

In this opinion I may have erred, as who has not, but was that treason? Our judges of the inferior courts deliver erroneous charges to the jury on the law, and when the case is decided it goes to the Supreme Court for review. If the court reverse the decision does that render the judge who delivered the charge either a criminal or unworthy judge?

"And have enrolled myself as a volunteer to resist his usurpation. I have in Congress and out opposed coercion and all forced measures, believing it was better to recognize the independence of the 'southern confederacy' than to attempt to coerce them back."

Why, sir, you remember that Mr. Buchanan and almost the whole Democratic party was opposed to coercion, and said, Leave the States to themselves. It was an opinion, and an opinion maintained by the Democratic party generally.

"I have always opposed secession. I claim the right of revolution and the right to resist the oppression of the Federal Government, and to throw off allegiance to the same when that oppression becomes intolerable."

That, sir, is a doctrine common to all parties in this country, and it is a doctrine held to-day by perhaps nine tenths of the American people, that they have the right when oppression becomes intolerable to throw it off. The only question is, was it intolerable? I said it was. I said:

"The time has now come."

In that I erred.

"I have been and am now for standing by the border States. I believed they were to be the great sufferers during the conflict."

Sir, time has proved that that was true.

"I am opposed to being tacked on the southern confederacy at present, except as a military league. But when peace is restored, if the two nations cannot live in peace let all the fifteen States elect delegates, meet in convention, form their constitution, and submit it to the people for ratification."

That was my opinion then. The border States were on the eve of calling a convention. They were to stand as the breakwater between the North and the South.

"The South ought to be a unit during the war by all means. I had announced myself as a candidate for reelection, but on receiving Lincoln's proclamation for troops I abandoned the canvass at once, and I am no candidate. I claim to have done my duty in trying to heal our difficulties and restore peace. That having failed, I shall now march forward in the discharge of my duty in resisting Lincoln, regardless of false charges or what not by them who are trying to put me down. Time will tell where we all stand."

Time has told where I stood. Time has told, as was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] on Thursday last, where he and I stood, and time has told where other gentlemen sat.

Now, sir, there is the whole of the letter. It was written in a moment of surprise, when the waves of passion overwhelmed my State. The next day brought me to see our condition in the light of truth, and I made haste to undo all that my letter might by any possibility do. Now, what did the Democratic party say when it met in Chicago? I read from the platform these words: "The Constitution itself is disregarded in every part." Here, an organized body in convention assembled; they declare that the Constitution has been disregarded in every respect. And this was said in 1864, when the nation was struggling for its life, by a political party which professed to submit and adhere to the Government. What further did they declare?

"Resolved, That the direct interference of the military authorities of the United States in the recent elections held in Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and Delaware was a shameful violation of the Constitution; and a repetition of such acts in the approaching election will be held as revolutionary and resisted with all the means and power under our control."

They were going to war on President Lincoln in 1864. If I, sir, was guilty of treason or disloyalty, pray, where does the Democratic party stand? Guilty, far more guilty! If a letter written in a moment of surprise, amid a whirlwind of wrath, renounced the next day by a bold opposition to rebellion, on the stump, and on many a bloody field, is treason, what is the solemn declarations of a convention, made in tranquillity, and adhered to till this good hour, as were the treasonable resolves of the Chicago convention?

Again, in their call for a Union national convention at Philadelphia, in August, 1866, they use the following language:

"Each State has the undoubted right to prescribe the qualifications of its own electors, and no external power rightfully can or ought to dictate, control, or influence the free and voluntary action of the States in the exercise of that right."

And yet, in the face of that resolution, these gentlemen came forward here last Thursday and protested against the delegation from Tennessee being allowed to take their seats. Thus have they shown themselves triflers with what they profess to be solemn rights of States. Such conduct is as destitute of sincerity as it is of consistency.

I could read further from this platform, but enough has been quoted to show what that party said at Chicago, and that if I have been guilty of treason or disloyalty the whole Democratic party is much more guilty. I cannot understand where any aid or comfort has been given by me to the rebellion, when whatever contribution the rebel government got from me was forcibly taken by their own bushwhackers and guerrillas. In order to show the House the way I did it, I will ask the Clerk to read the following letter; it will give some idea of the aid I gave:

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS COMMISSARY OFFICE,
MORGAN'S BRIGADE, NEAR MURFREESBORO',
December 10, 1862.

By order of General Morgan, commanding, I have this day seized as the property of Colonel W. B. STOKES, of first Tennessee cavalry of the United States, two hundred and fifty-four bushels of wheat, valued at $1.40 per bushel, and will account for the same on my returns for the current month to the commissary general of the confederate States. Said STOKES being an alien citizen, it is the opinion of the undersigned that his property escheats to the Government.

W. P. ELLIOTT,
Major and A. C. S., Morgan's Cavalry.

Mr. STOKES. Now, I will say, for the information of the House, that it was not only wheat that they took, but corn, cattle and horses. And, sir, they went so far as to march their forces into my dwelling and to raise the carpets off the floors; they took the dresses of my wife and daughters to make themselves shirts; they even went so far as to strip two little boys of every rag they had but their shirts and pants. When I returned about one o'clock at night and drove them from my domicile I found the little boys covered up in bed. I asked them why they did not get up and see me, and they burst into tears. I turned and asked their mother what was the matter, and she told me: "These men have taken away every rag of their clothes, and I put them to bed and covered them up till their clothes can be washed and ironed." And yet we are told here in this House that the government of Tennessee is a disgrace because it does not allow such men to vote.

Now, sir, in order to get rid of this Duncan letter once for all, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a letter that I addressed on the 27th of September last to the Nashville Union and Dispatch, which covers the whole ground and covers it for all time to come.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

LIBERTY, TENNESSEE, September 27, 1867.

Editors Union and Dispatch:

SIRS: I see in your issue of the 26th instant the following allusion to myself, which does me great injustice:

WILLIAM B. STOKES AMNESTIED.

The Washington correspondent of the New York World says:

"Among those embraced by the recent proclamation of amnesty is Hon. WILLIAM B. STOKES, of Tennessee, a member of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, who went into the rebellion and proposed to raise troops—now a Radical member of the last and I believe also a member-elect of the present House of Representatives."

"And yet this man with the governmental halter around his neck, has passed himself off for a 'fired-tired loyalist.'"

It is not true that I ever was connected in any way with the rebellion, or the attempt to separate or break up the Federal Government.

I never made a speech or uttered a word in favor of secession; I never raised any troops for the rebel army; I never joined a rebel company; I never sought or held an office in the so-called confederate government; I never took an oath to support the so-called confederate government; I never contributed one cent to aid the rebellion, unless it was forced from me, either by the confederate authorities or stolen from me by their roving bands of thieves and bushwhackers. If this is considered as giving aid, then I aided extensively. I never drew one breath in favor of secession or disunion, and not one word or act of mine can be so construed if truth and justice is done. It is well known that I stood up and opposed every move toward secession in the Thirty-Sixth Congress. It is well known that I opposed separation in 1861, and made a vigorous canvass against it during the months of May and June, 1861, voting no separation and representation on the 8th of June, 1861. It is well known that I entered the Federal lines as soon as General Buell reached Nashville.

It is well known that I raised a regiment of good and true men for the Federal Army in 1862, and served as an officer and soldier in the same until the spring of 1865, when I was honorably discharged. It is well known that while in the Army I never disobeyed an order from a superior officer.

I dislike to trouble you with this, but justice demands a flat denial of such gross misrepresentations. No Government halter was ever around my neck, for the good reason of never having committed an offense against my Government, either by word or deed. You, no doubt, have had the halter about your neck for treason, and if justice had been done, the props would have been knocked from under you, and clear daylight would have been seen between you and earth.

and there kept suspended until you ceased to kick or give signs of treason.

But a magnanimous Government forgave you, and permitted you to live and to follow some honest avocation for a living. Now, in order to reap revenge and put forth your hatred for the Federal Government, you are vilifying and publishing base falsehoods against the men who stood true to the Union and Federal Government during our unhappy struggle.

Now, sirs, in conclusion, let me ask you to publish this letter in your paper, and hereafter confine yourselves to facts. I do not charge you with intending to injure me individually, but the hatred you have toward the Union party causes you to thus act. I am in hopes a few lines of correction will put the matter right between us, and we will be good friends for all time to come.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. B. STOKES.

Mr. STOKES. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add in regard to that letter. It is very painful to me to have to speak upon this subject, and I regret it exceedingly; but I deemed it my duty to reply to the charge which was made against me here, and that, too, at a time when the delegation had no opportunity of reply, not even the privilege of asking one question or making an explanation.

As to the other members of the delegation, I shall say very little. The case of my distinguished colleague, Mr. Butler, has gone to the Committee of Elections, who will do him justice. But let me say that there is a difference between his case and the case of the Senator from Tennessee who was alluded to the other day, and who was sworn in in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. If Mr. Butler was in the Legislature and voted as is alleged he came forward afterward and served as a Federal soldier and as circuit judge under the reorganization of the State Government, and to-day is chairman of the central radical Union committee of the State; but as for Judge PATTERSON, he ran for the office of judge and was elected by the people, and he was sworn in, and took the oath of allegiance to the confederacy; he presided as a confederate judge, administered confederate laws, charged a confederate grand jury, and was to all intents as much an officer of the confederate government as was Benjamin or Jeff. Davis himself. It was for him on his conscience, before his God, to say whether he could take the oath or not. I held no office and sought none; I was tendered one, but refused it.

I come now to the other branch of the subject. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] said, and is so reported in the Globe:

"Another observation and I have done. The whole State government of Tennessee as at present organized and administered is a disgrace to the American nation and to the civilization of the age."

Here is a grave charge made in loud terms, that the government of Tennessee is a disgrace to the nation and to the civilization of the age. I expected to hear the gentleman specify in what particular it is a disgrace. Wherein is the government of Tennessee a disgrace to the nation or to civilization? It is well known that in 1865 the loyal people of the State met in convention and organized a government; they amended the constitution, and submitted it to the loyal people of the State on the 22d day of February for ratification or rejection. The loyal people of Tennessee went to the polls and voted ratification.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. STOKES. I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments longer.

Mr. ROSS. I want to ask the gentleman a question. He spoke so low we could not hear him.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order unless the time of the gentleman from Tennessee is extended.

Mr. ROSS. I merely want to ask him if he wrote that letter. We could not hear him over here.

The SPEAKER. What time does the gentleman from Tennessee desire the Chair to ask for him?

Mr. STOKES. Twenty minutes.

Mr. ROSS. I think we have had enough of this.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think it but just that the gentleman from Tennessee should be heard on this personal matter, and I will move to suspend the rules so that he may be heard.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] is allowed to proceed that I may be allowed a few minutes to reply to him.

The SPEAKER. What length of time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, so as to allow twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] and twenty minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

The motion was agreed to, (forty-three voting in the affirmative.)

Mr. STOKES. I was going on to say that the government of the State of Tennessee was organized by the loyal people, who ratified the amended constitution of that State which provided that a Legislature should be elected by general ticket, and that the Legislature which first met should have the right to declare and regulate the question of suffrage. The ninth section of the schedule gave the Legislature this right to regulate the elective franchise. The Legislature met and did regulate the franchise and limit it.

It has been said by gentlemen upon this floor that the Legislature of Tennessee disfranchised from eighty to one hundred thousand of her citizens. I deny that the Legislature disfranchised a man. There can be found nothing in the franchise act to justify such a statement. According to the head of the Democratic party to-day, Andrew Johnson, these eleven States were without any State governments. Therefore all were disfranchised. The Legislature then came forward to regulate and limit the question of suffrage, and stated who should vote, but failed to extend the elective franchise to all persons.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] said that Union soldiers in Tennessee were debarred from voting there, and that if his statement was denied it could be proved. Now, all that I have to say to that is that I have never before heard of that charge. I have asked my colleagues about it, not one of whom ever heard it before. If there ever was a Federal soldier debarred from voting there I want the gentleman from Illinois to state to this House his name, so that we may know who he is.

Sir, the contrary is true; the franchise law provides that when a soldier of the United States has been honorably discharged his certificate of honorable discharge shall be of itself sufficient to entitle him to all the rights of a citizen. The soldiers voted everywhere over the State, the Conservative or Democratic ticket receiving some twenty thousand votes, of which some were soldiers'. There was no disturbance at the polls; every man was allowed to go to the polls and vote as he chose. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] alluded to the colored vote of Tennessee.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment right here?

Mr. STOKES. Not at present. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] alluded to the colored vote of Tennessee. Is that what makes the government of Tennessee a disgrace to the civilized world? If so, then I desire to say that I understand that some colored men vote now in New York; some in Massachusetts, and in other States. And I hope and trust in God that the loyal colored men all over the nation will be entitled to vote before long. What disgrace is there in that? They voted in Tennessee in the time of Jackson; free colored men voted then.

Now, I stand here and proclaim from my seat that I know the colored race. Truer men and nobler men God does not let live on the face of the earth than they are as a race. They have proved themselves on the battle-field. And more than that, they have at the ballot-box proved themselves to be worthy, for they have voted against the Conservative Democratic ticket and for the Radical ticket. That fact proves their capacity to exercise the elective right and their superiority over their less favored fellow-citizens of the Democratic faith.

The gentleman from New York was mistaken. He should have reversed his statement. There were forty-five thousand colored men voting and fifty-five thousand white men. Is it cause for disgrace that the loyal colored soldier is allowed to vote? Is he not entitled to do so? He defended your country; he saved your flag. The Legislature of Tennessee, that patriotic, loyal body of men, with the Governor of the State, guarded and protected the interests of the loyal people of the State, recognized the rights of the colored man to the suffrage, and God will bless them and the country will honor them for what they have done. Instead of the government of Tennessee not being republican I am inclined to think that it is almost the only republican government that we have within the United States.

Tennessee comes nearer the standard of true republican government than any other State within my knowledge. There the only test made is loyalty. The question is asked, "Is the man loyal to the flag, true to the Government?" If he is, we give him the right to vote. But if he is disloyal, we say to him, "No, you cannot vote, you cannot hold office in this State, for you are disloyal." Upon this ground, and this alone, are men kept from the polls in Tennessee. Such men the Legislature has refused to enfranchise; but I hope and trust that the day is not far distant when all restrictions may be taken off, and those now excluded by reason of their own transgressions may be permitted to vote; but they will have to bring forth "fruits meet for repentance" before the loyal men can allow them to vote.

The gentleman from New York opposed the admission of the whole delegation from Tennessee, and charged a number of the members of that delegation with treason. Why, Mr. Speaker, treason is a very grave charge. I was sorry to find the gentleman from New York opposing the admission of the delegation from Tennessee; for I remember that on the first day of the Thirty-Ninth Congress that distinguished gentleman was, I believe, the first to rise in his place and advocate the admission of the delegation from Tennessee. Then the government of that State was in his view all right.

The gentleman says that he now places his objection upon the ground (I will not take up time in reading his remarks) that the members now presenting themselves were elected under the franchise law of 1865. Yet, sir, the members who presented themselves from Tennessee at the beginning of the Thirty-Ninth Congress were elected under the franchise law of 1865; and the gentleman from New York advocated the admission of that delegation, and also the recognition of the State government. Why the difference between his position then and his position now? What has caused this great change to come over the gentleman? The Legislature of Tennessee has not since that time struck down voters; it has enlarged the elective franchise by admitting forty thousand more men. The franchise has simply been enlarged. All the restrictions that now exist existed at the time the gentleman from New York desired the admission of the delegation from Tennessee. But the delegation stood a little different then from what it does now. Then the delegation was politically divided, four to four; and when they first came here it was uncertain how they stood. But now, when we present ourselves, the loyal people of Tennessee have sent eight members, who have received majorities of from three thousand to eleven thousand; and the gentleman from New York rises and objects to the admission of the delegation. In fact, I was glad to see manifested on the other side a disposition to scrutinize the loyalty of persons applying for admission as members of this House. I agree that every person who presents himself at that stand ought to be scrutinized. The question of his loyalty ought to be examined to ascertain whether he has been and is now all right. I do not complain of such scrutiny. What I complain of is the unjust attack upon the government of my State and the members from that State.

We claimed the right in Tennessee to regulate and control the question of suffrage—a right which was fully recognized by the Democratic party in its platform adopted by the Chicago convention. We simply exercised the right that that convention asserted as belonging to the States. The Democratic party, wherever it has the power, has enfranchised whom it chose. It has refused to enfranchise the colored men, as was its privilege and right. It is our privilege and right to enfranchise the colored man if we choose; and it is our right to declare that men who have been guilty, who have proved themselves traitors, shall not come to the polls and vote.

Now, as to the Brownlow government. Governor Brownlow is not the government of Tennessee. He does not control the government of that State. His duty has been to execute the laws passed by the Legislature. He can do nothing more and nothing less. Governor Brownlow has not gone beyond the constitution and laws of the State. I challenge any man to show where Governor Brownlow has exercised power not delegated to him by law. He has made us a faithful Governor. He has stood true to his post. He has discharged his duty faithfully, and I trust in God that he will live long enough to come here and take his seat as a Senator of the United States. He deserves it. He is entitled to it. The Legislature gave it to him as a true loyal man, devoted to his country and to the loyal people of his State.

I dislike, sir, to hear these sweeping charges made against the State of Tennessee. A disgrace! I ask gentlemen to show where the government of Tennessee is a disgrace. The colored men voted right, they fought right, they behave well, and yet we are asked to exclude them. Sir, we have nothing to do with the color of the skin. God has fixed that. When Christ was upon the earth He said: "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of Heaven." He made no distinction as to color. And when He sent out His disciples He said: "Go ye and preach the Gospel to all nations and all people." He made no distinction on account of color. And when we make no distinction of color why should gentlemen denounce us upon this floor and say that our State government is a disgrace to the civilization of the age? Why should it be denounced as a disgrace because we enfranchise the colored soldier and refused to enfranchise the men who were rebels and traitors to their country?

I trust, sir, that the other ten States which are to come in will come in just as the State of Tennessee has come in. I shall, for one, recognize those ten States if they are such as Tennessee is; but if a constitution is presented here which refuses to the colored man a vote and enfranchises the white rebel I will vote against it. I will never vote to recognize a constitution unless it conforms in substance to the constitution of Tennessee, that this House has recognized as republican in form.

Mr. Speaker, I know my time is nearly expired, and I shall not have the opportunity to refer to some other points which I intended to notice. I thank the House for the time allowed to me and for the further extension of time. I thought it due to myself and to the people to make this explanation. I now leave it to the country. I left my friend from New York [Mr. Brooks] upon the floor on the 4th of March protesting against this Congress, alleging that it was an unconstitutional, an illegal organization. When I returned on last Thursday the first gentleman I saw rising in his place was the gentleman from New York. I take it that the gentleman is employed to do the protesting for his party in this House.

I regret that the expiration of my time compels me to close thus abruptly. Other subjects of interest I had hoped to discuss. In the course of the session a more extended opportunity will present itself, when I may perhaps vindicate more fully the faithful, loyal, and warm supporters of the State government of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has now expired, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] is entitled to the floor for twenty minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make more than a remark or two on the question which is before the House at this time. It is a remarkable fact, which must have struck every member of this House, that when a gentleman parts company with his friends in error or in the wrong he finds it necessary, as a general thing, to become more censorious and denunciatory of them than if he had never been astray with them. This may account for the bitterness to-day of the gentleman from Tennessee, who denounces not only all who went with him and beyond him, but even those suspected of anything like sympathy with those who went to the same extent he did.

I know it is charged that I was somewhat inconsistent in the position I took here in objecting to the gentleman from Tennessee being sworn in as a member of this House. I thought when the delegation from Kentucky were applying for admission that the precedent which gentlemen on the other side were establishing was an ugly one, which would come back at some not very distant day to plague and trouble them.

The reason why I raised that objection to the gentlemen from Tennessee was that they might see the absurdity and inconsistency of the course they pursued. Judge Trimble, of Kentucky, had sat with us in this House during the entire Thirty-Ninth Congress, able, accomplished, respected for every quality of mind and heart by every member of this House; and yet, upon a bare charge or suspicion of having sympathized at some day or other with the rebellion, he is prohibited by the majority of this House from taking his seat. I thought it was wrong then; I think so still. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] stood in a much more equivocal and doubtful position as regarded his loyalty at the time he was admitted to a seat on this floor than the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Trimble] did when he sought admission.

The gentleman from Tennessee proceeds to defend, if I understand him correctly, the letter known as the Duncan letter. I understood him to admit his guilt at the time when that letter was first read to this House. I understood him then to claim that he had condoned the guilt with which that letter seemed to charge him. I understood him then to repudiate the position which he took in the letter in 1861. I understand him now to go through that letter, sentence by sentence, and to adopt and affirm its truth and claim that it was right.

Mr. STOKES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I cannot yield now.

Mr. STOKES. I do not wish the gentleman to misrepresent me.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman claims that that letter was right, his speech taken in connection with it shows in my judgment that he was not only disloyal then but that he is disloyal now. I leave him in the hands of his "loyal" friends to justify him with the letter which he now asserts contains the truth.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is not in order. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield. He cannot be interrupted except by his own consent. The Chair defended the gentleman from Tennessee against interruption.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman says that he defended rebellion in the first place, and he quotes this sentence in that letter:

"I have always opposed secession. I claim the right of revolution and the right to resist the oppression of the Federal Government, and to throw off allegiance to the same when that oppression becomes intolerable. That time has now come."

The gentleman says that is true—it was true in 1861. The gentleman shakes his head. I was near him at the time he spoke, and came back and made a memorandum of what I understood he said. I do not know whether he intended to affirm the whole of that sentence; but if he affirmed that the time for resisting the oppression of the Federal Government was at the date of his writing the letter I ask our Republican friends if the letter itself is not evidence of disloyalty then. And if he now affirms the truth of it is it not evidence of disloyalty to-day or at the time he took the oath?

I will say to the gentleman that I have no personal ill will or unkind feeling toward him. When the question of modifying the test-oath was before this House he uttered—if my memory serves me right—this strong expression: that he would freeze to his seat in this House before he would consent to the modification or change of that oath; that it was the only protection of the loyal people of the South. I thought that oath ought to be modified on account of the gentleman himself, and so remarked at the time the letter was introduced. I believe that Judge PATTERSON has never been proved before this House or the Senate to have uttered language more disloyal or hostile to this Government than the language contained in that Duncan letter.

I think I ought to have the Clerk read what one of the gentleman's then colleagues (Mr. Nathaniel G. Taylor) said of Judge PATTERSON. It is perhaps due to him, as he has not the opportunity to vindicate himself. I will ask the Clerk to read it, although it may prevent me from saying all I intended for want of time. I suppose Judge PATTERSON needs no vindication from me, but there were very harsh things said of him here the other day, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] I understood to say some severe things of him. I think it was no more inconsistent for Mr. PATTERSON to take the oath, as far as I understood his case, than for the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STOKES.]

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is fit and proper, I think, that I should make a statement in reference to the distinguished gentleman upon whose case this body is now sitting, because he is my constituent; he lives in my district, the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor. It is my happiness to have known him, not only through the bloody scenes which have occurred during the last five years, but for long years before. And I take pleasure in saying here to-night in all sincerity to my fellow-members in this House, that so far as my personal knowledge extends there is not in this House, there is not within the limits of these United States to-night a man who can present a clearer record of devotion to the country we all love, of pure, unwavering, unmitigated loyalty to the Government than DAVID T. PATTERSON. Ay, sir, such was his devotion to the cause, such was his loyalty to the Government, such was his fellow-feeling with those who loved their Government, that he was willing for their sake—not for the sake of the bloody-handed rebels, of whom my friend from Ohio [Mr. SELLABARGER] speaks; not for the sake of advancing the interests of the cause that was opposed to his country and your country; but for the cause of his compatriots in Tennessee he was willing to be a judge, to occupy an office of responsibility and trust, and to have the lives and reputation and property of the people in his keeping. I am not speaking at random; I know whereof I am speaking."

In 1854 Mr. PATTERSON was elected judge of the circuit for the term of eight years. In 1860, when the coming war began to loom up in the political horizon, when it became evident that we were to be plunged into a civil war, Judge PATTERSON, to my personal knowledge, had a strong inclination to resign his position as judge of the circuit court; but the Union people of his circuit, of whom I was one, besought him, for their sake and for the country's sake, to continue to hold his position as judge. He consented to their entreaty, and held the position of judge until the expiration of his term in 1862. He then disclosed to me the fact that he desired to retire to private life; that he did not intend to be a candidate for reelection, for he did not desire to continue to hold that position under such embarrassing circumstances as then surrounded us. The country was then full of rebel soldiers, and they were in the full tide of successful rebellion in Tennessee. Be it remembered, sir, that East Tennessee at that time, and all the time from the beginning of the war, through all its changing and horrid scenes, was true to the country—true in prosperity and true in adversity."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It was in reply to that speech of the gentleman's colleague that he made the remark that he would freeze to his chair before he would consent to a modification of what is known as the test-oath. Now, let us see how he can be reconciled and squared with the test-oath. That oath provides, as the House well knows, that the applicant for admission shall solemnly swear, or affirm, as follows:

"I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority, or pretended authority, in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States hostile or inimical thereto."

That is the part of the oath that applies to past conduct. That is the part of the oath that it was supposed stood in the way of Judge PATTERSON taking it upon his application for admission to the Senate of the United States.

Now, let us see what the gentleman from Tennessee has done, for be it remembered that this letter is admitted to be a genuine letter, and to-day the gentleman justifies either the whole or the most part of it. Has he not resisted or given aid and comfort to those who were resisting the Federal Government? Does he not tell them in this letter that the time for resistance is now come; that the time has come when "we should resist the oppressions of the Federal Government?" The gentleman says now that was true. Again he says:

"That having failed, I shall now march forward in the discharge of my duty in resisting Lincoln, regardless of false charges, or what not, by those who are trying to put me down. Time will tell where we all stand, and who have been faithful."

Has the gentleman been shown by time to have been "faithful?" He was faithful then to the rebellion. He was always a believer in the right of rebellion, and I suppose he is now, or at any time when oppression is intolerable. It was in 1861, and then was the time to resist the Federal authority. It is said that he has made a brilliant record. It is said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that he has condoned his sin, that he has wiped out the wrong which he did by subsequent good behavior. He admits the wrong, and so did the gentleman himself when the letter was first read in the House. If that be so, and the gentleman from Illinois is right and the disloyalty has been condoned, (it existed before that and now,) I ask again how he could swear he was never disloyal or never gave aid or encouragement to the rebellion? If he had done the wrong, and that wrong was within the meaning of the oath, how it is that the gentleman from Tennessee can walk up here before this House and lift his hand on high and swear before God and man that he has done nothing to aid or give comfort or encouragement to those who were resisting the Federal authority?

I thought at that time the oath ought to be modified, and I still think so. I do not think that it is necessary to require a man to swear in regard to his past conduct. I am willing, if a man is with us to-day, if he has surrendered his hostility to the Government, as I have no doubt the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] has—if he is now a loyal man and will swear to be loyal—I am willing to allow him to sit here as a member of Congress. I doubt not he may have repented of writing that letter and encouraging his then rebel friends. But he has given us another very good reason why he should feel hostile toward his former friends; he has been badly treated by them. He has given better evidence of hostility than of loyalty. He tells us that he lost his horses, his cows, his sheep through them.

Mr. ROSS. And his shirt.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. My friend says, "and his shirt;" I do not know that he said that. But he lost almost all he had by these men, whom he was encouraging and acting with in 1861. It is not remarkable, therefore, that you should find him to-day in open hostility to and using the denunciatory language he is using against the rebellion, and against all those who he says at some time or other have sympathized with the rebellion. He has a pretty good excuse for it. I do not blame him for hating those men; I do not blame him for his present loyalty, but the oath has reference to the past. Those were dark days in 1861 for the Republic. They were days that tried men—tried their loyalty. It is not as trying and difficult now. I was going to say the days were brighter now; though I have sometimes thought they are not. But, from the gentleman's standpoint, I have no doubt he thinks the days now are better, and that loyalty bears a better price and is more popular in his estimation; especially is his position stronger. Having deserted his friends, of 1861 and gone in with his black companions he has them all to support him and send him to Congress.

The gentleman undertakes to justify his State and defend its government. He says his State has been attacked here. What! the old sovereign State of Tennessee attacked here in this House? By no means. It is only that infamous State government that the gentleman and his friends have set up on the foundation of the old and once glorious State of Tennessee that has been attacked—that government which no honest, no upright, or just man can justify or defend that has been attacked. Why, sir, who has attacked the State of Tennessee? My friend from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] did not. He did attack the present government—the Brownlow government—there, and told this House and the country that it was a despotism and a disgrace to the civilization of the age. And I concur in that sentiment. The oppression there would shame a despotism anywhere on the face of God's earth, and the gentleman cannot deny it. The gentleman says they enfranchised the negroes and disfranchised white rebels only. How did you do it? I would ask him. Did you disfranchise them according to your constitution and laws? Or did you enfranchise and disfranchise by the despotic hand of power—by your Brownlow bayonets? The government now enforced was never established by the voluntary will or choice of the people. I wonder not that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] feels called upon to vindicate his position here. I should suppose that when he comes forward here to represent a portion of the State of Tennessee, where a majority of the white men have been disfranchised, when he is able to come here only by the negro votes—I should suppose he would feel called upon to defend his position, and to make just such attacks as he has made upon the platform of the Democratic party in days gone by. He cannot, however, cover his own disloyalty by throwing dust of that sort.

There are some gentlemen on the other side of the House, if I am not mistaken, and some on this, who agreed to the platform of the Democratic party of 1864. It is not necessary that I should defend that platform or the position of the Democratic party at that time. The Republican party is making their then prediction more than true. But the Democratic party will never cease its hostility and abhorrence of the state of things in Tennessee to which I have alluded. It will not soon be reconciled to such governments as the present one in Tennessee; to the treading under foot the Constitution of the United States, the constitutions of the States themselves, and building up rotten boroughs to send to Congress such men as the gentleman from Tennessee, or better or worse ones. And this I suppose is the reason why the gentleman in vindicating his loyalty to the Government finds it necessary to assail and denounce that party.

I will now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

The SPEAKER. There is one minute remaining of the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed I had more time left.

Mr. MARSHALL. I believe, Mr. Speaker, if this discussion is to stop here, I shall say nothing on the subject. Most of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] were directed to myself, and I did desire to make a remark or two, which would probably explain to him satisfactorily the reasons for the grounds which I took. But those grounds have been pretty fully stated by my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] and if this matter is to go no further I will not ask the House to grant me time to reply to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] has now expired.

TAXATION OF GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I rise to a privileged question, and call up the motion made by me on the 11th of July last, to reconsider the vote by which the resolution offered by me July 10 was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the burdens of the Government should be borne equally; that taxation should be in proportion to property held; that exemption of any material portion of the wealth of this country from its due proportion of taxes is wrongful, unjust, and should be avoided; and to carry out these views the right to tax the bonds of the Government should be given in any future system funding said bonds.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. On that I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment for an inquiry?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Certainly. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What action does the gentleman propose to have taken in this matter?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I propose that we shall reconsider the reference, and then pass the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I believe the Committee of Ways and Means has never acted on the resolution. I think the gentleman had better let the committee act upon it. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call for tellers upon the motion to lay on the table.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-two, noes not counted.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LIGHTING STREETS OF WASHINGTON.

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This resolution has been on the table since the 30th of March last, in consequence of the fact that business at the July session was limited to legislation relative to reconstruction. The Chair understands that it is the desire that this bill shall be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WELKER. I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF A NAME.

The bill (S. No. 143) entitled "An act to change the name of Samuel Chase Barney, jr., to Samuel Chase De Kraft," was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If there is no objection, I would like to have this bill put upon its passage now.

Mr. WELKER. I prefer that it should be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. I move that reference.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, some observations have been made upon this floor in regard to the State of Tennessee, to which I shall make reply when opportunity is afforded me to do so. If the House is willing to have the morning hour occupied with this discussion I will proceed at this time. It is a matter which, from a proper regard to the government I represent, should receive some notice at my hands, some examination, perhaps some explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] desires to proceed with his remarks in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the finances, but he will ask the House whether there is any objection to the gentleman from Tennessee proceeding at this time.

Mr. ROSS. I think it had better be postponed till Saturday, and that we take up the finances. We all know the government in Tennessee was established by the bayonets there.

Mr. MAYNARD. The observations of the gentleman and the insinuation that the elections were carried by the bayonet and other things to the same effect require that we should be heard upon the facts. If the House does not desire to hear me at this time I will yield.

Mr. WARD. I move that the rules be suspended in order that the gentleman may be heard at this time.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. MAYNARD. Half an hour.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] may conclude his remarks.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suggest the motion be modified so that after the gentleman from Massachusetts has concluded his remarks the gentleman from Tennessee shall be heard.

Mr. WARD. I agree to that.

ABSENCE OF A MEMBER.

Mr. LOGAN stated that Mr. TAFTE was detained at home by severe illness.

THOMAS FOSTER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, moved that certified copies of the papers in the case of Thomas Foster be given to the petitioner; which motion was agreed to.

JOHN WILSON.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, moved that leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of John Wilson and the same be referred to the Committee of Claims; which motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF DRAFTED MEN.

Mr. COVODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to extend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men," approved February 28, 1867; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REDUCTION OF THE CURRENCY.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, moved that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 89, relating to the reduction of the currency.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] was entitled to the floor for an hour and five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER concluded the speech commenced yesterday. [It will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I should ill repay the very patient hearing with which I was honored yesterday if I should trespass at any great length upon the attention of the committee to-day; but I desire to make one or two remarks in answer to what fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] yesterday, rather than to reply to anything he has said to-day. Indeed, his speech to-day had nothing whatever to do with the subject upon which I had the honor to address the House yesterday. I argued a single question, namely: the obligation of the United States to ultimately redeem its five-twenty bonds in coin. I do not propose to reargue it, but I wish to make one or two corrections in regard to points which the gentleman yesterday misstated—I presume not intentionally.

The gentleman held that Secretary FESSENDEN had set the example of repudiation by refusing to redeem the original seven-thirty loan of 1861 in gold, because, having been negotiated when gold was our only currency, he maintains that they should have been paid in gold at maturity. I would like to ask the gentleman at this point if he knows of a single holder of those seven-thirty notes who demanded gold at the Treasury Department and was refused?

Mr. BUTLER. To that I answer, of my personal knowledge I do not. But I have seen a letter of refusal, which I will endeavor to get and bring before the House, from Secretary FESSENDEN.

Mr. BLAINE. I have to repeat what I said yesterday, that when Mr. FESSENDEN entered the Treasury Department the mode of liquidating these seven-thirties had been finally adjudicated by Secretary Chase, that the adjudication had been communicated to Congress, and that Congress coincided with it; and I now say that for Secretary FESSENDEN to have attempted to reverse Secretary Chase's decision, which he had communicated to Congress, would have been to fly in the face of the decision of Congress itself. As a simple matter of fact the gentleman from Massachusetts misstates the whole transaction. He put it to the House as though there had been some poor people holding this short loan, and that the Government did not hesitate to cheat them, but that the princely holders of the long loan must not be likewise cheated. Why, sir, almost the entire seven-thirty loan of 1861 was taken by the banks of the large eastern cities. It was taken by those banks and paid for in their own bills, and the sub-Treasury act was modified for their benefit in order that the money thus loaned might lie on deposit in the banks and be drawn out from time to time as the Government needed it. That is the history of the origin of the loan; and when the three years for which it was negotiated had expired the holders of these seven-thirty notes were allowed to exchange them for the most favorable bonded security which our Government has ever issued—the sixes of 1881. Instead of discontent with this arrangement, there was the most entire satisfaction on the part of the holders of the seven-thirties.

But if for argument's sake I should admit that there was a partial failure on the part of the Government to maintain the very letter of the contract with the holders of these notes the gentleman would gain nothing thereby in support of his own scheme. The case is by no means analogous with the course he wishes to pursue in regard to the whole bonded debt of the United States. He proposes to pay it off with paper destined to depreciation and worthlessness; whereas the seven-thirties of 1861 were paid off by giving a far better bond in their stead—a bond that yields semi-annual interest to the holder and assures him of ultimate coin payment of the principal. This course was fair and honorable on the part of the Government, and was eminently advantageous to the holders of the seven-thirties, and of course highly satisfactory to them. And yet for pursuing this course Secretary FESSENDEN is denounced by the gentleman from Massachusetts as a dishonorable repudiator. The gentleman would have had the Secretary force the gold on the holders of these Treasury notes even when they were perfectly willing to take the 1881 bonds instead. The policy which he denounces Secretary FESSENDEN for pursuing saved the Government more than two hundred million dollars, and that without a protest or murmur from any of the parties holding the seven-thirties. I wish it distinctly understood that it is for that act of Secretary FESSENDEN that he is now denounced as a repudiator by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

But I wish the gentleman now to be consistent in his position and faithful to his own logic. These seven-thirty notes he says should have been paid in gold because gold was the currency on which they were negotiated, and that as a general and indisputable proposition the Government is fairly held to pay its loans in the kind of money in which those loans were negotiated. Do I state the gentleman correctly?

Mr. BUTLER. I said that where the contract was made when there was but one kind of currency it is a fair and equitable view to take that it is payable in that kind of currency.

Mr. BLAINE. In that kind?

Mr. BUTLER. And, therefore, that if we were held to be repudiators, knaves, and scoundrels, as we were so glibly called—

Mr. BLAINE. I beg your pardon; I never called you so.

Mr. BUTLER. No, I know that, but as we were glibly called for saying that where there were two kinds of currency it might be paid in either, then Secretary FESSENDEN was as deep in the mud as we were, because he had paid in both kinds of currency, or claimed the right to pay in both kinds.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understood the gentleman correctly as saying that the bonds being negotiated in a certain kind of currency were payable in that kind of currency. I want the gentleman to hold to his logic and not jump back or slide off from the position which he has thus taken and repeated. Now, the five-twenties of 1862—and these are the bonds to which this discussion has referred—were negotiated with a certain kind of currency. There were only two kinds of currency known to the Government of the United States when they were negotiated; one was gold, held at a premium, and the other was a legal-tender note authorized by the same act that placed the five-twenties before the world. That act, besides giving to these Treasury notes the quality of being legal tenders, went on to say:

"And any holder of said United States notes depositing any sum not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty dollars, with the Treasurer of the United States, or either of the Assistant Treasurers, shall receive in exchange therefor duplicate certificates of deposit, one of which may be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon issue to the holder an equal amount of the bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States in five years, and payable in twenty years from the date thereof."

One hundred and fifty million of these notes were first issued in February, and in July of the same year, six months later, another one hundred and fifty millions were issued with exactly the same conditions; and that was the only description of legal tenders known to this Government when the five-twenty loan of 1862 was put upon the market. They were not simply legal tenders such as we still have in circulation, but they had the special and additional quality of being convertible into five-twenty bonds at par, according to the law which I have just read.

Now, if the gentleman will only hold to his own logic the five-twenties, if payable in paper at all, can only be paid in the paper which was declared to be legal tender when they were negotiated, and therefore the gentleman's argument amounts just to this, namely, that you may be called up to the Treasury, under the law which you have passed, and be forced to take for your five-twenty bonds legal tenders of this kind, and then you may go into the Treasury through another door and demand that the five-twenty bonds shall be reissued for you. The gentleman travels in a circle, and has reached the most complete specimen of a reductio ad absurdum that I ever knew an able and shrewd lawyer to suffer himself to be entrapped in.

Mr. BUTLER. Was not that law altered?

Mr. BLAINE. It was altered in March, 1863, more than a year after its passage; but could that alteration break the contract according to the gentleman's own construction of it? It was altered by a notice fairly and fully given to all holders. The act approved March 3, 1863, which I hold in my hand, provided as follows:

"And the holders of United States notes issued under and by virtue of said act shall present the same for the purpose of exchanging the same for bonds as therein provided on or before the 1st day of July, 1863; and thereafter the right so to exchange shall cease and determine."

It was found that it was working adversely to the interests of the Treasury, and fair notice was given that any man who held the notes must come in and have them exchanged. Four months' time was given, and no fault was found with the action of the Government, for every person who desired to exchange had full opportunity to do so. Now, sir, I am by no means arguing that the legal tenders of 1862 may be forced on the holders of five-twenties; but I think I have conclusively demonstrated that according to the logic of the gentleman from Massachusetts they are the only legal tenders that can be used for such purpose of redemption; and that, having forced him to that position, I need delay no longer on this branch of the subject to expose its weakness and its folly.

Another point in the gentleman's scheme is noteworthy. He reverses the old and established ideas of finance, and advances some new suggestions, which were quite unknown to the gentlemen who legislated in this Hall even so lately as 1862. And I here desire to say that during the past few weeks I have gone over several thousand pages in the Congressional Globe of 1862, embracing the whole discussion of the financial measures of that year in both Senate and House, and in my judgment it is the ablest, most thorough, and exhaustive discussion on finance that ever took place in the American Congress. Throughout the whole of that discussion an old-fashioned idea prevailed that Government bonds should be issued for the purpose of absorbing legal-tender notes and funding them. The act of February 25 specially recites that as one of its objects, and provides the means and the machinery for accomplishing it. But the gentleman from Massachusetts reverses the process, and instead of having bonds to absorb the greenbacks he would have us issue an ocean of greenbacks to absorb the bonds! He completely reverses all ideas of finance that have heretofore prevailed in this Government. At present we have a loan that is distinctly defined; that is well known to the people; that has a specific rate of interest; has a certain time to run, with expressed conditions on which it may be paid, and the time within which the Government is allowed or forbidden to pay.

The gentleman from Massachusetts is for brushing all this aside and placing before the country a species of legal-tender notes which have no fixed time to run; which bear no interest; which have no standard of value; which the Government is under no obligation to pay at any particular time, and which may indeed never be called in for redemption at all. In the gentleman's speech yesterday he aimed to be facetious, and in his allusions to Secretary FESSENDEN he spoke sneeringly of "Maine finance." I think the gentleman must have borrowed his notions of finance from a man who failed a few years since in one of the eastern cities of Maine, and who wrote over his store door, "Payment suspended for thirty days!" A neighbor passing by, said to him: "You have neglected to date your notice." "Lord, no!" said he, "I did not intend to date it; it would run out if I did." [Laughter.] The gentleman from Massachusetts, following this Maine prototype, wants to issue a Government legal tender that never runs out; that imposes no obligation to pay any specific sum at any certain time; that never brings the holder where he can go to the Treasury and demand his money; that, in short, never reaches a definite result, and leaves us in the end further from the liquidation of our national debt than we were at the beginning.

The gentleman has spoken with great delight in regard to the high price of ten-forty bonds as compared with five-twenties. I would like him to tell the House at what particular time the approximation between the prices of the two descriptions of bonds began to occur? He says they are within one or two per cent. of each other. How did they become so? How long have they been so? Never until this mischievous agitation began—never until the money markets of the country were alarmed at what they regarded as a threatened bad faith on the part of Congress. If the gentleman finds that the agitation—in which he has been so conspicuous—has disturbed the price of five-twenties and relatively diminished it while it has elevated the price of ten-forties, he is welcome to all the honor attending it, even to the place of chief of the modern school of repudiation. Before the agitation began the five-twenties and ten-forties differed in price exactly as two kinds of bonds at different rates of interest with different periods to run would naturally and properly differ. If the gentleman plumes himself on having disturbed this harmony he will find few who will be disposed to deprive him of the full credit of it.

We have heard a good deal, I believe, from the gentleman, not so much in the House, but out of the House, about what the great West would and would not stand in connection with the Government debt. I think the gentleman referred to this point in that remarkable "conversation" for which he and other magnates of Massachusetts lately sat to the distinguished artist Redpath. For myself, sir, representing an eastern district, I claim no right to speak for the West; but my judgment is that in all that concerns the national honor and the national credit the West can be trusted as far and as long as any other section of the country. Sir, I repudiate the insinuation on behalf of the West.

What is that insinuation, sir? It is that the West will not pay its share of the interest and principal of the national debt. How, and for what use was that debt contracted? In support of the war, in which the West and the East were equally united and zealous. Has it ever been claimed by the West that the East did not furnish its full quota of troops? And if in addition to furnishing its full quota from each State and each district it was the good fortune of the East to have the ability to supply the Government in larger measure with the money, without which troops from both sections would have been valueless, is the West to make war on the East for that? Sir, I protest against such a monstrous statement. I protest against it in the name of the West. I protest against it in the name of common justice.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not rise to enter at all into this debate, or to express any opinion, one way or the other, upon the subject which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] have been discussing.

I rise to set the gentleman from Maine right—I will not say upon the written history of this legislation, but upon the unwritten history of the act of June, 1864, creating the securities known as "five-twenties." The unwritten history of a country, particularly in connection with finance, is often quite as important as its written history, especially when there is any doubt as to the true meaning of the act.

During the session of 1864 there were two propositions emanating from the Committee of Ways and Means: one from the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS;] the other from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania, being in the minority of that committee, and the gentleman from Massachusetts being in the majority, the gentleman from Massachusetts was called upon to report the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means for the consideration and action of the House. The bill which the gentleman from Pennsylvania introduced before the House was a bill making the principal of this debt payable in coin, the debt having a long time to run. He argued that it was wise for the Government to pay a large interest in paper—eight per cent. he named—while it agreed to pay the principal of the debt in coin. That was his bill.

The bill which the Committee of Ways and Means reported through the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] was a bill which, notwithstanding the warning which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] gave in his bill, omitted, apparently purposely, the provision that the principal should be payable in coin. I called the attention of the committee to this and many other defects in that bill, as they appeared to me at that time. If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the report of the discussions which took place upon that subject, they will find that I, among others, forewarned the House of the perilous course it was pursuing in reference to the national finances and of the difficulties which would ensue. Unfortunately, I was at that time, as I am now, in the minority in this House, and on account of the political passion and excitement then prevailing I was less heeded at that time than I and others of the minority are likely to be hereafter. I called the attention of the House to the silence of that bill as to the payability of those bonds, whether in paper or in specie. Let me read from the report in the Globe:

"Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my amendment"—

That was the previous amendment, a matter of some importance; but I did not divide the House upon it, because I did not wish to put myself in a false position. I was not responsible for the bill. All I could do was to call the attention of the majority to the point. I withdrew my amendment without a division—

"Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my amendment and move to insert in the ninth line the words 'payable in coin.' Those words are not in this bill, although they are in the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS]."

Mr. HOOPER. The bill of last year—the $900,000,000 bill—contained these words, but it was not deemed necessary or considered expedient to insert them in this bill. I will send up to the desk and ask to have read, as a part of my reply to the gentleman, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury which was published some time ago, giving his views upon that point.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] read that letter yesterday; and I will read only the sentence which relates particularly to this subject. It will be found to exhibit the same evasion of the point—I mean nothing offensive by this language—as was found in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Mr. Chase says:

"It has been the constant usage of the Department to redeem all coupon and registered bonds forming part of the funded or permanent debt of the United States in coin, and this usage has not been deviated from during my administration of its affairs."

This letter was dated May 18, and this discussion was on the 22d of June, more than a month afterward. It will be observed that in this letter there is no pledge of the Secretary of the Treasury directly applicable to this act under consideration. His language is carefully guarded. He says: "It has been the constant usage of the Department to redeem all coupon and registered bonds forming part of the funded or permanent debt of the United States in coin," of which usage there was no manner of dispute, because it had always been the usage. But at that time we were enacting a new law, and the use of the words "payable in coin" was, as I show, purposely avoided, the attention of the House being called to the matter by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and also by myself in the amendment which I proposed.

The House at that time acted considerably upon the subject, and refused to make a direct pledge for the payment of these bonds in coin. I deeply regretted it at the time. But I should not have made these remarks now if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] had not said that I was "apparently satisfied" with the explanation which was then given. I was very much dissatisfied; for I foresaw all this difficulty, all this misunderstanding upon the part of the public, and the doubt which might be thrown upon the honor and character of the Government. What is our duty now, in view of the subsequent letters of the Secretaries of the Treasury, the advertisements which have been put forth upon the part of the Government, the declarations which have been made semi-officially and officially, it is not for me to say. All that I have to say upon the subject is that, as appears by the record here before me, the House did not act inconsiderately or with its eyes shut; that its attention was directed to the subject when this act was before the House for consideration and discussion.

Mr. MAYNARD obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. STOKES, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 89, relating to the reduction of the currency, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

IMPEACHMENT REPORTS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That eight thousand extra copies of the majority and minority reports of the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject of impeachment be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does that include the testimony?

Mr. LAFLIN. It does not.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARTIFICIAL LIMBS.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to examine into the expediency of providing by law for furnishing through the Pension Bureau all necessary artificial limbs and other supports at the expense of the Government to the soldiers and seamen from time to time when needed during their natural lives who are now or may be disabled from the effects of wounds received or diseases incurred in the service of the United States.

ELECTIONS TO CONGRESS.

EMPLOYÉS AT WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, moved that the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the mechanics and employés in the Washington navy-yard praying an increase of compensation and an amendment of the laws regulating the same, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency should consider the propriety and expediency of requiring the national banking associations on and after the 1st day of May, 1868, to redeem their circulation in coin.

Objection was made.

And then, on motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: The petition of Richard W. Davis, of Goliad, Texas, asking to be reinstated to all rights and privileges lost by participation in the rebellion.

By Mr. COBB: The claim of Little B. Mading. By Mr. EGGLESTON: The memorial of Eliza More, of Cincinnati, asking for an additional pension. By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of Mrs. Annie Bagley, for pension.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

The following notices for leave to introduce bills were given under the rules:

By Mr. CAVANAUGH: A bill to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Mississippi river through the State of Minnesota and the Territories of Dakota and Montana and the State of Oregon to the Pacific ocean.

Also, a bill making an appropriation for the erection of public buildings in the Territory of Montana. Also, a bill to establish a branch mint in the Territory of Montana.

Also, a bill granting to Delegates in the House of Representatives from the several Territories of the United States the same rights and privileges now enjoyed and exercised by members of Congress from the several States—including the right to vote on all questions and appointments on committees.

By Mr. KERR: A bill directing a district court to be held at the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, November 29, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Wednesday was read and approved.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate providing for an adjournment of the two Houses without day on Monday, the 2d of December.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. POMEROY. I have the honor to present a petition from Thomas Garrett and others, citizens of the United States, living in Wilmington, Delaware, asking for immediate legislation to secure equal and impartial suffrage wherever the jurisdiction of the United States extends. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented resolutions of the city council of Cincinnati, Ohio, against any further contraction of the currency, and in favor of paying United States bonds in legal-tender notes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented additional papers in the case of P. V. Foland, who prays to be compensated for houses destroyed by United States forces at Scottsville, Albemarle county, Virginia; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the joint select Committee on Retrenchment to report that Mr. Dunbar, who was ordered to be arrested for a contempt of the Senate in not answering certain questions propounded to him by the committee, has been arrested and brought here, and has voluntarily appeared before the committee, and has answered all the questions that we thought it necessary to propose to him, and has satisfied us that he intended no disrespect to the committee or to the Senate in his previous refusal to answer, it having been based upon what he considered a point of honor. I beg leave, therefore, from that committee to report the following resolution:

Whereas Edward E. Dunbar, now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms under an arrest upon a warrant of the President of the Senate, to answer for a contempt in refusing to answer certain interrogatories propounded to him by the joint Committee on Retrenchment, before which he had been duly sworn as a witness, has appeared before the said joint committee and made answer to such interrogatories as have been put to him by its order: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to discharge the said Edward E. Dunbar from custody upon payment of the legal fees chargeable upon the warrant upon which he has been arrested; and that further proceedings in the matter be thereupon dispensed with.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ENGLAND AND ABYSSINIA.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 69) to preserve the neutrality between the Government of Great Britain and the King of Abyssinia, which was read the first time by its title.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas we are at peace with all sovereign Powers and States; and whereas hostilities have unhappily commenced between the Government of Great Britain and the King of Abyssinia; and whereas we are at peace with the Government and with the King of Abyssinia: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That we now declare our determination to maintain a strict and impartial neutrality in the contest between the said contending parties, granting to the flag of each belligerent the same rights, privileges, and immunities, both upon land and water.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this is a copy verbatim of the proclamation issued by the British Government on the 14th day of May, 1861, simply changing the name of the United States to that of Great Britain, and of the confederate States to that of Abyssinia. If there is no objection, and I presume there will be none, as it is simply returning her own compliment to us under similar circumstances, I should like to have the resolution put upon its passage at once. I hold in my hand the English proclamation of which this is a copy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time?

Mr. SUMNER. I think it had better lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

CONTINUANCE OF BUSINESS TO NEXT SESSION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to offer a resolution relating to the business of the body, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That all subjects before the Senate at the close of the present session, including those before committees, shall be continued to the next session, and shall then be proceeded with in the same manner as if no adjournment of the Senate had taken place; and the papers which have been referred to the committees, and may be in their possession at the close of the session, shall be informally returned to the Secretary, and by him restored to the committees when appointed at the next session.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at half past eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

FINANCE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 148) to raise the value of legal-tender notes to par; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that a long bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is not.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have it read.

The Secretary read the bill. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury, on and after July 4, 1869, to pay in coin all United States notes not bearing interest, commonly called legal-tender notes, which may be presented for such payment at the Treasurer's office in Washington or such other places as may be designated by him, of which public notice shall be given. It further provides that, until January 1, 1869, whenever there shall be in the Treasury (after paying the interest and coupons falling due on the 1st of January and July of each year, and deducting gold certificates of deposit) any excess of coin above $75,000,000, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, within thirty days after January 1 and July 1, respectively, sell the same in such manner as in his judgment will best promote the public interest, and may receive in payment United States notes, national bank notes, compound-interest notes, and three per cent. certificates.

The bill also provides that all national banks having on hand less than twenty per cent. in specie of their respective capitals shall hereafter, and until July 1, 1869, keep and hold, in coin, all interest received on United States bonds deposited by them with the Treasurer of the United States; but this is not to be construed as adding anything to the amount of the reserve now required to be held by these banks; and that on and after July 4, 1869, all national banks shall be required to redeem and pay, in coin, on demand, all their bills issued as currency of the denomination of five dollars and under, when presented at their counters, and all bills of a higher denomination either in coin or in legal-tender notes; and any bank failing to comply with these provisions is to be deemed to have forfeited its charter, and the Comptroller of the Currency is to take proper proceedings against it, and, in lieu of it, to authorize new national banks with an equal amount of capital, to be located in such States as may have less than their due proportion of the whole amount now authorized by law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not desire to discuss this matter this morning, but I intend to do so at an early day. I merely ask at the present time that the bill may be printed and lie on the table. Mr. President, while I cordially agree in the sentiment and purpose of the resolution of my colleague, I am yet in favor of Congress grappling with all these difficult questions in relation to finance, with the subject of our legal tenders, and with the subject of bonds; and I have no doubt of the purpose or of the ability of this Congress to so adjust our system of taxation and to pass such measures as will, in the end, prove altogether more satisfactory than the present state of affairs in the country would seem to warrant. I trust that in the end all these measures which have been submitted, and which shall be submitted, will be referred to the Committee on Finance. I make no such motion now, however. I simply move for the present that this bill lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 149) to regulate the selection of officers in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 150) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 151) for the relief of Goldsmith Brothers, of the cities of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 152) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 153) to establish a collection district in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas it appears from House of Representative Executive Document No. 97, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, page 38, that Colonel S. B. Holabird, assistant quartermaster, late chief quartermaster of the department of the Gulf, up to February, 1865, had received of the net proceeds of captured and abandoned property the sum of $943,529 31; and whereas it further appears from page 40 of said document that said sum of money "was used in the quartermaster's department as if belonging to the regular funds" of that department, by direction of "the major general then commanding the department of the Gulf;" and whereas the second section of the act of March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property," &c., requires that the proceeds of such property shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform the Senate at his earliest convenience whether the said sum of $943,529 31 has been credited to the account of captured and abandoned property in the Treasury of the United States, and is included in the total net sum realized from such property as seen in said report, and whether the said sum of money has been charged to the account of the quartermaster's department, and if not so charged to the quartermaster's department what legislation is necessary to effect that object.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. YATES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, November 30, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. A. D. GILLETTE, D. D.

The Journal of Wednesday last was read and approved.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. LAFLIN. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of ALEXANDER H. BAILEY, member-elect to this Congress from the twenty-first congressional district of New York.

Mr. BAILEY appeared, and qualified by taking the oath required by law.

RECESS TILL MONDAY.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, this is the last day of the present session. It is manifest there is no quorum present, and it is morally certain there will not be. It was understood when we adjourned on Wednesday that no business should be done to-day, except to take a recess. I move, therefore, that the House take a recess till ten o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. BANKS. Say eleven.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will say half past ten. The resolution as modified was agreed to; and thereupon (at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes) the House took a recess till Monday next at half past ten o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER (at half past ten o'clock a. m., Monday, December 2) called the House to order, and stated that the recess taken on Saturday last having expired, the House would resume its session.

LAWS OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the laws of the Territory of New Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on the Territories.

NATIONAL BANK STOCK.

Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so changing the law in respect to the taxation of national bank stock as to permit the stock owned in the State where the bank is located to be assessed and paid in the city or town where the stockholder resides.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to the gentleman from New York, my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary. There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, in the Daily National Intelligencer of November 27, 1867, appeared an editorial article, the first paragraph of which reads as follows:

"As the Intelligencer has over and over again tabooed the idea of impeachment, either as to just causes or to the supposition that it could obtain among partisans having common sense, we have now to recede from that position in so far as a majority of the House Committee on the Judiciary are concerned. The nice moral and mental processes leading to the defection of CHURCHILL, of New York, an importunate beggar for place and patronage at the footstool of executive power, were not foreseen, though a Judas might be expected from so mercenary a quarter; nor was it at all out of character that he should cleave to his associates until the last moment, with a view to make treachery the more valuable by inflicting a most fatal stab. To him particularly refer the scorching words of Messrs. WILSON and WOODBRIDGE, who have eminently illustrated the exalted qualities of honor, conscientiousness, and integrity, which are gems in character of inconceivable brilliancy and value, and which we hope may long exist in legislative halls, to save an imperiled country when beset by fierce and angry tempests of human passion."

I have never defended myself in this House against the attacks of newspapers, nor do I expect ever to do. I call the attention of the House to this article for a different purpose. The article attacks, unjustly I think, one of my colleagues on the Committee on the Judiciary, and gives itself point by stating a misapprehension of the report of the minority of the committee on the proposed impeachment of the President of the United States. That report contained in its introductory paragraph the following statement:

"On the 3d day of June, 1867, it was declared by a solemn vote in the committee that from the testimony then before them it did not appear that the President of the United States was guilty of such high crimes and misdemeanors as called for an exercise of the impeaching power of this House. The vote stood yeas five, nays four. On the 20th instant this action of the committee was reversed, and a vote of five to four declared in favor of recommending to the House an impeachment of the President. Forty-eight hours have not yet elapsed since we were informed of the character of the report which represents this changed attitude of the committee. The recentness of this event compels a general treatment of some features of the case as it is presented by the majority, which otherwise would have been treated of more in detail."

The action of the committee on the 3d day of June last had been published to the country by the authority of the committee, and it was deemed proper by my colleague on the committee from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] and myself that the date of the official reversal of that action should appear in our report. This was our first purpose. We were transferred from a majority to a minority, and were compelled to redraft our report to some extent; but we were not prepared to do this until after the reading of the majority report to the committee; hence we said that "forty-eight hours have not yet elapsed since we were informed of the character of the report which represents this changed attitude of the committee," and thereby simply stated the truth. We had not time to adjust our report to all of the positions assumed by the majority of the committee; and our statement in this regard was intended for our own defense, and not as an attack on our colleague from New York. The statement was read to the committee and was passed without challenge by every member thereof. It certainly was not my intention to cast any reflection on the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHURCHILL.] I knew of no reason which would justify me in questioning his motives, or in suspecting his personal or official integrity. I regretted the change which his final vote evidenced; but it never entered my mind to suspect him of other than conscientious action; and I now believe that what he has done is the result of his sense of public duty. I feel confident that he did not act from a mercenary motive, and that he was not a "Judas" in the body of the committee. Nor can I believe that he was "an importunate beggar for place and patronage at the footstool of executive power." His conduct, so far as my knowledge extends, has presented quite the reverse side of this picture. He has abstained from asking executive favor, and has, as I believe, been scrupulously correct in this regard. However much he may have erred in judgment, let it not be charged to improper motives or to mercenary considerations; for I cannot believe that either of these elements have entered into his action as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

PURCHASE OF RUSSIAN POSSESSIONS.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is provided in the first article of the Constitution of the United States that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in consequence of appropriations made by law," and in the second section thereof that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties;" and whereas the President has, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, made a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, by the terms of which the Russian Government undertakes to cede certain territory to the United States, and the Government of the United States undertakes to pay therefor from the Treasury the sum of $7,200,000 in gold: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to consider and report whether, under the Constitution of the United States and the law of nations, Congress has the right to grant or refuse, at its discretion, an appropriation for the payment stipulated in said treaty.

RESOLUTIONS ON FINANCE.

Mr. EGGLESTON, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions passed by the city council of the city of Cincinnati with reference to finance; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DISTILLERY METERS.

Mr. MUNGEN. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution. I wish to make a statement in regard to it, and then to have it referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have his resolution read before he makes his statement or afterward?

Mr. MUNGEN. Before.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas there is at present a very heavy contract, involving an outlay on the part of the Government of hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of dollars, for the manufacture of meters to be attached to stills for the avowed purpose of measuring the quantity of spirits distilled, so as to get the correct basis for taxation; and whereas this House has no definite knowledge of the practical working and utility of such meters, nor whether they are so constructed that frauds on the revenue can be perpetrated through their instrumentality; nor does this House know whether meters that cost $1,500 might not be furnished at $100, if they are found to be of any value at all: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to suspend at once all further action under and execution of the aforesaid contract, until such time as this House can inquire into the facts connected with this subject.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask whether the gentleman contemplates the passage of the resolution at this time.

Mr. MUNGEN. I do not. I wish to make a statement, and then to have the matter referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Ohio making a statement now? No objection was made.

Mr. MUNGEN. It will be remembered by the House that I offered a resolution one day last week bearing upon this question, and asking for information; but thus far there has been no answer to that resolution of inquiry touching this matter.

I am told by practical mechanics that these meters are not such as were contemplated at all; that they are capable of being tampered with; that you can insert a fine wire by raising the top, or otherwise, that will stop the registering of the liquors and permit the spirits to pass through unregistered. It is well known that these bonded warehouses are kept locked up; a person so disposed can raise the lid of one of these meters, by a "jiminy" or some such instrument, and by running in a fine wire stop the registering, and when he hears anybody coming he can draw out the wire and the registering goes on; that they can be stopped or disarranged in other ways. My object in offering the resolution is to have the matter referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and let them get the opinion of practical men, mechanics as well as scientific men.

Let me say another thing. While we might get a meter of this kind which if properly managed and honestly conducted would register the number of liquid or wine gallons, I fail to see how we can get a meter that will register the wine gallons and proof gallons, the latter being those on which the taxation is based.

I would like very much to have this matter fairly tested. If I am not mistaken, it costs nearly as much now to collect the revenue on distilled spirits as the revenue amounts to. I fear there is "something rotten in the state of Denmark" and I want to see where it is.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THE TAX ON COTTON.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed:

Whereas the tax imposed by the Government of the United States upon cotton grown therein rests as a burden upon the country, and especially upon employes and small producers, which, in the present depressed value of that staple is oppressive and ruinous: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to procure the repeal or modification of the tax on cotton and tobacco.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of State of the State of Tennessee make a fair copy of this resolution and transmit the same to the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States.

Adopted November 12, 1887.

F. S. RICHARDS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
D. W. C. SENTER,
Speaker of the Senate.

I, Andrew J. Fletcher, Secretary of State of the State of Tennessee, do certify that the foregoing is a copy of a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, the original of which is now on file in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my official signature, and by order of the Governor affixed the great seal of the State of Tennessee, at the department in the city of Nashville, this 27th day of November, A. D. 1887.

A. J. FLETCHER,
Secretary of State.

CLERKS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I am requested to offer the following resolution in relation to the employment of clerks for some of the committees of the House which have usually had clerks:

Resolved, That the following standing committees of the House be authorized to employ clerks during the sessions of the Fortieth Congress at the rate of four dollars per day while actually employed: Accounts, Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, Public Lands, Foreign Affairs, Post Office and Post Roads, District of Columbia, Territories, Commerce, and Indian Affairs.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVENUE SERVICE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House the whole number of vessels of all descriptions, their names, tonnage, &c., in the revenue service of the United States, where employed, the entire cost of maintaining such vessels for the year ending September 30, 1887, the number and names of the revenue-cutters sold within the last two years, and for what amount; the number and names of all the officers employed in the said revenue-cutters, and whether any vessels in the said revenue service can be dispensed with without prejudice to the public interest.

COTTON TAX.

Mr. EGGLESTON presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, recommending the repeal of the cotton tax; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ARNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. ARNELL. Not exceeding five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ARNELL. I hold in my hand a copy of the Daily Globe of November 22, 1867, in which the following paragraph occurs in the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks:]

"I have also objections to urge to the admission of Mr. ARNELL, of the sixth district of Tennessee. During the war he was established in the county of Lawrence, Tennessee, where he lives, and had a tannery which, during no inconsiderable portion of the war, was devoted to the manufacture of shoes. He declared he was unable to supply his neighbors with shoes because such were the requisitions of the rebel authorities upon him that before he could supply the women and children of his neighborhood with shoes he must supply this foundation and understanding of the rebel army."

I was absent from the city, Mr. Speaker—not having arrived from Tennessee—when these remarks were made. I now desire simply to say that the charges contained in this paragraph are, in every respect, false and garbled—untrue both in letter and spirit. It was never my fortune to have lived in Lawrence—a noble and loyal county of middle Tennessee —and the information is entirely new to me that I owned a tannery in that county; nor did I ever, at any time or in any place, manufacture or cause to be manufactured shoes for rebel purposes. And neither publicly nor privately, during the rebellion, did I express any sympathy for it, or desire to aid "its foundation or understanding," as the gentleman has it. The entire statement is false and garbled. It is true that I owned a leather establishment in Lewis county, Tennessee, and that the rebels got leather therefrom; but the statement as made by the gentleman from New York is not true. Prior to the war, in connection with other parties, I was engaged in the manufacture of leather, and the breaking out of the war found me so occupied.

After the fall of Fort Donelson General Buell occupied my section of the country; but upon his retreat from Corinth, Mississippi, middle Tennessee was left entirely exposed to the rebels. Before, however, the withdrawal of the Federal forces from my vicinity I promptly informed the officer in command, General James S. Negley, that there was a considerable amount of leather in this establishment, and requested him to seize or destroy it. He replied that the abandonment of middle Tennessee would be very brief. He could not transport it, and did not consider the necessity sufficiently great to destroy it. For six dreary months thereafter Van Dorn and Forrest occupied that section of country, conscripting men for the rebel service, seizing and impressing every article of food, clothing, and transportation. A guard of rebel soldiers came to my premises, took possession of this leather in the name of the confederacy, did what force and bayonets are always able to do, carried it off in their own wagons, and doubtless used it for rebel purposes. This is the head and front of my offending—material out of which the rebel press in my own State and elsewhere have manufactured every variety of charge. They are welcome to all that they can make out of it. Let any man, here or elsewhere, produce one written or published line of mine savoring of disloyalty.

It is a singular fact, that I leave the gentleman from New York to explain, that during the years 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864 the rebels, with halts and shot-guns, were hunting Union men by the thousand, yet since that time the rebels of the South and their Democratic friends North have not been able to discover a single southern man that they are willing to acknowledge loyal! In the mad hour of the rebellion I gave to my country's cause no doubtful or lukewarm support. In 1861 I took the stump publicly against secession. In 1862, when the Federal Army entered Tennessee, I rallied the scattered Unionists, and we held meetings expressive of our unalterable devotion to the Union. In 1864, at the suggestion of the then military governor of Tennessee, Andrew Johnson, I reorganized my own county of Maury, with the aid of other Unionists, upon a loyal basis. In the Tennessee Legislature of 1865 and 1866 I did my humble share toward building—not a despotism, as the gentleman from New York says, but a free, loyal, republican State government. That Legislature disfranchised nobody, but simply enfranchised her loyal citizens. In tearing down the flag of the Union the rebels of Tennessee disfranchised themselves. The Legislature in its wisdom left them exactly where they found them; and it is very natural that their friends on the other side of this House should object. False, traitor-hearted Democracy is responsible both for rebellion and disfranchisement.

"Let the galled jade wince."

Mr. Speaker, the blood of the Revolution travels along my veins. My ancestors fought and brought back wounds from King's mountain and Yorktown; therefore I was unwilling to allow such charges as those set out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] to be made upon this floor and go uncontradicted to the country. Nothing is easier than to make reckless charges to blacken other men's character, but I do not envy either the head or the heart of the man so engaged.

NEW ALBANY, INDIANA.

Mr. KERR introduced a bill directing a district court to be held at the city of New Albany, in the State of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the votes by which all those several bills were referred to committees; and also move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. These bills cannot, under the rule, be brought back by motions to reconsider.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I was not aware that this call was made under that rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made the call under that rule, because the call cannot be made on the first day of the next session, which will commence at twelve o'clock m. to-day, there being no Journal to be read on that day.

CALL OF STATES FOR RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the call of States and Territories in inverted order for the introduction of resolutions.

OCCUPANCY OF SAN JUAN ISLAND.

Mr. FLANDERS. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of terminating the joint occupancy of San Juan Island; also, the number of troops we now have stationed there, and the cost to this Government of supporting the same; and that the said committee be requested to report the facts to this House at an early day.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

CHARLES P. JOHNSON.

Mr. BAKER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire what measure of relief, if any, is necessary and proper in the case of Charles P. Johnson, of Upper Alton, Illinois, late a captain in the seventeenth regiment of Iowa volunteers, and to report by bill or otherwise.

TAXES PAID BY NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. INGERSOLL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to send to this House a statement in detail which shall show the amount of taxes of all kinds which were received into the Treasury of the United States during the last fiscal year from the national banks, and the amount of interest drawn from the Treasury by said banks in the same year.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

RAILROAD POSTAL MATTER.

Mr. NIBLACK submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing railroad companies to carry their own letters relating to the business of their roads outside of the mail free of postage; and to report by bill or otherwise.

FEDERAL COURTS IN INDIANA.

Mr. KERR submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Whereas by reason of late decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the jurisdiction of the district and circuit court of the United States in cases of admiralty, which are constantly arising out of the very extensive commerce which is carried on upon our western rivers, and especially on the Ohio river at and below the falls in that river, has been practically increased to a great extent, and the jurisdiction of the local State courts has been in like manner denied and destroyed to an equivalent extent, so that, by lack of convenient and accessible Federal courts, justice is many times practically denied: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the holding of two terms annually of the district court of the United States for the State of Indiana at the city of New Albany, in said State, and to report by bill or otherwise.

LAND BOUNTIES FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. COBURN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for bounties in land to be given to the soldiers of the Union in the late war of the rebellion, and report by bill or otherwise.

REDEMPTION OF BANK CURRENCY.

Mr. MAYNARD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency consider the propriety and expediency of requiring the national banking associations on and after the 1st day of May, 1863, to redeem their circulation in coin.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. GRAVELY submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the internal revenue tax on manufactured tobacco, and provide by law for the collection of such reduced tax by requiring the manufacturer to place revenue stamps properly canceled on the boxes or packages containing the same, and report by bill or otherwise.

CASHERED OFFICERS.

Mr. GARFIELD introduced a bill relating to officers of the Army dismissed or cashiered by sentence of a general court-martial; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL H. MOORE.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into what relief, if any, is necessary for Samuel H. Moore, late a private of company H, fifty-seventh Ohio veteran volunteer infantry, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I must interpose objection, Mr. Speaker, to the printing of all these matters on their introduction. It is an entirely new practice.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I think it has been customary to order the printing of these proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is hard to resist the gentleman's request, but I do not think he ought to insist on the printing of these papers before the Committee on Printing have had them under consideration. This printing largely increases our expenses.

I withdraw my objection at this time.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ABOLITION OF SPECIAL LICENSES.

Mr. WELKER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the revenue law as to abolish the special licenses now required to be paid, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the committee being instructed.

Mr. WELKER. I will modify it, and substitute "directed" for "instructed."

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

NON-CONTRACTION OF CURRENCY.

Mr. BROOKS submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this House the contraction of the currency $4,000,000 per month, authorized by law, but subject to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, ought, during the present depressed condition of the commerce, manufactures, and trade of the country, to cease.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask my colleague to modify his resolution by adding the words "or be essentially modified."

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable, the previous question having been called.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to debate.

Mr. PRUYN. I do not propose to debate the resolution, but merely to suggest a modification.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate.

The House divided on seconding the call for the previous question; and there were—ayes 35, noes 28; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. Brooks and Mr. Hooper of Massachusetts as tellers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether they do not have this subject now before them, and whether they will not soon report to this House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects to debate.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 54.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise for the purpose of asking the consent of the House to address a question to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman rises to debate the resolution it goes over under the rules.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not understand the gentleman to rise to debate the resolution, but merely to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. That is debate.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman state his proposition?

Mr. INGERSOLL. If it is any accommodation to the gentleman I will rise for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKS. It does not accommodate me at all.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, debate arising, goes over under the rules.

FINANCE.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means a question on another subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. INGERSOLL. On the first day of the present session, appreciating, perhaps, as fully as any gentleman here the importance of taking action in regard to the contraction of the currency, I introduced a bill to repeal that section of the law which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to retire the currency $4,000,000 per month, and also to prohibit any further contraction. That bill I had referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, in order that it might be there considered, and in the hope that it might receive an early consideration and be reported for action to the House; for, perhaps, there is no question now before the House of so much importance. I desire the chairman of the committee to state for the information of the House when we shall have a report on that subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, this is hurrying us up very early. I will answer my friend by simply saying that the committee has been unable to have consideration, as yet, of more than one important subject connected with the finance of the country, and upon that we are prepared to report. We propose to meet from day to day, and grapple as best we can with each one of these subjects, including that to which the gentleman now refers, and I apprehend a report will be made upon them, as well as some other matters, at a very early day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The answer is perfectly satisfactory. I now wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee and of the House to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is depleting the country of currency at the rate of $125,000 per day. Sangrado-like he is taking the very blood out of the nation, and he must be stopped, and that quickly.

Mr. SCHENCK. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman I will simply say that although the committee is very young in its life it is not at all asleep, and if it will satisfy my friend I will say not only the Secretary of the Treasury, but from the communications we receive I am inclined to believe that everybody in the country is thinking upon these subjects, and we propose to act as soon as we possibly can, but not without some little deliberation upon the many questions before us; because there are very grave matters with which we have to employ ourselves. I will also remind the gentleman as one reason why the committee has not hurried to report upon any of these subjects, that we have not yet received the report of the head of the financial Department of the Government and of his various subordinates; and although we have anticipated him, and anticipated the whole question in relation to one subject already, we have not thought it expedient to hurry any report upon many of these important subjects, this included, until we have before us at least the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by all the information that can be given by that officer and by the different bureaus of his Department.

NEW LOAN.

Mr. ELA offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a new loan, payable after ten years, and redeemable after thirty years in coin, by the issue of bonds bearing five per cent. interest, in coin, payable semi-annually, and taxable at the rate of one per cent., to be deducted from the interest when paid, the tax to be distributed to the several States in proportion to their Representatives in Congress, in lieu of local taxation; and also, of providing for a notice to holders of Government obligations now or hereafter to become due, that they may receive said bonds in exchange or payment, according to the tenor of their obligations, without interest after notice; said notice to be given from time to time whenever the condition of the Treasury will allow the redemption without increasing the floating obligations of the Government beyond the amount now in circulation, and report by bill or otherwise.

REDEMPTION OF THE FUNDED DEBT.

Mr. BANKS. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That public policy and national honor alike forbid the redemption of the funded debt of the United States in depreciated paper currency.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 32, noes 60.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent to propound a question.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. BANKS. I demand tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BANKS and BOYER were appointed.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to ask the Chair whether if the previous question be not sustained it will be in order to send the resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It certainly would be; or to rise to debate the resolution, which would carry it over under the rules.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-nine, noes not counted.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION IN CONNECTICUT.

Mr. DAWES. I offer the following resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to continue the investigation heretofore authorized by the House into the truth of certain charges against Hon. WILLIAM H. BARNUM, anything in the resolution of the 25th ultimo to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish the gentleman would show the importance of suspending the order made the other day and allowing another committee to travel to Connecticut.

Mr. DAWES. If there be no objection I will state to the House the reason for offering the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object, unless the previous question is withdrawn.

Mr. DAWES. Of course I must withdraw the previous question in order to make the explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I presume there will be no objection if the gentleman can be replied to by any member who desires it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing an explanation and a reply?

No objection was made.

Mr. DAWES. I do not suppose that any one is of the idea that the Committee of Elections are anxious to pursue this investigation any further, or to travel about the country, as is suggested by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

The Committee of Elections were charged with this unpleasant duty at the last session, and they held two sessions in Connecticut. They heard the case in part. They heard but one side of the case, and did not conclude the hearing of that side. The other side has not been heard at all. It seemed to the committee but just and fair that both sides of the case should be heard; and it was understood by the committee that both parties were desirous of presenting the case still further here at the capital.

It is a grave charge made against a gentleman holding a seat in this House. What the grounds are for the charge of course it is not proper for me to state, or what the indications are from the testimony so far as the investigation has been pursued by the committee. It is simply enough for me to state that the committee sent a sub-committee to Connecticut and pursued the investigation in part during the recess. It is their intention, if it be the will of the House, to complete it in as short a time as possible here at the capital. That is all I desire to say about it. The whole House knows the nature of the charge, and the propriety of a fair and proper investigation. I now yield to my colleague on the committee from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. CHANLER. Of course it is not my object to defeat the original object of the Committee of Elections, which was to inquire into the charge made against the Representative from the fourth district of Connecticut, but I feel it my duty to state to the House for its better decision upon this request for authority to take further testimony at this time, that so far as the inquiry has gone the present occupant of the seat [Mr. BARNUM] has offered every opportunity to the committee, and no drawback or hinderance has come from that side for a thorough investigation as to the truth of these heinous charges against him; and as a matter of opinion as to the propriety of holding members of this House up to the country for invidious criticism I feel that it is not encroaching on my duty as a member of the Committee of Elections to say that this gentleman should be entitled to his seat here without this cloud hanging over his reputation, and I believe nothing has been found, and nothing can be found, to warrant so extraordinary a proceeding as the one which has taken place. But I will not now do, nor has Mr. BARNUM or any of those who protect his interests in this case at any time done, ought to hinder a full and thorough investigation as to his character in connection with this matter. If the chairman of the Committee of Elections, therefore, deems that this is necessary, and if he assumes the responsibility of a further investigation, that seems to me to warrant the House in carrying out whatever plans he may have.

I make these remarks more to show that the spirit with which the minority, to which Mr. BARNUM belongs, will carry out this investigation, is one which seeks the light. I hope, however, no construction will be put upon what I say here which will in any way prejudice the case of Mr. BARNUM, or give it a partisan character in any respect.

Mr. SPALDING. I have no feeling in this matter. As respects the two candidates for the vacant seat from Connecticut—or the one which was vacant—I do not think it makes much difference to the interest of the country which gentleman takes the seat.

Mr. UPSON. There is no contest in regard to it.

Mr. SPALDING. There is no contest at all in regard to the seat. I learn from the public papers that a portion of our committee on privileges and elections—for whom I have the most unbounded respect, especially for the chairman of that committee, [Mr. DAWES]—have been engaged for weeks in the State of Connecticut in investigating which of these gentlemen paid the most money for votes. They have ascertained that one of these gentlemen paid for a multitude of votes; and we are told that the other bought up still more. I understand that they want to send a committee there to find out if there was not a majority bought on the other side.

I say it is derogatory to the dignity of this Congress to send out committees for any such purpose. I take it the State of Connecticut will take care of its own citizens. If any of them indulge in bribery within the limits of that State they will be punished under the laws against bribery.

I do not know how we can come to any conclusion on this matter, even if the committee spend three months more in trying to ascertain whether the sitting member expended more money than he who lost the place in obtaining votes for member of Congress. I object to this investigation from principle. I do not like to spend the time of this committee which is so valuable to this House, neither do I like to spend the money of the nation for any such purpose.

Mr. DAWES. Whatever may be the principle of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] which leads him to object to investigating the question whether a man has obtained his seat in this House by bribery or not, it is not worth while for me to discuss. If he has a principle against investigating such a charge as that that is sufficient for him.

I will simply state that the Committee on Elections do not propose to go to Connecticut. I will state further that we have not spent weeks in Connecticut on any such mission as he suggests. There is no such duty devolving upon the Committee of Elections by the resolution of this House which requires them to ascertain which candidate did bribe the most, but they are required by a vote of this House to investigate and report to this House whether the gentleman who holds his seat here has been guilty of bribery in that election. I do not propose to comment upon the weight of the testimony already taken, or upon the ability of the gentleman holding this seat to entirely acquit himself before this House of the truth of the charge. It is due to him, however, that I should state, in conjunction with my colleague, [Mr. CHANLER,] that he has not personally interposed any obstacle in the way of the investigation.

It is, however, true, as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] my colleague upon the committee, will admit, that the committee encountered great difficulty in the obtaining of testimony which seemed to them to be important, in obtaining the attendance of certain persons as witnesses. I do not mean by that remark to intimate that the sitting member is at all responsible for the absence of witnesses; but it did so happen that whenever the committee attempted to obtain the evidence of certain witnesses those witnesses were always out of the State.

Now, I do not personally care about this matter. I should feel greatly relieved if the House should direct this committee to abandon the investigation of the charge against one of its members, that he has obtained his seat here by bribery. I do not mean to say that there is a particle of evidence that he has done so; but here is a charge to that effect made by citizens of the State of Connecticut, and upon the committee has been devolved the duty of investigating it. Without waiting for the committee to complete the investigation or to make any report upon the testimony, it is suggested by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] who cannot have half as much respect for me as I have for him, that that is a trifling matter, and that it is beneath the dignity of the House to inquire into the question whether any man upon this floor holds his seat by virtue of bribery.

Now, I have submitted all that I care to submit upon this question. I shall regard the vote of the House, if this resolution should be rejected, as an indication that the House agrees with my distinguished friend from Ohio in the opinion that it is beneath the dignity of this body to inquire into the question whether a man holds his seat on this floor by bribery.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How many witnesses is it proposed to examine, and upon what branch of the subject?

Mr. DAWES. I can only state this: there were two or three witnesses whose attendance we made diligent efforts to obtain when we were in Connecticut. On both occasions when we were in that State—not two or three weeks, but the great space of four days on two different occasions—those gentlemen were absent from the State, and they reappeared there on each occasion the next day after we left. It has seemed to the committee desirable that these gentlemen should be invited here to the capital to give their testimony. I now yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. CHANLER. From the tenor of the remarks which have fallen from the chairman of the committee, [Mr. DAWES,] irrespective of any previous conversation on the subject with him or with the sitting member, I judge that he would accept as an amendment or a substitute a motion that the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of this subject. I do not wish to assume the responsibility of acting in this matter without the concurrence of the committee; but if the chairman is willing to submit that question to the House at this time, the adoption of such a proposition would certainly carry with it all the advantages of economy, while it would not commit us, as members of the committee conducting the investigation, to any of the charges made against the character of the sitting member. The sitting member is, under the present circumstances, resting under a serious charge; and by the action which I suggest the House would simply declare that, in view of the peculiar character of the charge, and in view of the state of the testimony, which the chairman and the members of the committee are at liberty to state at this time does not convict the sitting member of the charge made, the House would dismiss this matter entirely, and relieve the committee, which has numerous other cases of great importance upon its hands, from any further consideration of the case of the sitting member from the fourth district of Connecticut. With the permission of the chairman, and in view of the suggestion which he has thrown out, I will make the motion that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. DAWES. In reply to the suggestion of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. CHANLER,] I will say that I for one am not prepared to say to the country that a charge made against a member of this House in a serious and proper manner that he holds his seat by bribery is not a charge that demands of this House the fullest and fairest investigation, a report upon it by a committee, and the action of the House upon it. Such a charge has been made here against the member from the fourth district of Connecticut. The Committee of Elections have pursued the investigation for a time. I have felt it my duty to refrain from expressing an opinion upon the character of the evidence; for it appeared to me that it did not become me as a member of the committee to do so before the committee has made a report. I think, for one, that it becomes the House to investigate such a charge with some seriousness. I should think it would be a matter of some importance to the sitting member himself to have a report from this committee upon those charges, and not have them stifled without investigation.

I do not think, therefore, I can, as one member of this House, yield to the suggestion of my colleague. I propose, if the House sustains me, to pursue that investigation with fairness and candor, and if it appears by the testimony that these charges are groundless against this man he shall have the benefit of my testimony in that respect. If it shall appear they are well grounded in the evidence, and are true, I shall feel called upon as one member to bear my evidence before the House on that fact. I do not wish to shrink from the unpleasant duty devolved on myself as well as upon the gentleman from New York, whatever may be the result, and I have not anticipated the result in any word or motion I have made in the House. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. I wish to say that it was on the gentleman's suggestion the motion was made by me.

Mr. SPALDING. I barely wish to say that I am no friend of bribery here or in any place.

Mr. DAWES. I am sure of that.

Mr. SPALDING. And if the gentleman says this is a serious matter I will withdraw any opposition on my part and vote for this resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I now insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes eighty-one, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPEAL OF TONNAGE DUTY.

Mr. PERHAM submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of existing laws as imposes and fixes a tonnage duty on American vessels, and report by bill or otherwise.

CLERKS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PERHAM. The Committee on Invalid Pensions, which has hitherto had a clerk, is not provided for in the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] adopted this morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was intended to be provided for, as that is one of the committees which must have a clerk. I move, by unanimous consent, that it may be inserted in the resolution.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. POMEROY. Has the Committee on Banking and Currency been included in the resolution for employing clerks?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the list be read.

The SPEAKER. Clerks have been authorized by the resolution for the following committees: On Accounts, Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, Public Lands, Foreign Affairs, Post Office and Post Roads, District of Columbia, Territories, Commerce, and Indian Affairs.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Banking and Currency is not included, then?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Had that committee a clerk at the last session?

Mr. POMEROY. We had one employed for months steadily.

Mr. BAKER. I will not vote for a clerk for a committee until it is made to appear that a clerk is needed.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask that the Committee on Mines and Mining be also included.

Mr. BAKER. I object to that also, for the same reason.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the Committee on Private Land Claims be included.

Mr. BAKER. I object.

Mr. LAFLIN. I ask that a clerk be allowed to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not feel disposed to object; but I understand that committee had no clerk until at the last session.

Mr. BAKER. I object.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that the minorities of the several committees be also authorized to employ assistant clerks. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to make a statement in regard to the Committee on Public Lands. The clerk of that committee is employed by the year at a fixed salary, and the resolution authorizing his employment makes it his duty to remain here during the year and keep up the maps of the public surveys in a room specially set apart for that purpose, and take charge of and preserve the land maps ordered by this House. He also performs the duty of a draftsman, and thus saves the Government the expense formerly allowed to such officer, whose appointment has been discontinued. I hope that the House will not interfere with the arrangement already made by law respecting this matter. The duties of this clerk are peculiar, and additional to the duties of other clerks of this House.

The SPEAKER. The hour fixed by the concurrent resolution of both Houses of Congress for the final adjournment of this session having arrived, I declare the first session of the Fortieth Congress adjourned without day.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee: By Mr. EGGLESTON: The memorial of E. V. Brookfield, of Ohio, praying payment for articles lost or taken from him while he was a prisoner of war.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, December 2, 1867.

The Senate met at half past eleven o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 30, 1867.

SIR: In reply to a resolution offered in the Senate of the United States yesterday by Hon. J. CONNESS, and adopted on the same day, calling on me to inform the Senate at my earliest convenience whether a sum of $334,529.31, which appears from House of Representatives Executive Document No. 97, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, page 38, to have been received by Colonel S. B. Holabird, assistant quartermaster, chief quartermaster of the department of the Gulf up to February, 1865, as the net proceeds of captured and abandoned property, and to have been used in the quartermaster's department as if belonging to the regular funds of that department by direction of the major general then commanding the department of the Gulf, "has been credited to the account of captured and abandoned property in the Treasury of the United States, and is included in the total net sum realized from such property, as seen in said report, and whether the said sum of money has been charged to the account of the quartermaster's department, and if not so charged to the quartermaster's department, what legislation is necessary to effect that object," I have the honor to state:

That the exhibit referred to by the honorable Senator as appearing in the Executive Document No. 97, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, shows the result of a preliminary examination of Colonel Holabird's accounts by the quartermaster's department; that in the regular routine of official business they have been under examination for about a year last past in the office of the Third Auditor, which examination will probably be completed during the next two months; that whatever amount shall thereupon be ascertained to have accrued from the sale of captured and abandoned property and to have been used for expenses of the quartermaster's department will then be transferred by executive action, already authorized by law upon the statement of the Third Auditor, to the fund to which it belongs, and be charged against the quartermaster's department, and that no legislation is necessary to effect this object; also that such amount is not included in the total net sum shown by the report referred to to have been thus far realized from captured and abandoned property.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

H. McCULLOCH,

Secretary of the Treasury.

To the PRESIDENT of the Senate of the United States.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the communication was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Subsequently, on the motion of Mr. CONNESS, the order to print the communication was rescinded.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of Alabama, in favor of the repeal of tax on cotton; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Atchison, Kansas, praying for immediate legislation to secure to women equal suffrage with men in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to use their influence to secure a repeal or modification of the tax on cotton and tobacco; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CORBETT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 154) to provide for the issue of gold notes in place of legal-tender notes, and to facilitate resumption of specie payments; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 155) for the relief of O. D. Barrett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PARDON OF COUNTERFEITERS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Attorney General be instructed to furnish to the Senate as early as practicable a full list of the names of all persons pardoned by the President since May 1, 1865, who have been convicted of counterfeiting United States bonds, greenbacks, national bank currency, fractional currency, or the coin of the United States, with the date of issuing each pardon, reason for issuing it, and by whom recommended.

BILL REFERRED.

Mr. NYE. If it is in order I move to take up House bill No. 143, for the purpose of reference.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H.

R. No. 143) to regulate the selection of officers in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. NYE. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SUMNER. I will inquire if that bill was not referred at the latter part of the last session. The Journal would show. I have the impression that it was referred to the committee and reported back to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk informs me that it was not.

The motion of Mr. NYE was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at twelve o'clock m.) The time has arrived when it is made the duty of the Chair to declare that the first session of the Fortieth Congress stands adjourned without day.

SENATE—SPECIAL SESSION.

FORTIETH CONGRESS. SPECIAL SESSION.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 1, 1867.

In pursuance of the President's proclamation of March 30, the Senate assembled at twelve o'clock noon to-day, in the Senate Chamber, in the Capitol, at the city of Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Hon. BENJAMIN F. WADE) called the Senate to order.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proclamation of the President of the United States will be read.

The Secretary read the proclamation, as follows:

By the President of the United States of America:
A Proclamation.

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at twelve o'clock on Monday, the 1st day of April next, to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive:

Now, therefore, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, have considered it to be my duty to issue this my proclamation, declaring that an extraordinary occasion requires the Senate of the United States to convene for the transaction of business at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, on Monday, the 1st day of April next, at twelve o'clock on that day, of which all who shall at that time be entitled to act as members of that body are hereby required to take notice.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States, at Washington, the thirtieth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, and of the independence of the United States of America the ninety-first.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. Before that motion is put, I wish to offer some necessary preliminary resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be the invariable practice to organize the Senate, as it may be called; that is, to inform the President that a quorum is present, and to take action in regard to committees before any other business is proceeded with.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore being authorized to appoint the committee, Messrs. ANTHONY and HENDRICKS were appointed.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was

Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock meridian, until otherwise ordered.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer another resolution; I do it without consultation, but I presume it will meet with general assent:

Resolved, That the standing committees of the Senate of the last session be continued during the present special session.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe all the preliminary resolutions have now been passed. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President replied that he would make a communication to the Senate in writing to-morrow.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That Delphine P. Baker have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate her petition praying that the Government buildings at Point Lookout, formerly occupied as a prison for rebel soldiers, may be appropriated for the National Military and Naval Asylum.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 2, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REVISION OF DISTRICT LAWS.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to prosecute the revision of the laws of the District of Columbia authorized by a joint resolution entitled "A resolution to provide for the revision of the laws of the District of Columbia," approved June 18, 1864, and that they have authority to sit during the recess of the Senate and to employ the necessary clerical assistance for that purpose, not exceeding ten dollars per day.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rise to what I suppose is a privileged question, and if it is not a privileged one, I ask the indulgence of the Senate to permit me to do what I desire to do.

On the 27th of March the honorable member from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] stated that he was then in a condition to make specific charges against my elected colleague, Hon. Mr. Thomas, and in support of that statement he referred to a report made to the stock-holders of the Bank of Commerce of New York by the board of directors sometime in the year 1862.

Mr. Thomas came to this city under the Administration of Mr. Buchanan to accept the office of Commissioner of Patents. He held that for more than a year, and, as I believe, to the satisfaction of all who had business with that department.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the Senator from Maryland alludes to my colleague?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. I merely wish to remind the Senator that he is not present.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not necessary for my purpose that he should be, though I would prefer to have him here. Upon the resignation of Howell Cobb, which took place I think some time about the 11th of December, 1860, Mr. Thomas was requested by the President to accept the office of Secretary of the Treasury, and he was appointed on the 12th of December. He remained in office until about the 12th or 13th of January succeeding, when he resigned. His letter of resignation has already been presented to the Senate by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

When he came into the Department he found the Treasury almost entirely depleted. His predecessor—I have no reason to believe that it was not done with proper motives—in 1857, when there threatened to be a financial crisis in the country, and especially in New York, having in his possession some nineteen or twenty million dollars not called for as he supposed by the necessities of the Government, bought up the stocks of the United States at, I believe, a premium of some twelve to nineteen dollars on the hundred. For doing so, as it operated very beneficially to the banking and commercial interests of New York, he was applauded; but the result was that when Mr. Thomas, his successor, took possession of the Department he found, as I have stated, that there was hardly money enough in the Treasury to meet the daily wants of the Government.

Congress in December, 1860, passed an act authorizing a loan of $10,000,000 on the issue of Treasury notes. Under the authority of that act, the day after it was passed Mr. Thomas issued proposals for a part of the loan, $5,000,000. The advertisement was published just as soon as it was possible to do it after the act was passed. By the law, if I recollect aright, ten days' notice was to be given to receive bids. Those ten days expired about the 27th or 28th of December. The interest to accrue upon the then public debt was to fall due on the 1st of January. When the Secretary opened the bids upon the 27th or 28th of December he found that the Bank of Commerce had subscribed or was willing to take $1,500,000 at a discount of twelve per cent. At that time the public debt of the United States did not exceed some seventy million dollars; and he directs me to say that the moment he saw the very extravagant, and, as he believed, the exorbitant terms upon which alone that bank was willing to take even that part of the loan he hesitated; but knowing that the interest upon the debt would fall due in a few days, that is to say on the 1st of January, he determined to accept their bid for that amount, as that would put him in a condition to meet the interest. While he was deliberating, and perhaps before he had actually decided, the late cashier of the Bank of the Metropolis of this city, Mr. Richard Smith, known to all the Senators I presume, the correspondent of the Bank of Commerce, came over to the Department bringing with him a telegraphic dispatch from the Bank of Commerce saying that they would take the whole loan at the same rate, twelve per cent. That made him hesitate the more. He thought it was a very unjustifiable speculation upon the United States, but rather than run the hazard of having the credit of the United States to suffer from a failure to meet its obligations on the 1st of January he agreed to accept the bid, and the bank was so advised.

According to the terms of the bid and the law, the amount to be paid was upon subscribing one dollar in a hundred, and the balance in five days after the subscription. Five days would carry it to the 2d or 3d of January. The interest, as I said, was to fall due upon the 1st. He had in the sub-Treasury at New York some $800,000 in coin, and he had transmitted, as he was authorized to do, to that office more than one million dollars in Treasury notes; and he addressed a letter to Mr. Cisco, the then sub-Treasurer, telling him that if there was the slightest doubt that the interest would be met at maturity, he wished him to apply the money then in his hands, which was more than sufficient to meet the interest, to that object. Mr. Cisco replied at once, and as I think properly, and the Secretary acquiesced in the propriety of the suggestion, that there were outstanding drafts in the hands of disbursing officers which could not be met without his retaining the funds then in his hands; and that, although he was not certain that they would be presented, yet looking to the contingency of such a presentation, he advised that no such use should be made of the funds, and telegraphed him that he could make another arrangement. The Secretary at once saw that the suggestion of Mr. Cisco should be regarded. At that time the Bank of Commerce, whether it had taken the whole loan or not, as between itself and others, was indebted to the Government in $5,000,000, to be paid on the 2d of January, one day only after the interest was to fall due, and Mr. Cisco made an arrangement with the bank by which they agreed to advance, in anticipation of what they would be compelled to pay on the 2d of January, an amount sufficient to meet the interest that was to fall due on the prior day, and the cashier of the bank, after having advised the Secretary in a letter, a copy of which I have in my hand, that they had taken the loan, wrote under date of the 31st of December, only one day before the interest was to accrue, as follows:

BANK OF COMMERCE IN NEW YORK,
December 31, 1860.

SIR: You will learn from the Assistant Treasurer here, Mr. Cisco, that the parties who made up the bid for $1,500,000 of Treasury notes have to-day completed the preliminary arrangements with him for the balance of the $5,000,000 under your award to them at twelve per cent. interest—the amount being $3,169,000—by the deposit of the required one per cent., the certificate of which I inclose herewith.

Mr. Cisco will no doubt inform you that many of the parties who have now bid for this increased amount are considerable holders of Treasury notes maturing about this time and in the early days of January, for whose convenience I have to request that every reasonable facility and dispatch may be granted in the redemption of the one to furnish the needful means for the prompt payment of their subscription to the other. Could you authorize Mr. Cisco to receive the old notes in exchange for the new? If only to a limited extent, there would be a convenience. If he were authorized to receive them as cash to be transmitted by him to Washington, and the new notes then returned, the transfer would be rendered very easy.

I shall feel obliged if it is in your power to safely and legally consult the convenience of the takers of the new notes as suggested.

I remain yours, very respectfully,

H. F. VAIL, Cashier.

Hon. PHILIP F. THOMAS, Secretary of the Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

On the same day Mr. Cisco sent to the Secretary of the Treasury a telegraphic dispatch, which I will also read:

NEW YORK, December 31, 1860.

Hon. PHILIP F. THOMAS, Secretary of the Treasury:

The balance of the $5,000,000 in Treasury notes, $3,169,000 is taken by the parties referred to at twelve per cent. interest, and a preliminary deposit of one per cent. on this amount has just been made at this office. The further payments to be made within the week, and all I require.

JOHN J. CISCO,

Assistant Treasurer United States.

Thus the Senate will see that on the 31st of December the bank was a debtor to the United States in $5,000,000, its first bid having been accepted of $1,500,000, and the balance being accepted, as is stated in this letter, payable on the 2d of January; and they and others with whom they were associated held Treasury notes formerly issued, and asked the Secretary as a favor that he would permit the sub-Treasurer to take in payment of the loan, which they had agreed to take, and for which they were then responsible, those outstanding Treasury notes as cash. The Senate will also see that neither in the letter of Mr. Cisco nor in the letter of the bank is there the slightest intimation that there existed any difficulty about the payment of the interest, and the Secretary, as will be evident to any Senator who will consult the documents to which I am about to refer, rested confident that the interest would be paid, and as an evidence of his desire to pay it had gone to the extent of advising that moneys in the hands of the sub-Treasurer applicable to other purposes should, in order to save the credit of the Government, be applied to the payment of the interest to fall due on the 1st of January. The interest was payable in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, New Orleans, and Washington, and it was paid punctually; and he advises me, and requests me to state, that from that moment until he saw in the papers of the morning of the 28th of March the statement made by my friend from Michigan, he had never heard that the Bank of Commerce or anybody else anticipated a failure in meeting the interest and preserving the credit of the Government. He saw that statement and saw that report for the first time on the day after it was brought before this body by my friend from Michigan. He was then in Annapolis, returned to the city as speedily as he could, and wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury asking for such information as he supposed would enable him to defend himself against what he considered, and as I think properly considered, a baseless slander; and the Secretary, acting in that respect justly, directed the information that he asked for to be furnished, and in answer to the last question in his letter addressed to the Secretary, whether there was anything upon the files of the Department to call in question his integrity as a public officer, the Secretary assures him that there is no evidence at all, but that his duties were fully and fairly performed.

Naturally he felt what the Bank of Commerce had stated as an assault upon his personal honor. He felt aggrieved. He knew—and the documents to which he will refer us are conclusive upon the subject—that there was not the slightest pretense for making that assault upon him; and above all was he surprised that it should have come from the Bank of Commerce, who were speculating upon the necessities of the Government in demanding the extravagant rate of discount of twelve per cent., when the debt which the Government owed at that time did not exceed $70,000,000. He therefore, as soon as he could get the vouchers which he desired in order to defend himself upon this wanton and groundless assault, addressed me a letter upon the subject, accompanied by the vouchers upon which he relied, and he desires, as I desire, the letter not being long, that it shall be read to the Senate, and I propose to read it as a part of my remarks. I have placed it in the hands of the Secretary, with the request, with the permission of the Senate, that he read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1867.

SIR: On Wednesday, March 27, 1867, Senator HOWARD, of Michigan, called the attention of your honorable body to an annual report of the Bank of Commerce, in New York, addressed to their shareholders, and dated March 12, 1862.

From that document the following passages were read to the Senate:

"Up to the close of December of the eventful year 1860 the interest on the stocks of the United States falling due on the 1st of January succeeding had been, for the first time, left unprovided for by both Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury, and Philip F. Thomas, his temporary successor in that office. No efficient measures to make seasonable provision therefor had been taken by either, and the funds in the Treasury here, which might and should have been reserved to be applied to the payment of this interest, were drawn and appropriated for other purposes at the last hour.

"This was evidently a wicked and treasonable plot to dishonor the credit of the United States by default in the payment of interest on its stocks by neglecting to provide for the arrears due to the Army and Navy and the civil and diplomatic list, including those due to members of Congress then in session.

"The success of this would have caused great confusion in public affairs and disastrous embarrassment to the Government, and it became manifest that instant, united efforts were required to defeat it.

"This institution for itself, and several of its directors, for their own account, promptly assumed a large share of an immediate advance, by such banks and capitalists as had united in the emergency, to the United States Treasury of $5,000,000, upon an absolute condition of the payment of the interest, due the next day, upon the United States stocks. Others doubtless would have participated in this loan could they have been consulted; but so carefully had this treacherous scheme been kept from public sight, and so late was it discovered, that it was only by the use of the telegraph that a timely provision could be made at last."

I beg leave to observe that I never saw or heard of the document referred to by the Senator from Michigan until my attention was called to the debate in which he produced it. If I had been aware that such a report had ever been made, the Senate may be assured that I should have taken at once the measures which were necessary to vindicate my name from an attack which the authors must have known was wholly false. It is a satisfaction, however, to every man who has been connected with the administration of an Executive Department of the Government, to know that the records of that Department will always supply the fullest means for his vindication when he has pursued steadily the dictates both of law and of honor in the regulation of his public conduct. And although I have had a brief opportunity of examining the books of the Treasury Department, I am satisfied that the papers which I now present to your consideration will suffice to show the utter untruthfulness of the report to which the attention of the Senate has been called.

I was Secretary of the Treasury from the 12th day of December, 1860, to the 11th day of January, 1861, both days included.

You are perfectly aware that when I entered upon the duties of that office the monetary affairs of the Treasury were in an exceedingly embarrassed condition. The wants of the Government were provided for by temporary expedients; and as no provision had been made for the payment of the interest due in New York on the debt of the United States, payable January 1, 1861, which interest amounted to about one million one hundred thousand dollars, I immediately took measures to remedy this evil as far as it was in my power, having in view, of course, always the general and pressing necessities of the Government at this and other places. On the 12th day of December, 1860, which was the very first day of my connection with the Treasury Department, I ordered, as will appear by document No. 8, filed herewith, $300,000 from St. Louis to New York. On the 24th day of December, 1860, I was obliged by the exigencies of public affairs to order $100,000 from New York to Washington; and on the 29th of the same month, for the same reason, I caused to be transferred $15,000 from New York to Pittsburgh. The same statement (No. 8) shows conclusively that I transferred no other funds from New York to any point whatever until the interest on the public debt due January 1, 1861, had been fully provided for. What, therefore, can be thought of the statement made by the Bank of Commerce in New York, that I drew and appropriated to other purposes, at the last hour, funds which might and should have been reserved for the payment of this interest? And what language can properly be applied to a statement that my conduct in this particular was part of a wicked and treasonable plot to dishonor the credit of the United States?

Affairs being in this condition, the Congress of the United States took measures to provide funds for the wants of the Government; and on the 17th day of December, 1860, a law was approved authorizing the negotiation of a loan of $10,000,000, or the issue of Treasury notes, payable in twelve months, bearing six per cent. interest, to an equal amount.

On the same day, as will be seen by reference to paper No. 9, herewith filed, I telegraphed Mr. Cisco, Assistant Treasurer at New York, advising him of the passage of the act, and asking for a reply by telegram as to the amount which would probably be taken, and at what rate; and desiring him to give me his judgment whether the whole loan should be offered or a part of it.

In his reply of the same date, marked letter A, herewith filed, he stated that it would be unwise to offer more than $5,000,000 at that time, and that I could put $3,000,000 more in the market after January 1, 1861.

In my reply, marked letter B, filed herewith, I stated to him that $5,000,000 were required by the public service, and that I was obliged, therefore, to offer that sum.

On the 18th day of December, 1860, the day next succeeding the passage of the law, I advertised, in accordance with its terms, that sealed proposals would be received at the Treasury Department until the 28th day of December, 1860, for the issue of any portion or the whole of $5,000,000 in Treasury notes, in exchange for gold coin of the United States, to be deposited with the several officers named in the advertisement, among whom, of course, was Mr. Cisco, the Assistant Treasurer at New York. This advertisement is filed herewith, and marked No. 2.

It will be seen that bids could not be opened under the provisions of the law requiring ten days' notice until December 28, 1860, and that the gold coin was to be deposited with the Assistant Treasurers and depositaries where the offers were accepted within five days of the acceptance of such proposals.

On December 24, 1860, the Register of the Treasury, according to the routine of the office, addressed the letter marked No. 24, informing me that it was impossible to tell the correct amount required for the payment of interest in New York on the 1st of January, 1861, and suggested that $1,100,000 be provided and sent to Mr. Cisco, the Assistant Treasurer.

Warrant No. 4215 for $1,100,000 was issued for this purpose December 24, 1860, and draft No. 412 on that warrant was sent to Mr. Cisco by the Treasurer of the United States December 20, 1860, which was paid and charged in account December 31, 1860, as will be seen by paper No. 7, herewith filed.

On the 27th December, 1860, I advised Mr. Cisco of the issue of the warrant in question as an advance to pay the interest on the public debt, payable on and after 1st day of January, 1861.

I informed him that the Treasurer would pay that warrant in six per cent. Treasury notes under the recent act, and that those Treasury notes would represent a corresponding amount of the coin held by him to the credit of disbursing officers; and would enable him to employ that amount of coin in the payment of interest when the parties entitled did not choose to receive Treasury notes. The small premium payable for gold at that time gave me an opportunity of suggesting the arrangement which is fully stated in the letter last referred to, marked No. 9, (Y.)

On the 27th December, 1860, Mr. Cisco advised me by letter, filed herewith, marked C, that the preliminary deposits on account of bids for Treasury notes amounted to $4,500, indicating bids "from New York for only $430,000." He further advised me in the same letter, of his efforts on that day to have a sufficient amount bid for to cover the interest on the public debt due on the 1st of January, 1861, and that he had so far failed, but entertained a strong hope of being able to accomplish it in the morning; and if so, some house in Washington would be telegraphed to make the preliminary deposit with the Treasurer and present the bid at the Department before twelve o'clock m.

On the 28th of December, 1860, Mr. Cisco acknowledged the receipt of my letter of the 27th, informing him that a warrant had been issued in his power for $1,100,000 as an advance to pay the interest on the public debt on and after the 1st proximo, and that the warrant would be paid in six per cent. Treasury notes under the late law. In his reply he informed me that the balance held by him to the credit of disbursing officers was $1,100,000, and that it would be hazardous to the public credit to use that money in the manner proposed by me, for the reasons set forth in the letter herewith filed, marked B (X.)

On the 28th of December, 1860, according to the terms of advertisement of the loan, the bids were opened; and among them was found an offer by the Bank of Commerce in New York, for $1,500,000 at twelve per cent.; and on the day next succeeding I forwarded to Mr. Cisco a complete list of the accepted bids, among which was that of the Bank of Commerce, amounting in the aggregate to $1,831,000, as will be seen by letter filed herewith, marked No. 9, (X.)

Upon such opening of the bids on the 28th of December, 1860, and before an account thereof was deposited and stated, Mr. Richard Smith, now deceased, then cashier of the Bank of the Metropolis of this city, came to the Department and informed me that the Bank of Commerce in New York was ready to take the balance of the loan on the terms of its bid for the $1,500,000, that is to say, at twelve per cent. interest. No immediate answer was given to Mr. Smith; but after consultation with the President I called on the evening of the same day at the residence of Mr. Smith and informed him that his offer for the balance of the loan on account of the Bank of Commerce in New York, would be accepted.

On the 29th of December, 1860, the day next succeeding the opening of the bids, I addressed a letter to Mr. Cisco apprising him that the accepted offers amounted to $1,831,000, and that there remained $3,169,000 of the proposed $5,000,000 loan undisposed of and subject to the proposal made by the Bank of Commerce in New York, to take the whole balance for Treasury notes bearing twelve per cent. interest. This will appear by letter marked E, filed herewith.

It will be seen from the Treasury statement herewith filed, marked No. 10, that Treasury notes were issued in exchange for coin on the 29th of December, 1860, for $116,000, and on the 31st of December, 1860, for $1,580,000; the proceeds arising from which were available for the payment of interest on the public debt due January 1, 1861. That interest was duly paid from the funds thus provided; and I have no knowledge that the Bank of Commerce did anything further in the premises than make the payment of the money which it had engaged to loan to the Government at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum.

In conclusion, I beg leave to observe that it will appear from what has been shown already, that when I entered upon the duties of Secretary of the Treasury no provision had been made by law for raising the money necessary to meet the interest on the public debt, and there were no funds applicable to that purpose.

It will further appear that from the moment of my accession to office all my energies were devoted to remedy this mischief, and that I strove to apply every available dollar to the payment of the interest accruing on the obligations of the Government and to the discharge of its debts as they matured.

I venture to say that no executive officer could have done more than I did to uphold the credit of the United States; and it gives me pleasure to know that the records of the Treasury Department are my sufficient vindication.

It will be seen that I did take efficient measures to make seasonable provision for the interest due on January 1, 1861, wherever it was payable; that is, in New York, New Orleans, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, and Charleston; and the interest was punctually paid.

It will appear that the statement that I drew, at the last hour from the Treasury in New York or elsewhere, money, which ought to have been applied to the payment of the interest due on the public debt, is a wicked falsehood.

It will be seen that there was not only no plot to dishonor the credit of the United States by permitting any default to take place in the payment of its obligations, but that there was, on the contrary, an honest, energetic, and successful effort to provide the means for that purpose.

It will be seen that the Bank of Commerce in New York, which claims the credit of supplying my deficiencies, did nothing except comply with the terms of an oppressive contract, which the necessities of the Government had forced it to enter into.

And I will only, in conclusion, observe that nothing could be more absurd than the statement of the Bank of Commerce that it agreed to make its payments upon the condition that the interest due on the stocks of the United States on January 1, 1861, should be paid; because, having subscribed for the loan, it was bound to pay its subscription by the terms of the contract, which contained no condition whatever; nor did I ever hear of such a condition. It is not, and it has never been, the habit of the Government of the United States to permit the banks in the city of New York or elsewhere to dictate the manner in which loans shall be used. Such loans are made by the banks for their profit and advantage, and it is for Congress to regulate by law the application of the public money.

The Senate will observe that the statement made in reference to myself is contained in a paper which is not supported by a particle of evidence. I choose to reply fully, however, to the charges, and to rest my vindication upon the public records of the Government. I trust it may be permitted to ask a full and speedy vindication from the Senate of the United States. I make this claim as a Senator, duly elected from the State of Maryland. I cannot believe that the statement of a board of bank directors of the city of New York, unsupported by any evidence, and made perhaps for the purpose of excusing the exorbitant rates charged to the Government, will be accounted any reason for assailing the reputation of a Senator elected to a seat in your honorable body.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
PHILIP F. THOMAS.

Hon. REVERDY JOHNSON, Senator from Maryland.
Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Maryland has closed his remarks on this subject, I beg to be indulged in making a single observation.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have said all I propose to say now.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to interrupt the remarks of the honorable Senator if he has anything further to say on this question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have closed.

Mr. HOWARD. My object in presenting the statement made by the Bank of Commerce in relation to Cobb and Thomas was to elicit, so far as practicable, the truth of the case in regard to Mr. Thomas, and to lay before the Committee on the Judiciary of this body such facts as that paper contained in order that they might pursue the inquiry as far as they should think desirable and just. I do not even now entertain a willingness to do or say anything in regard to Mr. Thomas that shall prejudice his just claims and his fair standing before the country. In short, sir, I decline to occupy the position of a prosecutor or accuser, and aim that my efforts shall only be directed to enable the Committee on the Judiciary to ascertain the truth of the case.

But, sir, while I say this, I must be allowed to say further that there is one statement contained in the paper which has just been read at the desk which strikes me with a little surprise, and to that fact I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maryland. The statement of which Mr. Thomas now complains in his communication is a printed document issued by the president and cashier of the Bank of Commerce of New York, under date of March 12, 1862. The presumption is that this printed statement must have had considerable circulation; for I take it for granted that the stockholders in that institution are somewhat numerous; at all events, that the persons interested in that bank are numerous and influential.

But in addition to this fact of the statement being printed and circulated, there is another to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. Mr. Thomas professes to be very much taken by surprise by the fact that this printed statement should be thus laid before the Senate, and that he never before should have had any knowledge of it. Indeed, he states emphatically and clearly that until my remarks on this subject, made on the 27th of March last, he was in total ignorance of the existence of such a statement. That statement was in its tone and style accusatory against that gentleman in the highest degree. It in fact charges him with treasonable complicity, or rather treasonable conduct in omitting to make proper provisions for the payment of the interest falling due upon the public stocks of the United States in the city of New York on the 1st of January, 1861.

Now, sir, it is a little surprising to me that Mr. Thomas should not have been aware of the fact that the whole of this printed statement relating to himself and Mr. Cobb was published in the National Intelligencer of the 28th of May, 1862, nearly five years ago. I hold in my hand a slip from that paper, in which are the same extracts that I read here on the 27th of March in relation to Mr. Thomas. It is not improbable that this statement relating to that gentleman received a still broader circulation in the country in the ordinary newspapers of the day; for one of so much importance and gravity, implicating the honor and the loyalty of Mr. Thomas, would naturally, to say the least, have received a very broad and thorough circulation throughout the land.

If he is now so deeply aggrieved by these statements, how has it happened that he has slept upon this public information for nearly five years, and has never opened his mouth or used his pen, so far as I know or have heard, by way of rebuke to the officers of the Bank of Commerce of the city of New York? I call the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to the fact that this charge has been in circulation against Mr. Thomas for that period of time, and that he has remained silent upon it.

It is very possible that he may be able to make a perfect reply to the charges. I do not go into the issue between himself and the Bank of Commerce. That is a matter in its nature private; and I do not wish to prejudice the case of Mr. Thomas in respect to the Bank of Commerce. But what has struck me with no little surprise is the fact that he should now state five years after this important publication, which he charges to be in a high degree slanderous, and which is here pronounced to be a baseless slander by the Senator from Maryland, that this statement has totally escaped his notice until this time.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Michigan, if he is under that apprehension, is mistaken in supposing that my colleague or myself (if my own opinion on the subject is worth stating) find any fault with the course which the honorable member has thought proper to adopt. He stated originally some charges against my colleague, but he stated them, as he said, upon rumor; and when, as he now tells us, he was called upon by the committee to place before them whatever assertions he might make calculated to show that my colleague was not entitled to or was not worthy to have a seat in this body, he said; and as I think very properly, that he did not wish to be considered as an accuser. But when he produced the paper in question, he did it by stating that although his former speech dealt in rumor and generalities he was then able to present to the Senate against my colleague a specific charge; and he founded his right, and what I have no doubt he considered his duty, to make that charge upon the report of the Bank of Commerce.

Now, the honorable member tells us that although my colleague, whose honor has never been questioned before, whose veracity would not be doubted by any man who knows him, tells the Senate that for the first time he became aware of the existence of that report, it strikes him with surprise, and he expresses his surprise in such terms as are calculated to make the Senate believe that he does not credit the denial of my colleague. I had supposed that in the absence of any evidence proving that a Senator upon this floor, or one who claimed to be a Senator on this floor, was not entitled to have his word taken for truth, no Senator would have attempted to impugn that truth unless he had in his possession evidence to warrant him in coming to that conclusion.

The honorable member tells us that the only reason which he has for doubting—for it is evident that he does doubt—the assertion of my colleague that he heard of this report for the first time when it was produced upon this floor by the honorable member from Michigan, is, that it was published, as he supposes, to the numerous stockholders of the Bank of Commerce and distributed throughout the country; and secondly, that it appeared, either in whole or in part, in the Intelligencer of this city some time in May, 1862.

If the honorable member had known what the facts are in relation to my colleague, I am sure he would not for a moment have suffered himself to suspect his veracity upon any such grounds. My colleague left the city of Washington in April, 1861. He retired to his farm on the eastern shore of Maryland, and there he remained, subscribing to no paper, as he assures me, except the Baltimore Sun, never having seen the Intelligencer from that time during the existence of the war; and he therefore had no ground to suspect that anybody, bank director or bank president, or anybody else, supposed for a moment that while he was the incumbent of the Treasury for one month only he had conspired with the former incumbent to destroy the credit of the Government. That incumbent, whatever he may have done, left here before my colleague took possession of the Treasury.

But I wonder also that it had not occurred to the honorable member from Michigan, if he accords to my colleague ordinary intelligence, that he would not have made that denial if there was to be found upon the records of the Treasury Department any evidence to justify the charge. He has laid before us everything to be found in the Treasury Department touching his administration of its duties during the entire period that he was the Secretary of the Treasury. If these copies are true—and nobody can doubt that; they have been furnished by the present Secretary of the Treasury—if these documents are true, then they demonstrate that the charge against him was not only untrue in point of fact, but that there is every reason to believe that those by whom it was uttered knew it to be false.

I move that the statement of my colleague and the vouchers accompanying it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. MOORE, his Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of March 20, correspondence relating to the exequatur of the consul of the Grand Duchy of Oldenburg, residing at New York; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 3, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 4, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no legislative Journal this morning.

Mr. SUMNER. Surely the Senate met yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no legislative business yesterday to be recorded.

Mr. SUMNER. There was a meeting yesterday and there was a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The record of yesterday's proceedings, what there is of it, will be read.

The Secretary read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, containing the recital of the fact that on motion of Mr. RAMSEY the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after its consideration adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, praying for a grant of land in aid of the construction of a railroad to connect the mining region of the upper peninsula of that State with the Straits of Mackinaw; which were ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the Army Register of 1866 be printed for the use of the Senate.

A certain number of copies of the Army Register, I do not know how many, are printed for the use of officers of the regular Army by the Adjutant General. We have thousands of officers who have been in the volunteer service who have a very deep interest in the Register, but who are unable to get it. I think it but just that the Senate should print at least ten thousand copies, to enable them to be furnished to volunteer officers who are not now in the service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rules require that this resolution shall go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORTON. If there is objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It must go there by the rules, and had better be referred at once.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will make one remark in regard to resolutions that by the rule are required to go to the Committee on Printing. There have been several cases in which by unanimous consent the rule has been dispensed with. I have once or twice stated the fact that this reference to that committee is required, not merely by a rule of the Senate, but by a law of Congress, which of course it is not in the power of the Senate to dispense with. The Committee on Printing would certainly be glad to be relieved from the duty of considering all these matters; but I think it my duty to make the suggestion.

Mr. MORTON. I am willing to let the resolution go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing under the rules.

CHAPLAIN.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That there shall not be elected or selected a Chaplain of the Senate hereafter.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rules.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 5, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITION.

Mr. COLE. I present the petition of the Veteran corps of California, praying to be allowed transportation from the place of their discharge in New Mexico and Texas back to their homes in California. These soldiers served for two or three years under General Carleton, doing the most arduous service possible during this time. They were successful in their contests with the various tribes of Indians; in fact, subdued the Navajoes, and fought successfully the Apaches and Comanches, and when they were discharged, two thousand miles away from home, they were allowed a mere pittance, a sum altogether inadequate to carry them back by the usual conveyances to their homes. They ask to be allowed, as other soldiers have been who have been discharged away from home, some compensation to meet the expense which they had to incur. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF ARMY STORES.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the Senate the bids and papers upon which the acting Quartermaster General made the award for the transportation of Army stores on route No. 1, on the 30th of March last, for the year ending March 31, 1868.

MESSENGERS, PAGES, AND LABORERS.

Mr. FOWLER. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized and directed to retain the number of messengers, pages, and laborers now employed during the recess of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that that resolution be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred, no objection being made.

LOUIS V. BOGY.

Mr. ROSS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate whether Louis V.

Bogy, late Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is now in the employ of the Department of the Interior; if so, in what capacity, what are his duties, and what is his compensation, and when was he appointed, and by whom, and what instructions, if any, have been issued to him, and by whom, and when?

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. SAULSBURY.

Mr. SUMNER. I send a resolution to the Chair, and shall ask action upon it to-morrow. The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. SAULSBURY, a Senator of Delaware, having appeared repeatedly on the floor of the Senate while in a condition of intoxication, is hereby expelled from the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 6, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, which comes from the Committee on Printing and meets their approbation:

Resolved, That of the additional copies of the last report of the Commissioner of Agriculture heretofore ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, one thousand be assigned to the Commissioner.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Commissioner of Agriculture has been very desirous to have a larger number of his report, but the Committee on Printing have not felt disposed to recommend the printing of any additional number, and this resolution takes from the Senators one thousand copies and assigns them to the Commissioner. It does not increase the number printed, but diminishes the number distributed to Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have been divided, and some of them sent off.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; this is the last report, not yet printed.

The resolution was adopted.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion by Mr. WILLEY, it was Ordered, That James H. Merrill, late a captain in the so-called naval brigade, have leave to withdraw his petition praying for compensation for his services and accompanying papers.

ASSESSOR FRAZIER, OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senate has been very liberal recently in confirming nominees, and some of them are expressing their gratitude. I will ask that the following communication, which is very complimentary to the Senate, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there is no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Who writes it?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a speech by a gentleman who has been highly honored by the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

"COMPLIMENTARY SERENADE TO ASSESSOR FRAZIER. —Last evening Assessor Frazier, of the first district, was tendered a grand complimentary serenade, gotten up by the assistant assessors, clerks, and others attached to his office. The affair came off at Mr. Frazier's residence, No. 929 South Fourth street. The services of the Jefferson Cornet Band were secured, and after the performance of a number of popular airs Mr. Frazier, in response to the cries of the gathered assemblage, made his appearance in front, and addressed his friends as follows:"

"And now, gentlemen, a word as to the political course I intend to pursue. A number of my Radical friends have kindly invited me back to the fold from which, eighteen months ago, they so summarily expelled me. They argue, 'You are beyond the power of removal by the President; a radical Senate having placed you in that position, your appointments should be Radicals.' It is because the last Congress screwed the brakes so tightly upon the Executive that I am more than ever determined to stand true to Andrew Johnson. I do not consider myself under any very great obligations to the Senate of the United States further than to do my duty as an officer. No man was removed by the President to give place to me. A vacancy existed, caused by the death of my lamented predecessor, Mr. Webb. I was selected to fill this vacancy; and it was because Senators FESSENDEN, SPRAGUE, and SHERMAN determined to maintain the dignity of the Senate that these gentlemen insisted upon and secured my confirmation. Politically I am still a conservative. I believe in Johnson, Grant, Farragut, Sherman, and the Supreme Court, and the conservative and humane principles they maintain, in contradistinction to the fearful principles of SUMNER, STEVENS, BUTLER, and company. I believe in civil law and liberty rather than in military despotism. I am opposed to the centralization of power as advocated by STEVENS and company, and am for the maintenance of the rights of all the people in all the States under this Government; therefore, gentlemen, I am against the Radical element that is trampling the Constitution of the United States under foot, obliterating State after State, demoralizing trade and finance, and am for constitutional law and civil liberty, with all their benign influences and substantial blessings."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further legislative business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, April 8, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, information in relation to the employment of Louis V. Bogy in the Department of the Interior; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate at five o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, the 10th instant, adjourn the present session sine die.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the consideration of that now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It lies over under the rule.

COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a vacancy on the Committee on Printing caused by the death of Mr. RIDDLE. I move that the vacancy be filled by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. JOHNSON to fill the vacancy.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m.

PROPERTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. WILLEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate copies of all deeds, conveyances, and other evidences of title by which the United States have claim to any lands, tenements, water privileges, or other property at or near Harper's Ferry, in the State of West Virginia; what parts thereof, if any, have been sold or transferred, and the purposes of such sale or transfer; and whether there be any reason why the part or parts of said lands, tenements, water privileges, or other property remaining unsold and undisposed of shall not now be sold.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 9, 1867.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish the Senate a list of the names of volunteer officers now in the service of the Government, their rank and the particular duties to which they are assigned; also that he inform the Senate under what law such volunteer officers are retained in the service, and whether their services, or that of some of them, may not be dispensed with without detriment to the public interests.

CALLS FOR INFORMATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the Senate:

All resolutions calling upon the President or upon any of the Executive Departments for information shall be referred to one of the standing committees of the Senate, which shall report to the Senate an estimate of the probable expense of furnishing the information called for; and this report shall be made without delay.

I should like to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and hope the committee will have time to attend to it. We are constantly calling upon the Executive Departments for information, and frequently without a very accurate knowledge of the value of the information, and with none at all of the great cost of furnishing it. Frequently the Executive Departments are obliged to employ a number of clerks for weeks to answer calls for information, which would not have been made if the Senate or the person offering the resolution had known the cost. I prefer that the resolution, should be referred to a committee, as it proposes to alter the rules of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to the resolution, but I think it had better go to the Committee on Printing, who are more familiar with these matters of information. All the communications which come from the Departments, or nearly all of them, are published under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Printing, and it seems to me they would have a better knowledge of the character of these resolutions than the Judiciary Committee would. We never have before us any of the replies to these resolutions or any information on the subject, except as to those that particularly relate to business before that committee, while the Committee on Printing usually has referred to it all those communications, and understands the subjects much better. I think it had better go to that committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that reference; but this is the rule itself which I propose to have referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The propriety of changing the rule will depend on facts much better known to the Committee on Printing than to us.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to that reference, only I thought the Committee on the Judiciary the proper place for business of this sort—

Mr. TRUMBULL. That no other committee would have. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing, if there be no objection.

GOVERNOR OF COLORADO.

Mr. THAYER. It will be recollected that at the last session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, the Senator from Ohio, now in the Chair, offered a resolution making inquiry of the President in regard to the absence of Alexander Cummings, Governor of the Territory of Colorado; as to how long he had been absent since his appointment, &c. The resolution was modified so as to embrace territorial officers generally. I desire now to make the inquiry: has any response to that resolution ever been received from the President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No response has ever been received.

Mr. THAYER. Then, sir, I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate when Alexander Cummings was appointed Governor of Colorado Territory; how much of the time said Cummings has been absent from the Territory since his appointment, and whether by permission or not, and how much of said time absent with permission, and how much without permission, and whether on public duties or not, and whether his salary has been paid to him during his absence or not, and how much has been paid to him as salary for the time he has been absent from the Territory.

My reason for offering the resolution is that I have been informed by those who have the means of knowing, that I have no personal knowledge; that Mr. Cummings was appointed Governor of Colorado Territory a year ago last September, that he has been absent from the Territory about eight months of that time and is still absent. He has been here in the city of Washington some four months, I understand. Knowing the extent to which this evil of the absence of territorial officers from their posts has been carried, I regard it as my duty to bring this case to the notice of the Senate. I have known judges of Territories to live in the States year after year, going out now and then on a pleasure trip to the Territories, holding court there, and then returning to their residence in the States again. Here we have a territorial Governor absent nearly half the time he has held the office. I repeat this evil has been carried to such an extent that the interposition of Congress is required to stop it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like this resolution to go over until the morning in order that I may accompany its passage with some explanations. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution; but I should be sorry to have it passed, and the Senate adjourn on the ex parte statement made by the Senator introducing it. There are explanations to be given for the absence of this officer, at least so far as the late session of Congress is concerned, connected with public duties at the city of Washington, and as a witness before a committee of Congress. I ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow, and then I shall offer no objection to it further than to make an explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the present consideration of the resolution it will go over until to-morrow.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, and ask its reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the next Army Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I move to amend that by striking out "two" and inserting "ten."

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution will go to the Committee on Printing first and be reported doubtless to-morrow, and then the Senator's amendment will be in order.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 10, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WASHINGTON SAVINGS BANK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the president of the Washington City Savings Bank, communicating the annual statement of that bank for the year ending April 1, 1867, in conformity to law; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PRISONERS OF WAR IN MEXICO.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of any recent correspondence which may have taken place upon the subject of prisoners of war taken by belligerents in the Mexican republic.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution I offered the other day in reference to the adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. WILLIAMS on the 8th instant:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate, at five o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, the 10th instant, adjourn the present session sine die.

Mr. SUMNER. That is to-day. I think we are not prepared to adopt that. Anxious as Senators may be to go home, I should think that they all must see that there is unfinished business which I can only allude to now, and cannot describe the character of.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not very particular as to the time, but I think we ought to designate some time when we propose to adjourn. Senators are dropping off one by one, and in a day or two there will not be a quorum present; but if we fix upon some time for an adjournment, and it is understood that we will adjourn at that time, the probabilities are that Senators generally will remain until that time arrives. If, however, we propose to wait here until all business that may be introduced to the Senate shall be transacted we may be here all summer. I desire if this resolution in its present form is not acceptable to the Senate to have it amended and some time designated when this session is to close. I think that is desirable for all concerned, both for the President and for the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that the time for an adjournment can probably be fixed much safer and better at a later period of the day. We can probably determine to-day whether it will be in our power to adjourn to-morrow or not; but we cannot at this early period of the day. I would, therefore, suggest to the Senator from Oregon that we postpone the resolution for the present, and that we take it up at a later period of the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not very particular about it. Let the resolution lie over until a later part of the day if that is the desire of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over informally, if no objection be made.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the next Army Register be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORTON. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "two" and inserting "ten." I will state as a reason for this amendment that the volunteer officers who were in the Army during the rebellion have a great interest in the Register. A large number of their associate officers have gone into the regular Army, and for reasons which are readily understood by the Senate they feel a deep interest in it. The War Department prints just enough for the use of the officers of the regular Army to furnish a copy to each officer of the regular Army in the service, but does not print enough to supply officers who served during the war and are now civilians. I think ten thousand for the use of the Senate a very proper number; it will enable us to furnish information that will be gladly received by the people.

Mr. COLE. I move to amend the amendment by making the number five thousand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be on the greatest number.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Indiana introduced a resolution a few days ago to print some additional copies of the Register of 1866, which is just out. That Register having been delayed and the Department being about to prepare a new Register which will probably be ready in a month or two, I thought upon consultation with the Senator, that if any extra copies were to be printed, they had better be printed of the new Register rather than of the old one. They follow close upon each other. The committee have not been in the habit of reporting so large a number, being very anxious to keep the cost of that branch of the service as low as possible. We have sometimes printed three thousand, but we thought as the war was over two thousand was as many as we could recommend. Unless there be some special reason to the contrary, I hope the Senate will sustain the action of the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. How much do they cost?

Mr. ANTHONY. Two thousand copies will cost about five hundred and fifty dollars; about twenty-five cents apiece.

Mr. COLE. I will ask the Senator if this is for the printing of a new Register to be issued hereafter?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; this is a new one. The old one has been delayed.

Mr. COLE. One has just been published, but I understand this is to be an amended one.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; an amended one, to contain all the changes and appointments made this session. The one just published was for 1866; this is for 1867. During the war the Army Register was not published because the Department was unwilling that the enemy should gain any information with regard to the character of the commanders opposed to them. The West Point officers were so well acquainted with each other that a rebel officer, by knowing the man who was opposed to him, would probably gain some advantage from his knowledge of the character of his mind and the tactics he would be likely to pursue. In consequence of that delay there has been great irregularity in the publication of the Register up to this time. The one for 1866, which ought to have been printed on the 1st of January, has just appeared. This resolution is to print additional numbers of the Register for 1867, which will of course be much more perfect than the one of 1866.

Mr. MORTON. It is well known that there are a large number of documents published that are of very little value, that are almost so much waste paper; but this document will be anxiously sought for by those who have been in the Army, and the information it contains is of a character that can scarcely be obtained from any other source. I think the amount of money to be expended in printing ten thousand copies would be a mere trifle compared with the importance of the document and the interest the people generally have in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is first on the largest number proposed, namely, the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, to strike out two thousand and insert ten thousand.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, to strike out two thousand and insert five thousand.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the resolution as reported by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "two" and inserting "three," so as to make the number three thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

REPAIR OF MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. THAYER submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand additional copies of the report of the Committee on Finance on the repair of the levees of the Mississippi river, in the State of Louisiana.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am requested to present the credentials of Matthias E. Manly, elected by the Legislature of North Carolina a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1867. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That George and William H. Wood have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 11, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. J. W. M. WILLIAMS, D. D., of Baltimore.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES A. BAYARD, appointed a Senator by the Governor of the State of Delaware to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature, the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. George Read Riddle.

The credentials were read, and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. BAYARD, and he took his seat in the Senate.

INTERPRETATION OF TENURE-OF-OFFICE BILL.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair a resolution, and ask the action of the Senate upon it now:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, copies of any official opinions which may have been given by the Attorney General, the Solicitor of the Treasury, or by any other officer of the Government on the interpretation of the act of Congress regulating the tenure of offices, and especially with regard to appointments by the President during the recess of Congress.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken, allow me to make a statement. I understand that opinions have been given by one or more officers of the Government which go far to nullify a recent act of Congress. In short, it would seem as if we were to have nullification here in Washington in the executive branch of the Government. I understand that according to these opinions the President is to exercise a power of appointment during the recess of Congress, notwithstanding the recent act of Congress which undertakes to regulate the tenure of office. We all know the astuteness of lawyers. It is a proverb; and it is sometimes said that a lawyer may drive a coach and six through an act of Parliament, or even an act of Congress. Perhaps the Administration is now about to drive its coach and six through a recent act of Congress. In other words, it is about to force upon the country officers who cannot be officers according to the existing law of the land. It seems to me that before we adjourn we should know the precise state of this question. We should understand if any such opinion has been given, and the reasons for it. It is on this account that I have introduced the resolution now before the Senate. The resolution was adopted.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print ten thousand copies of the Army Register of 1866, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment reducing the number to two thousand, the same number that was reported of the Register of 1867. We have reported in favor of printing the usual number; but if the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] desires to move to raise it to three thousand, the committee will make no objection. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the Army Register for 1866 be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out "ten thousand" and insert "two thousand."

Mr. MORTON. I am in favor of the original number contained in the resolution. If we want to send a document to our military friends at home that will be acceptable and valuable to them, instead of the wagon loads of trash that go out from here, we cannot do better than send them this Army Register. It is a valuable and interesting publication to all military men.

Mr. ANTHONY. Three thousand is the number that the Senate voted of the Register of 1867, and I suppose it should be the same of the Register of 1866. I have no objection to making it three thousand.

Mr. MORTON. I move that amendment to the amendment, so as to make it three thousand.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

REPAIRS OF MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to print five thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Finance on the repairs of the levees of the Mississippi river, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. The publication will cost $200. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. THAYER:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand additional copies of the report of the Committee on Finance on the repairs of the levees of the Mississippi river, in the State of Louisiana.

The resolution was adopted.

CALLS FOR INFORMATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a resolution to add another rule to the standing rules of the Senate, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage; and if there be no objection, I will ask for its present consideration. It is a rule of some importance, and I believe it will meet with the approbation of every Senator.

The resolution was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the Senate:

All resolutions calling upon the President, or upon any of the Executive Departments for information, shall be referred to one of the standing committees of the Senate, which shall report to the Senate an estimate of the probable expense of furnishing the information called for; and this report shall be made without delay.

Mr. CAMERON. I object to taking up that resolution to-day. There are many reasons in my mind against its adoption. I think we have trouble enough now in getting information from the Departments without being embarrassed by rules which may prevent our getting it at all. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over under the rules.

GOVERNOR OF COLORADO TERRITORY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the Senator from Oregon to waive that motion for a moment to allow me to call up and pass a resolution which I offered the day before yesterday, and intended to call up yesterday, but did not get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As there seemed to be no business pending, I thought we might as well be doing something.

Mr. THAYER. I hope the Senator will allow this resolution to pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Oregon is withdrawn. The Senator from Nebraska moves to take up the resolution referred to by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate when Alexander Cummings was appointed Governor of Colorado Territory; how much of the time the said Cummings has been absent from the Territory since his appointment, and whether by permission or not, and how much of said time absent with permission and how much without permission, and whether on public duties or not, and whether his salary has been paid to him during his absence or not, and how much has been paid to him as salary for the time he has been absent from the Territory.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest the insertion in that resolution of the words that are usually employed when we address the President; they are words of form—"if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interests." Otherwise, it is a direct call upon him, apparently leaving him no volition.

Mr. THAYER. I have no objection to that, but yet I cannot see the relevancy of that form.

Mr. SUMNER. The relevancy is simply that that is the language addressed to the President in every case. It is a rule of the Senate for sixty years.

Mr. THAYER. I think in this case it is a rule that we might depart from; but I have no objection to it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska so modifies his resolution.

Mr. CAMERON. I should be very glad if the Senator from Nebraska would suffer the resolution to lie over until my colleague is present.

Mr. THAYER. I let it go over yesterday on his account. He asked me to delay it for an hour or so yesterday when we met, and I let it go over the whole day. I have waited this morning until the Senate were about to go into executive session, and I find him not here, and therefore I submit its passage ought not to be longer delayed.

Mr. CAMERON. Yesterday the Senator had no other course but to allow it go over by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. THAYER. No; I offered it the day before yesterday, and it went over until yesterday at the suggestion of the gentleman's colleague.

Mr. CAMERON. No harm can result from its lying over another day.

Mr. THAYER. If we adjourn within a day or two there will be no opportunity for an answer.

Mr. CAMERON. We will try. My colleague is not present, and he has the matter in charge. I shall be very much obliged to the Senator if he will allow it to pass over.

Mr. THAYER. How long?

Mr. CAMERON. Until my colleague is here.

Mr. THAYER. We shall then be in executive session.

Mr. CAMERON. We can take it up then.

Mr. THAYER. Very well; I will waive it to accommodate the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over if there is no objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business the doors were reopened.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to take up the resolution providing for an adjournment that I offered on Monday last.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate at five o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, the 10th instant, adjourn the present session sine die.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will modify the resolution by striking out "Wednesday, the 10th instant," and inserting "Saturday, the 13th instant."

Mr. HOWE. Let me suggest Monday instead of Saturday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is advisable for the Senate to convey some intimation to the President that we do not intend to remain here all summer. He sends in little dribbles of nominations here, half a dozen a day, and we are all the time told that there are a great number of offices in the country vacant, and that the interests of the country are greatly in danger if we do not remain in session. If the President understands that we propose to adjourn at any given time, it seems to me that he will expedite the transaction of this business. I do not see any reason why we may not adjourn Saturday or Monday, and be as ready to adjourn then as we shall be at any future time. I do not suppose we can stay here until we are perfectly agreed with the President about every nomination, unless we agree to confirm such nominations as he may send without question.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, I will suggest to him that the passage of this resolution now will not determine the time when we go from here or facilitate our going. Suppose we pass a resolution now, this being the only House in session, that we shall adjourn on Monday. If, on Monday, it is not found convenient or advisable to adjourn, the resolution will be rescinded, if it is too late to reconsider it. Therefore, I submit to the Senator that there is nothing to be gained at all if we express our opinion now. If a resolution were moved instructing the Secretary (if that is the proper mode) to make some communication to the President which would be likely to hasten forward the nominations, the reason for holding back which I do not at all understand, that might be of some service; but to say that our present feeling now is to adjourn on Monday is to pass a resolution certain to be rescinded, unless it turns out at that time to be so that we can then adjourn. In that event it does no good.

Mr. ANTHONY. The passage of the resolution is notice to the President.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not entirely agree with the honorable Senator from New York, that the passage of the resolution will have no effect. If the Senate agree now to adjourn at a given time, the probabilities are that they will adhere to that decision; and moreover, Senators will be inclined to stay. If the prospect is that an adjournment will be had at no very remote time, Senators will be very likely to remain; but now there is but little more than a quorum here, and others, as I understand, are intending to go in the course of this week; they have made their arrangements to go; and I presume that next week there will hardly be a quorum present for the transaction of business. The argument that the Senator uses against the adoption of this resolution is an argument against any resolution, and so we would remain in continuous session.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, my proposition would be, whenever the time comes that we can adjourn, that we then pass a resolution and adjourn. The time that we spend beforehand in prophesying when we can adjourn is very likely to be lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think we can say now when we ought to adjourn without much difficulty.

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me that now, while we have a quorum of the Senate present, we should authorize the President of the Senate to adjourn the body without day at some time. I understand that when we have less than a quorum we can adjourn only from day to day. To agree upon an adjournment, then, without day we want a quorum. I think we are not going to have a quorum here many days more, and unless we agree now to authorize the President of the Senate to adjourn the Senate, we may find ourselves without the ability to adjourn without day; and if we now agree upon a day of adjournment the President of the United States will understand it and will act in reference to it. If there is any business which he desires the Senate to transact he will send it to us. If there is none, of course there is no occasion for us to stay longer. But it does not follow that we shall be able to rescind this agreement to adjourn on Saturday or on Monday, or on any subsequent day, because it does not follow that we shall have a quorum here to do it, and I have no sort of belief we shall have; and I want to agree upon this adjournment while we are able to agree; that is, while we have a body here which can agree. I should prefer to see Monday fixed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am indifferent about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Less than a quorum may adjourn.

Mr. HOWE. Only from day to day.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest Monday at four o'clock, and then let us stand by it. The President, the papers say, is not well now. To adjourn on Saturday, the day after to-morrow, would be giving very short notice; but by giving us a working day on Monday until four o'clock I believe we shall be certain to adjourn at that time.

Mr. HOWE. Senators would not want to leave on Saturday evening any way.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend the resolution by inserting "Monday, the 15th instant, at four o'clock."

Mr. RAMSEY. For the information of the Senate I will state that I was informed this morning at the General Post Office there were about fifty or sixty post office nominations yet to be acted upon by the Senate. All of these, they said, were before the President, upon his table, but not sent in. Twenty-eight or thirty came down this morning. We reject about thirty per cent. of all that come in, and the Senate can tell how long it will take to dispose of all of them. There must be about thirty of those nominations on the President's table. They have all gone up from the Post Office Department to the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to make one suggestion to the Senate about that. What predicament shall we be in if we vote to adjourn on Monday at four o'clock and we come here and have forty or fifty or a less number of nominations sent for post offices, custom-house officers, &c., and we then reject them and go off without leaving the President time to fill those vacancies? We shall have put ourselves—

Mr. FERRY. Will they not be cases of removals?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. There are some forty or fifty post offices not filled. So the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads tells us. We know there is a considerable number of collectors and assessors offices not filled, and there are some very important custom-house offices that are not filled, to say nothing of others of which I know nothing. Now, then, if they come in here on Monday and we choose to reject them and adourn, we leave the business of the country not done. Now, who knows—we cannot tell, with the idea that Senators have with regard to the Post Office Department, the Treasury Department, &c.—what kind of nominations may be sent in here? They may be just such probably as we may feel compelled to reject. I do not see how we can fix a day until the business is so closed up that it cannot be said that we have left the business of the country unfinished.

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose there is no quorum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, sir, if there is no quorum, the responsibility will be on the individuals who go and leave us without a quorum, and not on the vote of the Senate or those who are here. My opinion is that you cannot fix a day to adjourn until you have so far disposed of the executive business of the Senate that the country can be left in that condition. If we do, the responsibility is on us, and on us on this side of the Chamber. By "this side of the Chamber" I mean those who are in the majority, not the minority. We have the power to stay here and do the business.

Mr. COLE. I will suggest to the Senator that the President has the power to call us together again should he deem it necessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He can do that if he pleases, undoubtedly.

Mr. JOHNSON. We can have the nominations in by Saturday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But suppose we reject them? Suppose they come in and are not of a kind to suit us? Who knows what may be sent in? If the day of adjournment is fixed, we may be placed in that very predicament precisely, with the opinion which some gentlemen here seem to entertain of the officers of the Government. They might send in here purposely such names that we might either be compelled to reject them or to take those that were very unsatisfactory to us, or else take that responsibility upon ourselves. I do not think it would be so, I confess; but still, on the principle on which gentlemen go, that predicament might be the one in which we might be placed. I cannot consent to go off and leave the business of the country in such a state as it will be by not having this large number of offices filled before we go. Therefore I am opposed to fixing the day of adjournment until we have got in such a condition that we can go safely to ourselves.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am perfectly ready to take any responsibility that properly belongs to us. These offices were all filled, and all filled acceptably to the people of the nation, and I do not believe myself that Andrew Johnson could unfill them without the consent of the Senate before we passed that law; but by usage he did it.

Mr. HOWE. Some of them he could by express enactment.

Mr. CHANDLER. But the majority of them were removals. He knows precisely how to have those offices all filled, and filled to-morrow—by sending in men who elected him.

Now, sir, I am neither disposed to remain here an unlimited time nor am I disposed to be driven into a corner and confirm men who are objectionable to us. If he sees fit to send in the right kind of men, he knows we will confirm them, and if he sends in the wrong men he knows we will not confirm them. Sir, if we cannot run this Government with Andrew Johnson in the way, we know how to run it. If he is the obstacle that stands directly in our road so that we cannot run the Government, we shall find out between now and July how to run it. I am not to be driven into a corner and compelled to confirm men who are utterly objectionable to me and to every member of this body, because, forsooth, the responsibility is to rest upon me of leaving offices unfilled. I am disposed to go home, and I will vote for the earliest day that is named for an adjournment. If he sees fit to send in men whom we will not confirm let him send them in; and if we cannot run the Government, and offices are to remain unfilled, and we cannot collect the revenue, we will find a way to run the Government between now and July, and he will find a way, too, to get out of the way by that time. I hope, sir, we shall fix the time of adjournment, and fix the earliest time. I am not disposed to be driven into confirming copperheads and rebels because, forsooth, offices are to remain unfilled. I would vote to adjourn on Saturday; I would rather vote to adjourn to-day than any other day; but I will vote for the very earliest day named.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The President of the United States is a part of the Government just as much as the Senate of the United States or the House of Representatives, and he may just as well say, if the Senate and House of Representatives stand in his way, he will find a way to run the Government without them as we can say with any propriety that we will find a way to run the Government without him. It is as just to be said on the one side as it is on the other.

Now, sir, the President will not commit any impeachable offense by nominating officers. If he omits to nominate any at all that would be an offense, because to nominate is his duty; but so long as he continues to nominate, and we are here, he has not committed any offense against the Constitution nor against the law; and I hold that so long as he is President of the United States, whether satisfactorily or not to us, he has a perfect right legally and constitutionally to designate to the Senate those whom he prefers for office. We have a right to reject them, to be sure; there is no doubt about that; but we do not arrive at a conclusion. He has just as good a right to turn around and say to us, "The Senate knows how to have these offices filled, because all they have got to do is to confirm my nominations," as we have a right to say to him, "The President knows how to have these offices filled, for all he has to do is to send in such men as we like." That is not on either side a mode of talking that will bring us to any satisfactory conclusion. We cannot wink out of sight that the President, as President of the United States, has his rights, and one of them is to nominate officers, and so long as he keeps nominating them to us he has performed nothing but what he has a constitutional right to perform. It is not for us say "All he has to do is to suit us." He has a right to suit himself about it; and this kind of argument amounts to just nothing at all.

The question is, what our duty is; not what his duty is, but what our duty is; and it is no part of our right to dictate to the President of the United States whom he shall send here as officers. It is our right to say whether we like them or not, and to reject them after he does send them; and there is the end of it, in my judgment. Therefore, sir, however we may feel, whether satisfactory or unsatisfactory to us, we cannot wink those facts out of sight, and the question then comes, what is our duty? I hold that we cannot discharge it without staying here until these offices are filled in some way or other; or until it becomes so perfectly manifest that it cannot be done that we may take the responsibility of going home. I do not believe that the Republican party can answer to their constituency by saying that they were so anxious to get home that they would not stay to see the offices filled because men were not sent in that suited them. The answer will be, "Why did you not stay until you found somebody that did suit you?" The President keeps trying ostensibly, because he keeps sending in names; as fast as we reject one he sends in somebody else. It is not enough for us, in my judgment, to say we do not like the men he sends except so far as acting on those individual men are concerned. I do not feel that I am discharging my duty (and I am as anxious to get home as anybody) in going off and leaving so large a number of offices, whose duty it is to collect the revenue, unfilled; and I cannot answer my people at home by saying the President did not send such men as suited me, when they will turn around and say to me, "Why did you not stay until he did?"

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Wisconsin suggested a moment ago that it was important to pass a resolution to adjourn without day while there was yet a quorum here, which at a future day there might not be, and he suggested that less than a quorum would not have the power to pass the resolution. That struck me with great force at the moment because I thought his recollection must be right of the provision of the Constitution. I have been looking at it since, and do not see how that follows at all. In the absence of a prohibition, beyond all question less than a quorum has a right to adjourn, because, speaking in a legislative or parliamentary or organic sense, it is the meanest and basest of all the rights of an organized body. There must therefore be a prohibition, or else less than a quorum would have that right. The provision of the Constitution referred to, which is sections four and five of article one, relates entirely, as I understand it, to sessions of Congress, to joint meetings of the two Houses:

"The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they by law appoint a different day."

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide."

Now, I submit that that is an inhibition relating, in the first place, to the sessions of Congress contemplated by the Constitution, and, in the second place, restricted to joint sessions of the two Houses composing the Congress of the United States. This is an extra session of a single House, a legislative council convened for the purpose of advising upon nominations and the confirmation of treaties. I see no reason at all, as I read the Constitution, why less than a quorum cannot adjourn without day; nor do I see, as I said before, anything that we are likely to gain by attempting now to fix a time when we will adjourn. I think it would be better if some Senator would move a resolution that the Secretary be instructed to acquaint the President with what he may not know, and that is that we are very much in advance of him in business here, that we wait and lag from day to day for the lack of nominations to places, some of which, I understand, have been vacant for months. I can name some myself which have been vacant nearly a year, and there they stand; no nominations come here. Certainly it is not the fault of the Senate.

Now, I beg to say for one that I am ready to stay here (in spite of my own convenience to the contrary) as long as may be necessary to induce the President, or to compel the President, if that is a truer word, to have some regard to the public interest and the public sentiment in the nominations which he sends here. I would be glad that he would send in men whom we could confirm to begin with; but if he will not, for one I shall feel cheerful in staying as long as may be necessary to reject and reject again men personally or politically improper until we can have some deference paid to the sentiment of that party which elected this Administration, and which ought to have something to do with the regulation of public affairs and the administration of the public service.

Mr. HOWE. I am not sure that I am entirely right in my understanding of the Constitution, and yet I am not satisfied with the criticism made by the Senator from New York. The power to adjourn from day to day may be, as the Senator has characterized it, one of the lowest powers to be exercised by a legislative body; but the power to put an end to the session of the body seems to me, instead of being one of the lowest, to be one of the highest powers to be exercised by the body. That is the power that we are considering now, whether that can be exercised by less than a quorum. If it can be, then whenever you are left here accidentally without a quorum in this executive session of the Senate, that minority of the Senate can put an end to the session, can adjourn it finally. I do not think the framers of the Constitution intended that. I think it would be a dangerous interpretation to put upon the Constitution; and I do not think it is warranted by the language of the article itself:

"Each House"—

not when Congress is here. This is not prescribing the powers of Congress: this is prescribing the powers that each House may exercise—

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business."

But a smaller number than a majority may do two things: one is to adjourn from one day to another; the other is to send for absent members.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator seems to suppose that the expression "each House" refers not only to each House in severally, but to each House without reference to the fact of the existence of the other House. I beg to ask him whether there is any contingency known in our system in which the House of Representatives alone can be in session, the House of Representatives without the Senate? If there is none, then I ask him whether that does not show that the object and meaning of the language cannot be what he now suggests?

Mr. HOWE. I think there are a great variety of contingencies in which the House of Representatives can be in session without the Senate, and I think the House of Representatives frequently is in session without the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. For a session?

Mr. HOWE. Not for a session.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not mean a single day, but I mean a separate session, a session by itself, like this.

Mr. HOWE. I know of no contingency in which a session of the House can be called without a session of the Senate; but I do not think that controls this language of the Constitution.

Mr. CONKLING. It tests it, however.

Mr. HOWE. I am not able to see how it tests it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, I think it would be perfectly competent for the House, with the consent of the Senate, to remain in session all summer for the purpose of impeaching or anything else.

Mr. CONKLING. Nobody doubts that; but I am talking about a new and separate session of the House without one of the Senate. If there be no such thing, then I submit it shows that this language was not used with a view to a session of one House without a session of the other House at all during the same session.

Mr. HOWE. It is not a very remarkable thing for gentlemen to differ about the construction of the Constitution or a statute, and I do not care to spend any more time upon the discussion of this point. My own views remain as they were at first.

I wish to make one or two remarks upon the question whether we may agree upon a time to adjourn now safely or not. I agree with the Senator from Maine that the President is a part of the Government of the United States. I have not any doubt about that; and I do not believe that we are any more than a part of the Government of the United States. I do not believe that summarily we can dismiss the President as we are now circumstanced, or that he can summarily dismiss us. I agree with the Senator from Maine that we have no constitutional power to nominate a candidate for one of these offices. I agree that the Constitution reposes that trust in the President; but the Constitution does require the assent of the Senate to the appointment of every one of these officers; and I suppose the makers of the Constitution intended that the President should really consult the wishes of the Senate. I suppose when they put that clause in they intended to make it the duty of the President to nominate persons that the Senate could, according to their convictions of duty, assent to the appointment of.

But now I will agree that the Senate may make demands of the President, may occupy a position, may take exceptions which they are not warranted in taking to his nominees; and if we do so I agree that the responsibility rests upon us for these offices remaining unfilled. On the other hand, is it not just as manifest that the President may insist upon sending a kind of nominees here that we cannot, in accordance with our convictions of duty, agree to the nomination of? Suppose the Senate should say in substance, "We will not agree to the nomination of a man for one of these offices unless he has been an officer in the rebel service." I think the President would be perfectly justified in saying to the Senate, "I will not send such men to the Senate; I will send other men; if you will not accept these other men, let the offices be unfilled; I will not accede to your terms." Suppose, on the other hand, the President should say, "I will send nobody to the Senate but those who have been in the service of the rebellion," would or would not the Senate be perfectly justified in saying to the President, "We will not assent to the nomination of any such men; and rather than do it the offices shall go unfilled?" If that were the attitude actually of the President and of Congress, what is the use of our remaining here to unlock such a difficulty as that? If the position of the President were known, if he had publicly declared or given us fully to understand that he would send nobody here but men who had been rebels, why cannot we just as well come to a conclusion at once either to accept those men and fill the offices or to reject them and adjourn and go home and leave the offices unfilled?

The President, I admit, has not published any such purpose; but, after all, I do think he has done a great deal to publish another purpose in regard to a great many sections of the country, that he will send men here only of a particular political stripe. I alluded to this question yesterday in executive session, and I allude to it now. I do not feel authorized to say that the President is any worse morally for liking a man who agrees with his political opinions than I am for liking a man best who agrees with my political opinions. Of course I like my political opinions better than I do his, as he likes his better than he does mine. A year ago now the President had authority to make any vacancies. The Senate will bear me witness that I struggled with all my might to deprive the President then of the power to create these vacancies, to take from him the authority of law to remove the incumbents and to create the vacancies. I failed in that endeavor. The Senate did not agree with me. I believe the House did not agree with me. We adjourned and went home and left upon your statute-books authority for the President to remove these officers and create vacancies.

I regretted that step. I regretted that we left that power in his hands. I regretted to see him exercise it; but I knew he would, and I should have done it if I had been in his place; I would have put them out if you had left me the power to do it, and I would have had the public service carried on by men who agreed with me. There is nothing surer than that. The President did no more than what I would have done if I had been in his place and had the same power.

Now, we come back here and find these vacancies. I have not felt authorized in saying to the President, "You shall send men here of my political faith." I have felt authorized in saying no more to him than in substance to say, "You must not insist upon excluding every man of my political faith." I am only speaking now about the State that I represent; I cannot speak for Massachusetts; I cannot speak for Maine; I cannot speak for Connecticut. I am speaking of Wisconsin. I do not say it is the case throughout Wisconsin. I am speaking of the difficulties that we encounter now in the State of Wisconsin. I spoke yesterday of one district; I repeat it to-day. There are just two offices unfilled. I am perfectly willing that one of those offices shall be filled by a political friend of the President if he will consent that the other shall be filled by a political friend of the Senate, as I understand the Senate to be; but I do not understand that the President is willing that that shall be done. If he is, that difficulty can be solved at once.

How it is in other States I do not know; but I said yesterday, and I repeat to-day, that I have not voted to reject a single nomination since I have been here that I would not rather reject than confirm if I knew the office was to be closed. I have voted in reference to that responsibility, and I am willing to take that responsibility so far as I can. What little political reputation I have is not much to stake upon a vote; but when it is all I have, it is just as much for me to stake as if I had the reputation of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. Dixon,] or of my friend from Maine, [Mr. Fessenden.] When a man stakes his all, he shows his pluck if he does not his discretion. [Laughter.] Now, I do not see that we tend to fill these offices by just staying here and rejecting his nominees. The Senator from Maine says that while the President is sending men to us he is doing all the Constitution charges him with. I think the Senator is mistaken. I think the Constitution requires him to send men to the Senate that the Senate can agree to confirm, unless the Senate has made known to him that they take exceptions which they are not warranted—not by the Constitution, not by the law, but they are not warranted by a due regard for the public service in taking.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How does he know the Senate will not confirm them until they are sent in and the question has been tried?

Mr. HOWE. We have not served any official notice upon him, but I do think the Senator from Maine is not mistaken, and I think the President of the United States is not mistaken and the Senate is not mistaken as to what has been the difficulty in filling these offices. He wants men of one political character and we want men of another. I do not think there is any chance of a dispute about that. I only wanted to let the Senate understand the attitude which I have occupied in order that they may understand how perfectly ready I am to go home, and how completely I consider my work done or will be done when we adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that this subject be postponed until to-morrow, and that we proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall dispose of this adjournment resolution. I call for a division on the motion.

The question being put; there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOWE. Let us have the yeas and nays, and find out whether there is a quorum here.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope we shall not go into executive session until we dispose of this question of adjournment. I do not agree at all with the Senator from Maine that we shall gain nothing by fixing a day. I will not assume that the President will not do his duty. I regard him as much a part of the Government as the Senate. When he knows that the Senate has fixed a day for adjournment he will send in the names of persons for these offices, send the whole of them, I should hope, to-morrow for every vacant office there is, and then we will act upon them. There are three or four days between this and Monday, and if the names sent in the first time are not acceptable, we can act upon them promptly and have them returned and get others. If we go on in the way we have been, receiving a dozen nominations one day and acting upon those, and then waiting a day or two and receiving a dozen more, we may stay here all summer. My experience in Congress has always been that we have to fix a day for adjournment some short period in advance and work up to it. If we wait until the business is entirely done to adjourn, we never would adjourn a session of Congress. Fixing a day is the only way by which we can come to a decision, and if it is necessary we can hold an evening session.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to fixing a day for adjournment; but we have lost about an hour and a half already on this question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have a vote on it.

Mr. JOHNSON. A vote cannot be taken. There are other speeches to be made. There are some forty or fifty nominations on the table now, some of which, I suppose, will not be acceptable to the Senate, and will have to go back to the President. We can fix the adjournment to-morrow or next day.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us fix it to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think we can fix it to-day, and further, I do not think we ought to fix it to-day. It seems to me we ought to clear the Calendar before we undertake to determine to go home. A Senator exclaims, "Wait until we get through." I say yes, wait until we get through. Senators are perfectly aware that owing to an interpretation that has been recently put, or it is understood has been put, by the Executive upon the tenure-of-office bill, there is an increased necessity for our staying. We have passed a law. We ought to see that it is enforced. At any rate, we ought to offer our cooperation with the Executive, so that he shall have no excuse for setting it aside. Of course I do not admit that he can in any way set it aside; but I wish to do everything that can be done on our side to prevent him from having any apology for seeming to set it aside or undertaking to set it aside. I think that we ought to stay until our work is fully done. It seems to me there can be no excuse for our going home while any part of the executive business remains unfinished. Other Congresses have stayed here till midsummer, and even into the month of September. If the necessities of the country require it, I see no reason why we should not stay till then.

Mr. MORTON. My opinion on this question is, that we ought to fix a day to adjourn, some reasonable time in the future, and notify the President of that fact. Now, sir, we will not sit here all summer. Let this business of nomination and rejection go on in the way it is going on now, and this Senate will drop out one by one until there will be no quorum here, and that will be at the end of three or four days unless we fix a time for adjournment. Let us fix a reasonable time, say on Monday next, for adjournment. If the President and the Senate can come together at all, they can come together by next Monday at four o'clock. If they cannot come together at all then there is no reason for staying here, and the country will say so. If the President shall continue to send one class of nominations, and we shall continue to reject them, there is no end to that business. One party or the other must yield. Are we disposed to yield? Are the Republican Senators on this floor disposed to yield and say that they will confirm Democratic nominations? I imagine you will say no. Do you then expect that the President will yield? I have no right to speak for him because I am not in his confidence. But let us fix a reasonable period in the future, give time for us to come together, and if he persists up to that hour, and if we persist up to that hour, the whole country will say there is no use in our staying here an hour longer, and we can go home then reasonably and properly to the people; but let us not have the session expire merely by this Senator and that Senator dropping out and going home. I know there are several here to-day who will not perhaps be here next Monday unless there is some time fixed for an adjournment. Let us act reasonably ourselves, and go upon the presumption that the President will act reasonably. Let us fix, say next Monday at four o'clock, or next Tuesday at four o'clock, as the time of adjournment, notify the President that we have fixed that time, and if we can come together we can do it by that time. If at that time we are as wide apart as we are to-day, the country will say there is no use in our staying here, and will justify us in going home.

Mr. CAMERON. I am in favor of fixing some time for the adjournment for the reasons given by several Senators. Unless we fix some time we shall never get through with our business. My experience has always been that until we fix a day we always loiter. When the day is fixed we take care somehow or other to get our business through. I would prefer, therefore, to name next Wednesday in the place of next Monday, at four o'clock. That will give ample time to get through with all the business, give sufficient notice to the President of what we intend to do, and if he fails then to meet us in the spirit in which he ought to meet us we can adjourn and go home and leave the responsibility with him. I should be unwilling to go away on Monday, giving only two or three days' notice. I have no doubt that by Wednesday he will have full time to fill all the offices, and therefore I move to amend the resolution by inserting Wednesday of next week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question is not up now. The question now is on going into executive session.

Mr. CAMERON. I am in favor of that, certainly.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope we shall go into executive session and settle the matter of adjournment to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have got the discussion pretty nearly through now.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Frothinghuyssen, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Corbett, Davis, Ferry, Howe, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Tip-ton, Trumbull, and Williams—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conness, Edmunds, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Nye, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Wilson—13.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 12, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, ratifying the amendment proposed by Congress as a fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, a report of the Quartermaster General relative to the award for the transportation of Army stores on route No. 1; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

EMPLOYMENT OF ATTORNEY BY THE TREASURY.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate whether he, or any one by him authorized, has employed an attorney or solicitor to represent that Department before the Court of Claims in certain cases pending in said court; if yea, what counsel or solicitor has been thus employed, and in what cases, what fee or fees has been or will be paid him for said services, and out of what fund, and under what law or authority he has been thus employed.

MESSENGERS, PAGES, AND LABORERS.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution authorizing the Sergeant-at-Arms to retain the messengers, pages, and laborers now employed during the recess of Congress, have had it under consideration, and directed me to report it adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CRAGIN. Yes, sir.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. FOWLER:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be authorized and directed to retain the number of messengers, pages, and laborers now employed during the recess of Congress.

The resolution was rejected.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the resolution on the subject of adjournment, which will be read:

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate, at five o'clock p. m. on Saturday, the 13th instant, adjourn the present session sine die.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that resolution be postponed until to-morrow. I think we are not in a condition to proceed with it to-day.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would do me the favor to state how the Senate will be better prepared to vote on this subject to-morrow than they are to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. I will say that just in proportion as we draw to the close of our business we shall be better prepared to determine when we can adjourn finally. As we have not drawn to the close of our business, I submit we are not in a condition to fix the day. That time may come; but I may remind the Senate that there is in executive session still a good deal of unfinished business, and there is much more business that we have reason to expect. I say "we have reason to expect," because it is well known that there are a great many offices that are still unfilled, and it is our duty before we leave, so far as we can, and just so far as it depends upon us, to see that they are filled.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator explain, if he can, how we are to accomplish this business of filling these offices by staying here? It was said yesterday that there were some fifty or sixty offices vacant. It is no worse for them to be vacant next month than it has been this month.

Mr. ANTHONY. Some have been vacant for nine months.

Mr. HOWE. It is said that some have been vacant for nine months. If they can be vacant for one day they can be for a year. If they can be vacant for nine months they can for nine years. But there are only forty or fifty of them. We cannot fill them. It is impossible for us to fill them if we stay here forever alone. The Senator comprehends the difficulty in the way just as well as I do; and I wish him to inform me how we can fill them by staying here.

Mr. SUMNER. We can fill them by acting on nominations that are sent in, rejecting those that are bad and confirming those that are good. I am afraid that comparatively few good ones are sent in. That would require us to reject more; but still that would compel us also to stay longer. We should stay, it seems to me, until the offices are filled, rejecting those nominations that are bad and confirming those that are good; doing, in short, all we can as a Senate to secure good officers, and I insist also officers on the right side, who agree with Congress and will sustain that policy which Congress has declared. I hope the resolution will be postponed until to-morrow. We shall be in a better condition then to act upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not see how we can intelligently or with any degree of safety fix upon a day of adjournment at the present moment. I propose to offer a resolution, which I send to the Chair and ask to have read, as explanatory of what I am about to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate whether he has any further communication to make requiring its advice and consent, and if so what, and at what time it will suit his convenience to make such communication, to the end that the Senate may fix the day for its final adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in order now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not offer it now. I simply asked to have it read as the basis of a single suggestion that I propose to make. It seems to me we are not in a condition to-day to agree upon a time for adjourning, for the reasons that were fully stated yesterday. And it seems to me that we labor under another difficulty: that it is impossible for us to tell, or even guess, with the information we have, when we can be in a condition to adjourn. Whether there are any more communications of the kind upon which we have been acting, we have no right to know that I am aware of. I suppose, from the ordinary course of affairs, we have a right to presume there are a great many.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In cases where we have rejected nominations recently, we know those offices are not filled.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Undoubtedly. Then we have it within our own knowledge that there are certain communications to be received, and the probability is that there are communications of a similar character outside of those which have been sent to us. Now, it seems to me that after the Senate has been here in the fifth month of its session, we have a right to know what communications, if any, the President of the United States has to make to us upon this subject. We are convened in extraordinary session at an extraordinary period. What was the occasion for this session at all? At the commencement of an Administration I know it is usual—though extraordinary in one sense, it is ordinary in another—for the President to call the Executive Council into executive session to aid him in inaugurating his Administration; but that is not the case here. This Administration was organized. When the new President came into his office, under the circumstances which it is not necessary for me to refer to now, he found this Administration organized. When we left here on the adjournment of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the Government was organized; the offices were filled. We came back at the last session to find many of the old officers to whose appointment we had given our consent, and many of the officers whose names had been sent to us and our advice and consent asked to the appointment of, out of place. Now, sir, we are here in the fifth month of this session, every day of which the President has had an opportunity to communicate to the Senate the appointments he had made in the vacation. It is not my purpose to stop here to comment upon how soon it was his duty to have presented these officers; but the fact undoubtedly is to-day that there are many offices absolutely vacant in the country that are kept open in violation of law, and that because the President of the United States has not even sent new appointments to the Senate, even at this length of time, some four or five months having elapsed.

Now, all I have risen to say is that under these circumstances I think the Senate of the United States, before it can be expected to linger here without knowing how long we may be kept, ought to inquire respectfully of the President what the state of the public business is; whether he has further communications to make, and to what extent; what is the character of the communications, and how long they will require that we shall be kept here in extraordinary session. Of course I do not offer the resolution now; but I rose at this particular moment to say that I concur in the views expressed by my colleague yesterday, that we are not in a condition to fix upon a day of adjournment, and in the remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts this morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate never was and never will be ready to adjourn. The Senate never did adjourn without leaving important business unacted upon, and never will be ready to adjourn until we fix the day. If by fixing a day it was rendered imperative that we should adjourn on that day, if we had not the power to extend the time, there would be force in the arguments adduced against this resolution; but if we find when Monday approaches, or whatever day is fixed, that we are not ready to adjourn, we have only to extend the time. The President, when he finds that we have fixed a day of adjournment, receives notice that we desire to have from him all the communications that he thinks proper to make to us, and he will have ample time to do it. One day will suffice to transact all the business that is before the Senate and all that is to come in; that is to say, if it can be done at all. If the President will not send us nominations that we will confirm, and we will not confirm those that are sent to us, we may stay here forever without finishing the business; but if any accommodation can be arrived at between the two departments it can be done in one day just as well as it can be done in a month. I hope we shall fix a day of adjournment. If we find that it is necessary to remain longer every Senator will be ready to postpone the day; I certainly shall be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I concur in the view expressed by the Senator from Rhode Island that the proper mode to expedite business is to fix a time for an adjournment. I do not undertake to say what the fact is; but it is possible that nominations may be withheld by the President until it is ascertained that the Senate is about to adjourn, when those nominations will be sent into the Senate, and the Senate will be put to the necessity of rejecting those nominations, leaving the offices vacant, or confirming such as the President may send to us. Now, sir, it is manifest that nominations are sent here every day that might have been sent in weeks and months ago, and there may be nominations that will be sent in on the day we fix for an adjournment. If that is the policy—I do not undertake to say whether it is or not—but if it should be the policy on the part of the President, then I think we had better fix a time when we will adjourn, and that will bring those nominations to the Senate, and then, if in the judgment of the Senate it be necessary to continue the session for the purpose of considering those nominations, or of securing others in place of those we may reject, the Senate can protract the session. But, as has been suggested, unless we do come to some agreement about the time of adjournment, Senators will drop off one by one; there will be no quorum here in a very few days; and much of the business will be left in an unfinished condition that might possibly be finished if the Senate should conclude to adjourn at some given time. If we fix a day, and on that day the President should send nominations to fill all the vacant offices, it may then be the judgment of the Senate that the interests of the country require us to advise and consent to all of those nominations, irrespective of their political complexion and character, and so fill all the offices in the country, and give to the President that power which he seems endeavoring to exercise, and that is to fill those places with men of his own political party.

I think that our true policy is to agree upon some day for an adjournment. That certainly does not put it beyond the power of the Senate to extend the time if necessary. My impression is that Senators will be induced to remain if there is a prospect that the session will terminate within two or three days. Senators who now propose to leave may remain until the expiration of that time; but if there is no knowing how long this session is to continue, if it is to drag its slow length along here from week to week, and we receive half a dozen nominations a day, there are Senators who do not conceive it to be their duty to remain here under such circumstances, and who believe that the responsibility, if these offices are not filled, will rest upon the power whose duty it has been to make the nominations in due time, and not wait until the last day in the afternoon for the purpose of compelling the Senate to sanction such nominations as may suit the feelings of the Executive. I hope that we shall agree upon some time of adjournment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that there would be a serious difficulty if we should fix say Monday for adjournment and a large number of nominations should be sent in on Monday which we did not approve of. We might not have the ability to extend the time. There might be no quorum here.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then we could not act on nominations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Without a quorum?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We might if there was no question raised.

Mr. ANTHONY. There would be as likely to be a question on the nominations as on the extension of the time. Undoubtedly there would be a question on the nominations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think then it is very clear that our true plan is to fix no time, but to stay here until we discharge our duties, until the offices are filled with good men, if it is a month or three months, and we can adjourn when our business is done on five minutes notice. I do not like, for one, to put myself in the position that we are to leave the offices on a given hour and a given day either vacant or fill them with just such nominees as are sent to us by the President. I think the resolution offered by the Senator from Maine is very judicious.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 14, noes 17.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out Saturday and inserting Tuesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To strike out "Saturday, the 15th instant," and insert "Monday, the 15th instant."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Who made that motion?

Mr. STEWART. I made that motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will you not say Tuesday?

Mr. STEWART. I am willing to make it Wednesday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We can continue it to Wednesday, if necessary.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; I will say Tuesday, the 16th instant, at four o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think we can safely fix on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada modifies his amendment by proposing Tuesday next at four o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY. Whatever day we fix, we shall probably have to extend the time a day or two. I think we had better fix Monday. We can extend the time if necessary. Nobody will be opposed to extending it if it is necessary to do so. If we have not a quorum to extend the day, we certainly shall not have a quorum to transact business on controverted questions. I do not suppose the nominations to come in will be confirmed unanimously.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My reason for suggesting Tuesday is this: we cannot very well tell to-morrow, Saturday, what the state of the business will be; we can tell a great deal better on Monday; and it will be necessary to give notice or offer the resolution for an extension of the session a day beforehand. Otherwise, it would be in the power of any one Senator to prevent an extension of the time. We shall be in a better condition to know whether it is advisable to extend it on Monday than Saturday. I am myself satisfied, having taken some pains to inquire, that we cannot probably finish the business earlier than Monday, and it may go over till Tuesday. In reference to that fact of being obliged to make the motion a day beforehand in order to secure an extension of the time so that it may be within the control of the Senate, I think we had better fix it on Tuesday. If we get through with the business on Monday we can adjourn, as has been remarked, in five minutes. There will be no trouble in changing it in that way. I think Tuesday would be a better day, and especially when we consider the fact, which we ought to take into consideration, that it is very well known that the President has been very unwell for several days, and we ought not to manifest a disposition to push him unreasonably with reference to this matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. Make it Tuesday, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, to make the time of adjournment Tuesday next at four o'clock.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, I think this resolution had better be passed over for the present, and that the Senate should take up and adopt the resolution of which the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] has given notice, and which is not now strictly before the Senate. Let us adopt that as a preliminary proceeding; send the message directly by that resolution to the President, and give him an opportunity to communicate to the Senate his desires. It seems to me that that will be courteous, and it will be doing on our part all that we can in order to complete our work. I do fear that if we adopt a resolution which positively fixes a time of adjournment we shall be in the condition which the Senator from Oregon has described, and which he did not seem very much, I confess, to deprecate, of being obliged at the last moment to accept nominations of the President, which otherwise we would reject. Now, I am disposed to stay here just as long as may be needed in order to reject every improper nomination, if it be all summer; and I think that is our duty. We all know that the President began a policy which he announced in his own expressive terms as one of "kicking out of office." We have endeavored to arrest that so far as we could, not always successfully, but to a certain degree we have succeeded. I am not disposed at the last moment to surrender the power that we have under the Constitution and allow him to "kick out of office" if I can help it. I will prevent any such proceeding on his part down to the last moment; and I will stay here just as long as is needed for that purpose. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not yet adopt the resolution, even in its amended form, but that it will take up rather the proposition of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. ANTHONY. If by staying here any length of time we should have any power to compel the President to send in nominations to suit us I would stay; but when we have rejected from one to ten successive nominations for the same office, and the tenth man is just as exceptionable as the first, it seems to me we may remain here until the next regular session and be just where we are now. We do not make any progress by remaining here.

Mr. SUMNER. We have made great progress every day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not been able to see it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, yes, we confirm the largest portion of those sent in.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have always confirmed the largest portion of those sent in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the number is lessening from day to day.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks we ought to pass over the resolution proposing an adjournment to take up the resolution suggested by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] I really see no objection to acting first upon the resolution of adjournment and then acting upon the resolution offered by the Senator from Maine. There is nothing inconsistent between them, the one with the other. I think it would be altogether proper, after we have fixed a day for adjourning, to notify the President that we have fixed that day and ask of him to make such communications to us as he desires to make in the mean time.

Now, sir, I feel that there are a great many offices yet to be filled, and that it is absolutely essential for us to take the responsibility of filling them; and so far as I am concerned I have consistently voted, and intend to do so, for men disagreeing with me in politics, provided I think they are honest, capable, and faithful. I shall not put any obstacle myself in the way of filling these offices. There are some names in my State for which I cannot and will not vote.

It behooves us to say that we wish to adjourn. It will be utterly impossible, as has been remarked by Senators before me, to keep a quorum here much longer, and we ought to fix a day in order that the heads of Departments may know that we intend to adjourn. There is as much responsibility upon those Departments as there is upon the Senate. We must operate together, we must cooperate in order to fill these offices. The Senate has no power to fill them without the nomination of the President; and the President must send names to us, if he desires the offices to be filled at all, for which we can vote. I presume that no very great objection will be made to men on account simply of their politics. There are some very obnoxious men who cannot be voted for by the Senate; and so far as I am concerned I am willing, and will take the responsibility of saying, that the offices may remain vacant rather than vote for them. But there are but very few cases of that sort that I know of. Instead of returning to us names three or four times and asking us to reject them as many times, if the Departments would go to work and hunt up different names and send them to the Senate I think that in the course of a very short time the offices could be filled. I do not know how it is in other States, but in my own State the same name has been sent some two, three, or four times to the Senate, and we have been compelled as often to reject it. Now, there must be an end of this thing. It is unnecessary for the Senate to remain here for the purpose simply of repeating that operation from day to day. Let other names be sent, and speedily sent; as I understand it, when a rejection is made the President is informed of the matter immediately upon the same day, under a change of the rule; and in the course of a very short time the offices can be filled, if there is a desire on the part of the executive department to cooperate with the Senate in filling them.

Between now and Tuesday next it seems to me almost all the offices can be filled. We learn that there are not a great many of them. After we shall have fixed Tuesday for an adjournment, then let us pass the resolution of the Senator from Maine and notify the President that we have fixed that time, by a little alteration, and desire that any communications he may have with the Senate shall be made previous to the time indicated by us. Let him send in the communications in time for us to act upon them before the day we may fix. If we remain here from day to day I suppose the President will come to the conclusion that we are just as willing to remain as he is to spend time in sending in perhaps the same names from day to day. I think we should come to some conclusion. We cannot keep a quorum here much longer, as I have said before. We shall dwindle down until the Senate will be compelled to disperse. The President ought to be notified of that fact; and Tuesday it seems to me is the very latest day that we shall be able to keep a quorum here. It is unnecessary for Senators to say that it is our duty to remain. Sir, this is the second or third week of this session, and it is high time that these offices were filled; and between now and Tuesday it strikes me all of them can be filled, where there is any likelihood of cooperation between the President and Senate; and if there is to be a dead-lock between us in regard to certain offices, let that dead-lock take place between now and next Tuesday. Let it be distinctly understood.

Mr. ANTHONY. They never will be filled as long as we remain here.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think not.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate and the President will never agree.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not see that we are coming nearer to a conclusion at all, except that we are confirming certain nominations that perhaps we could have confirmed long ago. We are confirming certain nominations in districts where there is no especial controversy.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not quite agree with the Senator from Missouri that there is nothing inconsistent in passing a resolution fixing a period to this session, and then calling upon the President after that for information which would be likely to show us at what time we might properly adjourn. It seems to me that such a resolution, after fixing a period at which we would adjourn, would be substantially calling for the evidence after deciding the cause.

I should be glad, for one, to see such a communication as the Senator from Maine proposes sent to the President, with an addition which I hope he will make, to the end that we may know, as far as he is willing to inform us, what occasion there is for prolonging the session. It will be a question of some interest to the country when the session is over, if vacancies remain, upon whom the responsibility of such a condition properly rests. I have no doubt myself where it belongs; and I have no idea that it belongs to this body. For months the Senate has been here with every opportunity to the President to make nominations. For months offices have stood vacant. Commissions were issued in the former vacation, which expired on the 4th of March last, and in some instances, one in particular that I remember, never until yesterday was a nomination made. Nobody is responsible for that but the President of the United States, and nobody but he is responsible for the fact that now, day by day, in driplets, six or eight or ten names come in here, rumor informing us all the time that hundreds of offices perhaps are vacant. I believe there is no reason why by Monday every nomination may not be before us. I know of instances where agreements have been made, as far as such a thing is the subject of agreement between all parties, recognized and unrecognized by the Administration, made days ago, and names presented to which nobody objected; still they do not come here at all; but the Senate sits like the man who waited for the river to roll by that he might go on dry foot.

Now, sir, I should be glad, in place of a resolution of adjournment, that we might pass such a resolution as the Senator from Maine proposes, with a modification to the end that the country may know that having waited here, in substance, four or five months, the President, for some reason, would not in many cases send any name at all, proper or improper; that in other cases a name having been rejected it was returned again; rejected a second time it came back, and finally when that was dropped other names of an exceptional character were sent here. I think it is important that the country should know precisely where the responsibility is as well as I think I know where it is.

One other word. Like the Senator from Massachusetts, I shall be very glad, despite convenience and despite personal necessity of any kind, to sit here, no matter how long so that in truth it is proved to be necessary to stay so long in order to thwart the organized attempt which has been made to put up what is called the public patronage to be raffled for and won by those men who are ready to desert their principles and trample their convictions under foot, to the end, as it was elegantly expressed, that they might eat the President's bread and butter. That is an issue which I, too, am ready to stay and try out.

Now, I hope that we shall fix no time at this moment to adjourn; but, omitting to do that, that we shall acquaint the President with the fact that we sit here, with little or nothing to do, waiting for him, while rumor informs us that many vacancies exist, and no pains is taken to see that they are filled.

Mr. YATES. An appointment cannot be complete without the concurrence of the Executive and the Senate. It is the duty of the Executive to nominate, but that nomination is not complete until the Senate has exercised a duty equally independent, and that is the duty of consenting to that nomination. In this regard the Senate occupies a position quite as independent as the President of the United States. Now, sir, if the President of the United States would consult and advise with the Senators from the particular States there would be no difficulty whatever with regard to nominations; but he persistently, and for party purposes, appoints men of his own political faith, and without regard to the nominations of the Senators. In the district in which I reside he has sent here name after name of men who are objectionable, who are obnoxious on account of the position they occupy before the country and the position they have occupied in regard to the prosecution of the war. He has all the time persistently refused to adopt the nominations of the Senators. Now, sir, with whom is the responsibility? If he would exercise his duty and consult with the Senators, if he would have their advice and consent, he could send in nominations which we might confirm and sanction at once. Are we to sit here all summer, and have names sent in here, as in the district in which I reside, name after name, until the number may be one hundred, as it is some fifteen or twenty, I believe, in that district, and wait until the President shall see fit to consult with and advise with the Senate upon these nominations?

Gentlemen talk about responsibility. The responsibility is plain; it is marked. The President does not consult with the Senators from the different States, nor does he consult the wishes of the Senate here assembled, but persists in sending in men who are known for their advocacy of the Johnson policy and not of the policy of the Senate. I say that we have the same right to reject that he has to appoint. If he refuses to send in names which are acceptable to the Senate, and I might say acceptable to the majority of the Senate, is it our duty, at the public expense, to sit here in our places and wait for those nominations, objectionable as they are, from day to day and from week to week? Sir, the responsibility is with the President. The Senate should wait a reasonable time, as it has already waited, and then let the responsibility attach to where it properly belongs.

I am, therefore, in favor of fixing a day for an adjournment. That of itself will be sufficient notice to the President that we do not intend here to abide his executive pleasure alone, but that we have proposed to have some part as the advisory body in saying who shall be the officers who are to fill the offices in the country. I have no doubt about the course that we ought to pursue. It should be not only our pleasure, but it is our duty, to fix a period when this session shall terminate, when the people shall know that Congress has finally adjourned, and that the President himself shall be advised that we cannot await his pleasure all the time, receiving a few nominations a day, five or six, when there are hundreds to be nominated. Are we to await his pleasure? I should be willing to wait if I thought he was sick, and honestly sick, all the time; but that is not the plea which is urged. Because we will not abide his dictation, because we will not indorse his nominations made from day to day, therefore the responsibility is to attach to the Senate! I repudiate the doctrine. We ought to fix upon a time for adjournment, notify the President, and stand before the country on the issue.

Mr. HOWE. I thought yesterday that the Senate ought to fix upon a time for adjourning; I thought so the day before; and I said so on both days. I am not so sure that I was right. I learn there is a preliminary question to be settled, and that is, whether the Senate has the power of adjourning. I understand that we are here waiting upon the President; we are here because he told us to come here; and we are to stay here until he tells us we may leave. I do not know that this is not the fact, and that my friend from Maine is not right in proposing to ask the President whether there is really any necessity for our staying here any longer or not. I do not learn that this is the view of the President himself. I have no authority for saying that. But my attention has been called this morning to an article in the National Intelligencer. It is a newspaper which I believe supports the President's views. Whether the President supports its views or not I am not informed; but the article is entitled "The President and the Senate," and it reads:

"The President may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them. The Senate, as a branch of the executive power, has been often convened in special session for the purpose of acting upon nominations or treaties to be communicated to them. The President may, at his pleasure, call the Senate at any time, and to meet him at any place. President Jackson, for instance, could have summoned the Senate to meet at the 'Hermitage'."

"The Senate, when called by proclamation, is called 'for grave and weighty reasons.' When the business of the Senate is disposed of, it is usual for the body to adopt a resolution appointing a committee to wait on the President and inform him that they are ready to adjourn, unless he has some further communication to make."

"The Senate, in its present session, was specially called, and for special purposes. Those purposes have not been accomplished. The President has sent in nominations to fill the vacancies in numerous important offices, and the Senate has, in most instances, rejected them on mere party grounds. The President cannot well permit"—

I wish the Senate would listen. I do not believe they understand this—

"The President cannot well permit the Senate to leave such 'grave and weighty' matters unfinished. He cannot cease to discharge his own duties because they refuse to perform theirs."

Now, how far this is to be regarded as an official communication, I am sure it is not for me to say. Perhaps my friend from Connecticut could inform us on that point.

Mr. DIXON. As the Senator has referred to me, I will inquire whether any name is attached to that article?

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; there is none. There are quite a number of articles here to which no name is attached.

Mr. DIXON. Then, I take it, it is not official.

Mr. HOWE. Here we are informed that the President will not permit us to leave at present; that we have not done our business; that he has further occasion for our services here, and we cannot go home because he will not let us. Now, I think if this is so the Senator from Massachusetts must be right, and we ought to lay aside this motion to adjourn and this talk about adjourning, and take up the resolution of the Senator from Maine and alter it a little. I think it is rather rough, rather harsh, as now expressed. Let us reform it into a simple and respectful inquiry whether the President has any serious objections to our going home at present; or if so, when he will be graciously pleased to let us go home.

[Laughter.] We should get then precisely the information that I want myself, because that is what I am anxious for, to know when I may go home; and that will get us the information which this newspaper thinks we must have before we can get away without a revolutionary proceeding on our part. I am opposed to revolutions here or elsewhere. I am a law-and-order man myself. If the law requires me to stay here as long as it suits the pleasure of the President of the United States you will see me staying, a happy, if not a contented man. But it is the point of law that I wish settled. I will give way to my friend from Connecticut to settle it.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] yesterday, with that candor which always adorns everything he says, said that if he were President of the United States he would have done precisely what the President has done with regard to removals from office. He said that the President had a perfect right to do it; and that he should have done it if he had been in his place. I was particularly struck by it at the time, and I proposed to reply to it then. He said the President had done what he would do under the same circumstances, and in fact it was justifiable. There was a little inconsistency between that and what the Senator said nearly a year ago, when he invented, I might almost say, a phrase when he spoke of the "bread-and-butter brigade," and denounced the idea that anybody should be appointed to office merely with reference to his political views.

Now, sir, there was a great deal of truth in what the Senator said yesterday. The Senator was in many respects right. No doubt he would have done precisely the same thing; and I have no doubt almost every Senator would have done the same thing—appointed officers who agreed with him in sentiment. At any rate, this Senate has followed that rule pretty thoroughly in all its proceedings, in its committees, in its appointments of executive officers connected with the Senate, and in all respects, and in confirmations. One Senator has avowed here the determination—the Senator from Massachusetts, now absent, [Mr. WILSON,] and his colleague has also justified and approved it—that he would consent to the appointment of no man in his own State who did not agree with him in political sentiment; and he has said somewhat boastfully that by insisting upon that rule he had procured the appointment in the State of Massachusetts in every single instance of radical Republicans.

After the Senator from Wisconsin had declared that the President had only done what was right, and what he would have done under the same circumstances, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] with the candor which also illustrates everything that he says, announced to the Senate that the President had some rights as well as the Senate. It seemed to surprise the Senate to a certain extent to hear from that distinguished Senator such an enunciation. He stated that the President had a right to nominate whom he pleased; I believe, without any qualification whatever, or possibly with a qualification, that he nominated men who were not obviously and palpably unfit—

Mr. FESSENDEN. A constitutional right.

Mr. DIXON. He had a constitutional right to act according to his own discretion; in short, precisely the same right that the Senate has with regard to confirmations. Whatever right the Senate has with regard to a discretion upon a confirmation the President has as to a discretion on a nomination. I believe the language of the Constitution is that the President of the United States may nominate and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint certain officers. Must he consult the Senate on the nomination? Not at all. He may nominate whom he pleases, but until the advice and consent of the Senate is given he cannot appoint. The appointment is incomplete; the nomination falls to the ground unless the Senate consent to it.

Now, sir, there is a great deal said about the Senate going away and leaving their duties here unfinished because they cannot agree in the President's nominations. The President might just as well say that he would leave. He would have just as good a right to say that he would leave the White House and go off on some journey. What do the people care about our convenience? Our business is to stay here. This is our place. Here is our duty. Suppose the President of the United States should say to us that now being somewhat out of health, he desired to take a pleasure trip, he wished to take a voyage to recruit his health, and therefore complained of us because we kept him here. He would have as good a right to do it as we have to complain of him. I doubt very much whether very great sympathy will be excited in the minds of the people for this suffering Senate. We have voted ourselves a permanent salary of $5,000 a year. Let us stay here and earn it if we possibly can. I agree that while both Houses of Congress were in session there was some anxiety expressed on the part of some lest we should do some harm; but since we are powerless as to legislation I have seen nothing of that kind. My friend from Nevada [Mr. NYE] expressed a fear that we should do harm if we stayed twenty-four hours longer. He intimated, with an irony which distinguishes him as much as candor does my friend from Wisconsin, that he thought we had better adjourn lest in twenty-four hours we might ruin the country.

Now, sir, let us stay here. Let us perform our duty. The President is performing his. He is sending in nominations every day. One Senator has stated that he has sent them in in dribbles. He is obliged to do so. He cannot nominate them all at once, especially when he finds this body so fastidious and so particular as to the character of the men. He has sent in hundreds who have been rejected. He has sent here the names of distinguished officers, men who have fought and bled for the country, while we have been reclining at ease here in our seats, and we have rejected them merely for political reasons. Under those circumstances I think the President is justified in being somewhat slow and somewhat cautious in sending in names to us.

The Senator from Wisconsin has read from the Intelligencer an article which says that the President cannot permit us to leave. There is no doubt that the President has power with regard to that. The Constitution gives him the right to call us together; and I am inclined to think that if we fix a day to adjourn next week, and do adjourn, he will then have a right to call us together, if he should find a hundred or a thousand vacancies in offices, especially since we have passed a law that there can be no active employment of a man after his rejection without a penalty. I am not certain that he would not have the right, and that it would not be his duty to recall us. Suppose he should do it; I do not know that he thinks of such a thing—

Mr. HOWE. But is the Senator advised as to what he will do in case he calls and we do not come?

Mr. DIXON. He may "call spirits from the vasty deep," "but will they come?" Suppose we had not come when he called us last week. Suppose we had gone away. He told us that there was important business, that there were weighty matters requiring our attention. We have decided by a vote, according to the papers—I do not know whether it is so or not—of 37 to 2 upon a certain question that he submitted to us, a weighty question; a question involving the acquisition of sixty such States as Massachusetts in size in point of territory, nearly four hundred thousand square miles of territory. That was one of the subjects.

Mr. HOWE. There is no difference of opinion between my friend and myself that there has been important business for us to attend to. The Senate agreed to that. The Senate answered the President's proclamation convening us. But suppose the Senate should come to the conclusion next week or month that there was no longer any important business requiring their staying here, and the President should still think we had not done our business, and would order us, as this paper suggests, still to stay, and we should choose to leave, what would the President do? The Senator thinks he has power to do it.

Mr. DIXON. That order will be precisely like the order for the other session in its legal character and effect. We could treat it just as we did that, or in any other way. He has just as good a right to issue such a proclamation now as then. It is for his discretion to say whether weighty matters do require our attention. If he thinks so, I suppose he has a right to issue a proclamation to that effect. At any rate, other Presidents have done so, and I do not believe the Senator will suggest an impeachment on that ground.

Mr. HOWE. Not at all, on his issuing a proclamation; but it is the effect of the proclamation. The Senator will comprehend my difficulty. The question is whether I may go home if the Senate vote that I may. That is the point.

Mr. DIXON. If the President sees fit to issue a proclamation inviting our attendance, and the Senator goes home, he will go on his own responsibility, and not ask me whether he has a right to do so. He must judge for himself in regard to that. I know what I should do. If I were, as at present, in a good state of health, I should come here. If I did not come here, I should ask the Senate to excuse me. I should not go to the President for an excuse, but to the Senate. If the Senator wishes to go home and practice law in Wisconsin—I have no doubt there are many clients waiting his attention—or to attend to important business, or if he wishes to go on an excursion to the West, I should respectfully recommend him to ask the consent of the Senate in such an event.

But, sir, we refuse to confirm nominations, and then we complain of the President, and say we must go home by a certain day. The truth of it is just here in a nutshell: the President has a right to nominate whom he pleases; he is not bound to render any reason for his nominations. We have a right to reject whom we please; and as long as we take it upon ourselves to reject nominations which are sent here by the President of the United States, our bounden duty is to stay and receive other nominations. We know when we reject a nomination that the President is bound to send another name for that office. We are bound to stay and act upon it. In my judgment, if we keep on refusing to confirm nominations, as we have done, we ought to stay here all summer to receive others, and not complain of the President.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose I am responsible for bringing on this debate, as I called up this resolution. I have no doubt if we remain here longer than the time indicated for the adjournment in this resolution, as amended, we shall break up for want of a quorum, and then it will be impossible for us to transact the business which we can transact if we fix a day and notify the President, so that he may send in nominations. But so many Senators prefer the former course that I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["Oh, no."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question will be upon that motion.

Mr. SUMNER and Mr. MORTON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. It does seem to me that the decision of this question, after all, is but a matter of plain practical common sense. We know substantially what we are here for, what we are to wait here for; that is to ratify certain nominations which the President is expected to make. We know, too; that if those nominations are made they can be made in a very brief space of time, and that our action upon them will take but a very brief space of time. It seems to be agreed that there is time enough between to-day and next Tuesday both to make the nominations and to act upon them; and therefore it has seemed to me from the beginning better that we should fix a period by which time the work before us can be done, to operate as a notification to the Executive that we are prepared to do that work; and then if he fails of his duty let us adjourn and go home, and the country will find out where the responsibility lies, where it properly belongs. To hold that we are bound to stay here all summer, when the real practical work to be done both by the Executive and Senate is that which we all know can be accomplished in this short space of time, is to talk absurdly.

I hope that the Senate will not go into executive session at present, but that we shall dispose of this matter, and pass this resolution to adjourn next Tuesday. Then if the nominations come in, I should not be prepared to say that I would vote to reject nominations of capable men simply upon the ground of political differences, in the present condition of the country. Let us do that which is necessary for carrying on the business of the country; confirm suitable and capable men for such offices as must be filled for the purpose of the collection of the revenues and other great purposes which must be accomplished during the recess. I hope the Senate will not go into executive session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, the fact that the Senate can consume, on successive days, hours in the discussion of a question of adjournment shows conclusively that we have reached the dregs of the session, and proves to my mind, at all events, that we may adjourn very speedily without any great detriment to the public interests. We came here, and it was not anticipated I presume by any Senator that we should be detained more than ten or twelve days, and yet we have been here for a much longer period. I am anxious, for one, to put a spur in the Executive and a spur in the Senate, for I believe there is no Senator who remains here with greater personal inconvenience than I do, and yet it has not been my purpose to desert my place here as long as I could be useful, or as long as I thought any Senator could be useful. Now, it strikes me that if we pass a resolution fixing the time of adjournment it is a notice to the President and also a notice to ourselves that we will perform our duties in the most expeditious manner possible.

I am not in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Maine. I do not propose, for one, to ask the President whether it is consistent with the public interests for us to adjourn or not. I should be quite willing to inform the President that we had fixed a day upon which we proposed to adjourn, and ask if he had any further communications to make, or something of that character. I trust, therefore, that we shall agree to adjourn certainly as early as Tuesday, and I would prefer Monday. I think that we can perform all of our legitimate duties by that time. If there is any responsibility about any vacancies, we know, and the country well knows, where the responsibility lies.

Mr. CHANDLER. When the proposition was before Congress to adjourn I opposed it both by my votes and my advocacy. I was opposed to the adjournment of Congress. While Congress was in session we had a remedy for any ill that might befall us; but the Senate is powerless. I notice that the men who were the most anxious to adjourn Congress are the men most opposed now to adjourning the Senate. I believe that is so without a single exception; the men who voted every time to adjourn Congress now vote every time to keep the Senate in session.

Mr. ANTHONY. You must make an exception of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

Mr. CHANDLER. That Senator is a little erratic in this instance, and I will make an exception in his case. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] says that any and every Senator would do precisely as the President is doing in regard to appointments and removals from office. Let the Senator decide for himself. I do not think that every Senator if elected by a political party would turn traitor to that party and nominate its enemies to office. The Senator might, but not every Senator on this floor. He speaks for himself, and I have no doubt he speaks truly for himself; but I wish to take myself out from that catalogue, and I would fain believe a large majority of the members of this body. Sir, there are very few men here who would turn traitors to a party that elected them, not to say at the same time traitors to their country.

Mr. President, every hour that we defer the adoption of this resolution extends this session by that identical hour. Yesterday we could have passed a resolution, and it would have been just as efficient, to adjourn on Monday, as will be the resolution of to-day to adjourn on Tuesday. Let us postpone it until to-morrow, and it will be delayed to Wednesday. Let us postpone it until next Monday, and it will still be another day behind. All we have to do is to notify the President that we mean to leave on such a day, and that he may send in such nominations as he deems fit before that day arrives; and if they are proper and suitable men we will confirm them, and if they are not we will not. I have no idea of staying here all summer to reject Copperheads and traitors, as he may see fit to send them in, or bread-and-butter men. We have rejected in some instances as many as five or six or seven or eight sets, and I am willing to reject fifteen or twenty if he will send them in fast enough; but I will not stay here all summer waiting his pleasure to send them in. As I said yesterday, he knows just exactly how to have every one of these offices filled. They were filled by Mr. Lincoln with good, responsible, reliable Union Republicans. Those responsible, reliable Union Republicans were removed by Andrew Johnson to make place for unreliable, irresponsible Copperheads in most cases, or bread-and-butter men, who are worse, in all the rest of the cases.

Now, sir, I am willing to give him until next Tuesday. It is a day too long. I should prefer to have passed the original resolution to adjourn last Wednesday, and I would rather pass it now without any amendment. I hope that we shall not go into executive session or do any other given thing until we settle this question of adjournment. I hope we shall remain in open session until the day is fixed, and I shall vote for the earliest day proposed, if it be to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I am quite as anxious to adjourn as any other Senator present, I believe; but it strikes me that before we can fix a time of adjournment, or before we should fix a time or say anything about it, we should clear the Calendar; we should do the business that the President has already sent us to do. The President called us together on the 1st of April. He said there was occasion for an extraordinary session of the Senate. This he had a right to do by the Constitution. This is the eleventh day that we have been in session here. So far as my knowledge goes at an extraordinary session of the Senate there has never been a day fixed for adjournment by the Senate until a committee has been appointed to wait upon the President to know if he has any further communication to make to the Senate. It is not like a session of Congress, when we can adjourn at any time. Suppose that we should agree to adjourn next Tuesday or Wednesday and the business was not finished; the President could, by proclamation, call us together the very next day. I have before me the resolution that was passed two years ago upon this subject, and wish simply to read it. It is a resolution introduced by Mr. Lane, of Kansas, at the called session of the Senate in March, 1865:

"Resolved, That a committee consisting of two members be appointed to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that unless he have some further communication to make the Senate is ready to close its present session by an adjournment sine die."

If we are ready to adopt such a resolution as that to-day, I am willing to vote for it; but unless we are I am opposed to fixing any time for adjournment. I am in favor of going on with our business until we have closed it, and then we can adopt such a resolution as this. I am in favor of going into executive session now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think my honorable friend from New Hampshire will find that that is the resolution that is always passed previous to an adjournment, although the day has been previously fixed by a resolution of the body or a resolution of Congress. A day is fixed, and as we approach the hour we then formally send a committee to the President informing him that unless there be other business to detain us we are about to adjourn, and communicate by this committee with the President upon that subject, and they return and inform the body that the President has no further communications to make, and then the adjournment occurs. I do not think that that resolution is a precedent to control us in this matter at all. I agree entirely with those gentlemen who say it is advisable for us to fix some day of adjournment; fix it sufficiently far in advance, if you please; but let the day when we desire to bring the session to a termination be named. Then, as a matter of course, if the President, just before the session came to a termination, should have any important business to communicate, by informing the Senate of that fact, we could repeal or extend the time of adjournment. But we should fix some day by way of notice to the President that we desire to come to a termination on a certain day, and it will aid us in approaching the termination and settlement of all this business.

While I am up, I desire to say, once for all, a single word in relation to the policy pursued on the subject of appointments to office. It is only in very extreme cases, I believe, that the Senate of the United States in its whole history has ever rejected men who have been nominated for appointments to office by the President upon political ground. When a man is nominated the simple question to be considered by the Senate has almost always been whether he is fit for the office, whether he has capacity for the office and can discharge the duties of the office, and subserve the public interests.

But it is said that we are now in an extraordinary position of affairs. Sir, I admit that the case now existing is somewhat extraordinary; but I do not think that there is anything in this case, extraordinary as it is, which justifies the Senate in the course which has been urged by some, I do not say by all, that they should reject men for their political opinions. It is well known that there has arisen a difference of opinion among those persons who elected Lincoln and Johnson to the Presidency and Vice Presidency in 1864. In that difference of opinion these gentlemen are just as sincere upon the one side as the other. I do not charge upon men who differ with me that they are traitors. I do not charge that they are dishonest or dishonorable, that their motives are not patriotic, that they are not sincere, that they are not earnest. What I accede and accord to them I simply claim for myself; and I believe to-day that although a difference of opinion has arisen between Mr. Johnson and a majority of the members of this body on the great question of reconstruction, Mr. Johnson is just as honest, just as sincere, just as patriotic, and would make just as much personal sacrifice, even to the sacrifice of his life, if it were necessary, as any Senator on this floor. I believe that he is just as earnest and as honest. You may say he is mistaken, if you please; you may say that he has erred in not traveling with you in this new progress, in the direction of a new policy.

Sir, it is but a very short time ago that the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] the present occupant of the chair, and three or four other gentlemen now acting with the majority, stood alone in favor of this new policy; the majority stood where I now stand. But, sir, I do not complain of other men, because they are now satisfied that their former position was wrong. They may believe that I am wrong, that the President is wrong in standing where we have stood in our views of the true policy of reconstruction. They have a right to their opinion as well as I have to mine. They are perfectly sincere and honest, I have no doubt; and I claim the same for myself and for the President of the United States. I have never seen anything to shake my confidence in his entire sincerity, that he is perfectly patriotic and sincere in the purposes and the principles which he has avowed.

Sir, I stand not here to bandy epithets with any Senator, although the Senator from Michigan very often talks about men being traitors to their party, traitors to their principles; when they are just as sincere as he, and when in their convictions and in the course they pursue they are ready to defend them, here or elsewhere, on this occasion and on every other. While I question not his sincerity, while I do not charge him with being a traitor to his party or a traitor to his principles, I shall be prepared to maintain and to show as I think that the Senator from Michigan and those who act with him have changed their position. I do not now say they have taken a wrong position. I am not arguing that, but they have changed their position. They have taken what they call perhaps an advanced position. They have made progress perhaps when I have not made it. But, sir, because I have not made progress, that I have betrayed the ground on which I stood does not follow at all. You may say that I have not kept pace with others who stood with me then; but because I stand upon the principles upon which I fought the great battle to put down this rebellion, as I understand them, because I stand fighting for the Constitution and its supremacy, because I believe that reconstruction could be made under the Constitution which our fathers gave us, I am not to be denounced, nor are those who act with me to be denounced, as being traitors to our cause or traitors to our principles.

Without arguing this question, in a single word I can state the precise difference between the policy of the Administration and the policy of the majority here. The policy of the Administration has been reconstruction under the Constitution. You, the majority, say, "Reconstruction cannot be made under the Constitution at all; we must have a new constitution to have any reconstruction." That is precisely what you say. You say nothing less than that. You say that under the Constitution as our fathers made it, there shall never be any representation from the States of the South; there shall be a new Constitution; it shall be made over again; it shall be amended. I do not propose to go into the argument of that question. Perhaps you are right; perhaps I am wrong in all this; but I have been sincere in my convictions. Those who have acted with me have been as sincere in their convictions as those who have acted against me. I simply say this, and I go into the argument no further than to say that there is a difference of opinion, and that difference of opinion is honest and sincere.

Therefore, Mr. President, there being that difference of opinion which has arisen since the election of Mr. Johnson, it being conceded, as it must be, that he is just as sincere in his opinions as we are in ours, he is entitled to respect as President of the United States, although he differs with us in opinion; and therefore, from the whole history of the Government, I say that the Senate has always paid that respect to the President in office that when he nominates men for positions which the Senate are called upon to confirm the Senate has always consulted the simple question whether they were men fit to fill the offices. I agree if a man is nominated who has changed his principles for the sake of getting an office he is not fit for any office; I do not care what pretense he may hold out. If he pretends that he is in favor of the policy of the President to get a nomination, or pretends to be in favor of the policy of Congress to get a confirmation, and that pretense is false, he is unfit for the position. I dislike a man who holds a double face. I want him to be frank and honest and have an opinion, and not profess one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow. I simply say this: that the Senate, in my judgment, is called upon in passing upon nominations to pass upon the question of fitness, integrity, capacity.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask my friend a question if he has no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator says he admits that a man who changes his position for the sake of office ought not to be confirmed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is a question, in my mind, which goes to his integrity.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask him what was the specific object of the celebrated letter, to which I think his name was attached, or if not it was franked by him very largely over the United States in all quarters, to office-holders, asking them to communicate the fact whether they agreed to the holding of the Philadelphia convention. What was the object which prompted that letter?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That was a letter written to men known—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Office-holders.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not merely to office-holders. The letter was addressed to a great many persons to know what their views were in relation to the Philadelphia convention.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was not aware, and I never heard of its being addressed to anybody who had been a member of the Republican party, excepting those holding office at the time. Certainly it was not sent to any others in our section of the country.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I certainly do not know to what gentlemen the letter may have been sent after; it was published in circular form; but I knew the letter was addressed, so far as I was concerned, to men of distinction, men in office and men out of office; and the most important answer, or one of the most important I remember to have received, was a letter which I received from General Dix. Another that I received was from Mr. Alexander Mitchell, of Milwaukee, a distinguished citizen of our State, who never held an office or desired to hold an office.

I have answered the question of the honorable Senator frankly. Of course it is a question that I had no objection to his putting. If there is any implication in the question that I ever wrote a letter to an individual for the purpose of asking him to change his opinion for an office I simply say it is without any foundation whatever. I despise a man who will change his opinion for the sake of an office, or who in the Senate will make a speech one way and vote another. I want to see men true to their convictions and stand fast by them in good and in evil report, in sunshine and in storm. Those are the men that command my respect.

Having answered all that is necessary, I think, to the inquiry of the Senator, I will proceed with the few remarks I intended to submit to the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the Senator state whether his remark, that he despised men who made speeches one way and voted the other, referred to me?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Never.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought not. I did not think I belonged to that category.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have always respected the honorable Senator for being true to his convictions.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think not. I did not rise for the purpose of being catechized. I see that my honorable friend is in an ironical vein, and therefore I decline.

Mr. NYE. I was only anxious that the honorable Senator should retain his own respect, by calling his attention to a certain fact.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I see the irony upon my friend's face and I must decline.

I wish to say a single word so far as Wisconsin is concerned. I should not have said that had not my colleague made some allusion to it. I think my colleague has no right to complain of the appointments in Wisconsin, for I presume more than nine tenths of all nominated to office in Wisconsin have been Republicans who are supporting the policy of Congress, and did so last fall. There has been on the part of the appointing power in endeavoring to arrive at results in Wisconsin nothing of which my colleague or his friends have any right to complain. The complaint has been made altogether on the other side, because if you go into the particulars you will find that while there was an effort, it is true, to fill the offices in the various districts, and two or three individuals had been nominated from time to time, they having been rejected by the Senate, and the Senate having shown, I suppose following the advice of my colleague, a determination not to confirm those gentlemen, other names were sent in. Among those who have been rejected, my colleague will remember, have been some of the most distinguished officers we sent from Wisconsin to the field. General Bragg, General Bertram, General Montgomery, Colonel Colkins, Colonel Ruger, Colonel Sterling, Colonel Ginty, and many others of the best soldiers of Wisconsin have been nominated and rejected. My colleague knows, too, that the presidents of both the last Union conventions of Wisconsin, the one that presided over the convention when Governor Fairchild was nominated the first and second time, have been nominated, and both have been rejected. If you go into the various districts, beginning with the first district, both the collector and assessor are Republicans. In the third district it is the same. In the second district it is the same. In the fourth district, the one to which he referred, there has not been an agreement arrived at, that being represented by Mr. ELDRIDGE, in the other House. Perhaps nominations will be sent in that will be satisfactory. I of course cannot know the future. In relation to the fifth district, the collector in that district is a Republican. So far as the post offices are concerned, I think my colleague has no reason to complain, nor have any of his colleagues of the House any reason to complain. The large mass of the appointments in Wisconsin have been of Republicans.

Now, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned personally I agree that the offices should be filled, and in order to carry on the Government it is a necessity, and that necessity is with me stronger than any mere party consideration, overrules any party consideration. I prefer that the offices should be filled with men who do not agree with me politically rather than that they should not be filled at all. I have no disposition, so far as I am concerned, to stop the wheels of the Government, and have never manifested it in relation to any of these appointments. If the whole matter had been left to me perhaps I could have arranged the appointments of Wisconsin without any difficulty with my colleague; but there are other persons from Wisconsin to be consulted besides my colleague and myself, and perhaps some difficulties may have arisen in relation to some of the appointments, but nothing very serious. I presume in those very offices that remain vacant, unless it may be a post office or two, the deputy assessors or deputy collectors could go on and do the business, and the Government could not very materially be damaged thereby.

As to the effect of the policy pursued by the Senate in making rejections, that is a question on which I do not care to say much. It is a question certainly upon which I have no right to advise the majority in this body. But from the information which I receive I am led to the opinion that the policy which has been pursued here, of rejecting such men as have been sent in from time to time, and rejecting them for political considerations only, when they are perfectly able to discharge the duties of the office, when they have been in many instances good and faithful soldiers during the whole war, certainly has not added at all to the success of the party in power in this Senate, and does not tend in that direction; but I have no advice to offer on that subject, for it might be deemed improper for me to assume to give any. I do not stand in that relation to the action of the majority that I have any right to advise them. Indeed, if I were to look at it in a mere party sense, I should say, "Go right on; keep decapitating; add to this noble army of martyrs; and let us call a convention in the various States of the martyred soldiers whose heads have been taken off by the political guillotine." I presume they would form a very important convention in the political affairs of the United States if they should once happen to come together. But, sir, as I have said, I have no disposition to advise, and have no right to advise, and therefore will not advise on that subject. If we now fix a time in advance, say Monday, Tuesday, or Wednesday, as the day when the Senate will terminate its labors, I believe it will aid us in bringing the session to a termination.

Mr. NYE. I believe the question is on fixing a day to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the question is on going into executive session. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I beg the President's pardon. My friend from Wisconsin, who is always right, has been speaking on the question of fixing the day of adjournment. At any rate, whatever the question is, I propose to put to him now the inquiry which I proposed to put to him when he was on his feet. He has a high respect for men who differ from him, but has no respect for those who make speeches one way and vote another, or who entertain one opinion to-day and another to-morrow.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator will allow me to correct him there. I have no objection to a man changing his opinion if he is convinced that his opinion was wrong; but I do not like to see a man voting one way and speaking another at the same time.

Mr. NYE. I wished to call the Senator's attention when he was up to a single fact that occurred here on this floor in relation to the Freedmen's Bureau bill. If my recollection is correct, the Senator took occasion, being absent at the time the vote was taken, to say that had he been present he should have voted for the bill; and within a few days the bill came back vetoed, and he then voted against it. I leave it for my friend to reconcile his self-respect on that subject.

If the Senator had stopped when he had declared his views in regard to the propriety of fixing a day for adjournment I should have been most happy for once since I have been here to agree with him on that question. But, sir, he was not content with that. He never loses an opportunity to attempt to show the consistency of his leader and his party. Long speeches of columns has he made to prove that the policy of the present President was the policy of the lamented Lincoln, and it seemed to me that he had so exhausted himself on that question heretofore that he would have hardly gathered strength by this time to make a new attack. Why, sir, the difficulty between the President and the Senate is stated in a single sentence: the President by his nominations in most cases nominates those at war with the expressed sentiment of this great people; for I need not tell the Senator from Wisconsin, nor this Senate, that the expressed sentiment of this people, expressed in so many ways that it cannot be mistaken, is in direct opposition to the policy pursued by the President and the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Senator from Wisconsin has a holy love for the soldiers. So have I; I honor them. But, sir, the Senator will not forget that more than a year ago he took me to task here for not discriminating between times of war and peace; and the President has read us many homilies upon the fact that the radical Republicans could not distinguish between times of war and of peace. The sword is laid aside. The soldier is a soldier no more. He has returned to the ranks of the citizens, there I hope to perform the same duty in as acceptable a manner as he performed it on the field. But, sir, it will not be expected that the soldier should fail in that criticism that all others have to pass in regard to his civil conduct and his political action. I honor the scars of the soldier. I pay as high a tribute to his deeds of daring as any man. It is a question now with me whether the soldiers will perform their duty in as brave and valiant a manner in the civil strife as they did upon the field of blood. When they do, they are my choice, for they have two great guarantees upon the affections of the American people. When they fail to perform well the duty of the civilian, the honorable soldier will not expect to be shielded by his deeds of daring upon the field.

Mr. President, the trouble lies here, and the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me if I call his attention to a few facts. He claims that it is a matter of respect to the President that this Senate should confirm his nominations. Sir, are there not mutual respects in this matter? Is not the President of the United States bound to respect the great mass of this Senate, those in favor of him hardly numbering enough to count as "scattering"? Is the President of the United States at liberty to disregard the recorded judgment of this nation in condemnation of his policy? And yet, for the purpose of furthering that policy, upon the very brow of which the people have written their condemnation, we are told that out of respect to him he must be allowed to appoint such as agree with him. The Senator from Wisconsin, in order to give it double effect, talks of another soldiers' convention, and says that they will have a large convention. I hope it will be at Philadelphia; and if so, I hope that the padlock will not be put upon the lips of the soldiers and representatives that go there. My friend from Wisconsin has tasted of one convention at Philadelphia. It was not palatable to him, although I believe he was the only man that was allowed to speak. The fear of another convention has no horrors for me. They are familiar things. I want all soldiers and all civilians who disagree with the recorded judgment of this people to hold their conventions and to give their reasons why they hold them, and not, for fear of flying into fragments, put a seal not to be broken upon the lips of the delegates to their conventions. That I suppose was done out of respect to the distinguished gentleman who holds the office of President, by accident, of the United States. Why did they not speak? Because they dared not. The moment they spoke, the animus would be known. The whole thing, therefore, was played in pantomime, and the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin played well his part better in silence than I ever knew him to before. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, while I am perfectly willing to respect the President and his appointments, I am anxious to advertise him and this country that so long as he sends men in here who opposed his election, who opposed the reelection of Mr. Lincoln, who opposed the measures of the war, who opposed the settled judgment of this country for six years, they will not have the breath of life breathed into their official nostrils by this body. If it is the intention, as I gather from the remarks that have been made, to play shuttle-cock between the White House and this body during the balance of the summer, if I last I will stay here. But, sir, I claim that no person in this Government is so high that he is not bound to respect the judgment of the people, and the President knows as well as the Senator from Wisconsin that he outrages the judgment of this people when he sends men here who fought us to the bitter end in the election that gave him his place.

Why, sir, there has never been but one President before that has attempted to play this rôle, and that was John Tyler; and he played himself so dead that the bubbles have never risen over the place where he sank. [Laughter.] He undertook to Tylerize the nation, and here sat a Whig Senate. A Whig Senate rejected Tyler's nominations, and the Whig party, from one end of the country to the other, cried "glory" to the Whig Senate for rejecting his nominations. "Look to the Senate," was the by-word. Sir, if the President of the United States read the visible, tangible, striking letters along the pathway he is going, he would read the doom of every one that attempted to follow in the wake of Tyler. So much did the people abhor the course pursued by him that when his final hour came it received the passing notice of the newspapers as though he never held the high position that he did.

Now, sir, the remedy for this is right here: if I stood in the relation to the President that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin does and that my honorable friend from Connecticut does, I should go to him and say, "Mr. President, the voice of the people everywhere except in Connecticut"—I would mention that—"everywhere except in Connecticut!"

Mr. DIXON. The rest are coming.

Mr. NYE. Yes; so is doomsday—"is against your policy. You had better, therefore, fall into this column that is marching on so resistlessly, and make your appointments in accordance with the wishes and will of this mighty people." It will be far better for him and his history, and for them and their history, that they should do that than to hold up Connecticut as an example that the world is changing. Eight little counties out of this mighty Government have spoken. About half their number have been against the President, and about half in his favor—done by this paltry course—done by this nefarious example of rewarding traitors to their party and making traitors of those who hold their offices; and the Senator from Connecticut knows it. All the glory that you can gather from that victory I hope you will treasure up; but if I had a word of advice to give you I would say rejoice in the day of your youth, for the day is not far distant when a mightier than Connecticut will call you to judgment.

Sir, I am sick of this paltering between the President and us. This body owes something to itself. Fix the day of adjournment, and perhaps at last he will condescend from his high position to inform the Senate that it will be impossible to get through by that day. If he does that, it will be so much of a recognition of them. Fix the day of adjournment, and then the Senate will do what is becoming to itself and becoming to an intelligent constituency. Fix the day of adjournment, and let the President send in his appointments; if they are good, if the majority of this Senate seem to think them worthy, they will be confirmed; if not, they will be rejected.

And here let me say that I think the complaints of the Senator from Wisconsin do not come with a good grace from him. We have confirmed man after man from high to low, from civilian to the military chieftain who attended conventions in which my friend seems so much to revel. If he lives anywhere it is in a convention. I am glad to say that if he gets a large one he will have to go out of Wisconsin. [Laughter.] But we have confirmed General Dix, General Steedman, and generals without number when they stood in open array against the policy of the majority of this Government and of its representatives.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend will allow me right there, I will ask him to give the reason why they have been confirmed and others rejected.

Mr. NYE. Yes, I will be cleverer than you were. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no irony. I wish to hear the reason why they were confirmed and others rejected, if the Senator will give the reason.

Mr. NYE. Why, sir, that question which was asked centuries ago, why this one was taken and another left, has never been answered. [Laughter.] I answer no such question as that. The only answer is that those who were confirmed were in luck, and the many who have not been confirmed were not in luck.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is a very good answer if we can assume to ourselves to occupy that high position; but I supposed that we were a human tribunal, and I asked for human reason. I do not seek to pry into the mystery of Heaven.

Mr. NYE. It is no mystery; it was proclaimed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I asked for human reason.

Mr. NYE. I propose to give a right reason, and that has been declared to be revelation. I can tell the Senator why it was, viewed with human eyes. Some of our good-natured friends here have a great desire to see personal friends promoted, and the Senate, exhibiting far more magnanimity than is exhibited toward them, have yielded to personal requests of distinguished members on this floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand my honorable friend, then, to say that it is the weakness of the Senate, and not the reason of the Senate, which has confirmed those men.

Mr. NYE. The Senate has great weaknesses as well as striking strength. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The simple question I wish to get at is the reason, if possible, why the majority confirmed these great men, these great generals, and still take off so remorselessly the heads of the little ones?

Mr. NYE. Well, Mr. President, it is the soldiers mostly that get killed in battle; not the officers. [Laughter.] Officers are not always where they are in the most danger and are not as numerous as the soldiers, and soldiers are cut down and rest where their friends know not, while officers have stones reared at their heads to mark their resting place. I agree with the Senator that the policy of this Senate has been wrong. We ought to have killed the leaders instead of the soldiers. Instead of hanging Wirz we ought to have hung Jeff. Davis with his cohorts around him. If I could have had my way not a man who put his head in the Philadelphia convention should have received an indorsement of the Senate of the United States; and my friend from Wisconsin has seen his friends, for that reason, fall around him—

"Like leaves in wintry weather."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Some fall, and others are confirmed.

Mr. NYE. All ought to have fallen. Some survive, and their fall is in the future to come; and I conjure my friend not to boast before he casteth off his armor, because the day may come when he himself will stand in judgment for that offense; and much as I love him and honor and respect him, I never could vote to confirm him to a foreign appointment until the change in him was as marked and as visible as that change has been which he has recently undergone.

Mr. President, I desired simply to say this because my friend from Wisconsin seized upon this opportunity, with reporters here, to put himself on record once more in defense of the Johnson policy. If it was proper for me, I should like to relate a little incident I saw once in court, illustrative of his position exactly. The lamented Alvin Stewart, who had no superior at the bar of New York, was once trying an important case. When he had got nearly through his argument a gentleman opposed to him interrupted him in a low tone. He stopped and looked at him. Said he, "Pip, pip, pip, yet;" and he added, "I supposed if you had either sense or sensibility that you were dead an hour ago." [Laughter.] So my friend "pips" upon this Johnson policy and Lincoln policy, and I suppose he will continue to "pip" upon that as long as he can get it printed in the Globe, to go out to the world.

Now, sir, I desire for one, and for all time to say, that if it is the policy of the President to keep us here all summer to reject men who are offensive in the nostrils of the Union-loving men of this nation we are ready, if it is a question of endurance. They say his health is not good. [Laughter.] If it is a question of bold defiance I would meet it in the same spirit in which it is given. But, sir, if it is a question of "right, I know that the people of this country will call this Senate blessed for not putting in the hands of their enemies the power to overthrow them.

My friend from Maine asked the honorable Senator from Wisconsin about a letter he wrote. I never saw it; but knowing that my friend from Wisconsin was in the inner circle of this Johnsonian policy I should like to ask him one more question. Why was it that every postmaster in the nation and every man holding a place was asked to contribute to the support of the Johnson policy, and the inquiry made, and to be answered, whether he would support it himself? That was the magnanimity that they exhibited, "That measure that you mete unto others shall be meted unto you."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator asks a question as to myself. The inquiry which he now puts is a matter of which I never had any knowledge, and have no knowledge now.

Mr. NYE. The reason is this: my friend did not hold a petty office in the Government. If he had he would have had knowledge of it by a circular under a frank.

Mr. FERRY. His own frank.

Mr. NYE. I do not know how that was. I say nothing but what I know. I know in my distant State there was not a mountain gorge in which there was a post office but what this ticket came signed by the cashier of the Johnson committee here, Mr. Knap. "Come down so much;" and "will you support the policy of Johnson?" were the interrogatories. The first, the "come down" part, was more emphatic than the last. [Laughter.] That, sir, was the magnanimity displayed by the officers and by the President of this Government when he was turning men out. I had but one friend personal to myself in office in the State of Nevada, and his head fell so quick that you could hardly mark the place where it fell. A man was put in who was not friendly to me nor friendly to the majority of the people of this nation. He holds it now. The result of it was that two or three heads fell, and the rest joined the Johnson Club as an ark of safety, and crept in out of the shower. I hope they will never show their heads again.

Now, sir, when the Senator from Wisconsin assumes that we are bound to show respect to the President's appointments, I ask him if the President was not bound to respect the appointees who were in and discharging faithfully the duties of their offices? Respect is not all due from one side. I submit that the President of the United States has treated with disdain the expressed judgment of this people recorded in a thousand ways. He has treated with contempt the voice of the national council of Congress. He has hurled back defiantly into our teeth measures well considered by gentlemen who would not suffer in comparison with his own intellectual or legal acquirements. And to-day, if it is proper to speak from the newspapers, the question is being agitated whether the Government is to be enjoined. Let me suggest to my friend from Wisconsin that he had better be looking out for a receiver for the Government. There will have to be one appointed, and he should see to it and get a Johnson man, and one who has been true. Why, sir, there is no respect paid to the laws of this country. There is no heed paid to the admonitions of the council of this nation. The President has a policy of his own, as indefensible as it is remarkable.

My friend from Wisconsin says he likes a bold man. So do I. I never had much of that attribute in me. I am rather conservative in that respect. But, sir, it is a bold man and an honest man that knoweth the will of his master and doeth it. The master of the President, the master of the Senate, and of Congress, is the mighty aggregated judgment of a republican people. It is the bold man that listens to that voice. It is the reckless man that does not heed it. In conclusion, I advise my friend from Wisconsin to swing into his old circle where he rose so happily, and get off from the rugged road he has had swinging around this Johnson circle.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I never undertake to speak of the future, for I am not gifted with foresight. I seldom boast of the strength of the position which my friends may occupy. I can only speak for the past. Two or three times in my life it has occurred that I have been compelled, through my convictions, to leave a dominant majority to go into a minority, to fight the battle of what I regarded as truth, justice, law, and the Constitution. It is true that I left the Democratic party in its palmy days and when it was in an ascendancy here and in my own State, to join a minority to overthrow it when it was wrong. I had aided in fighting the battle of the Republican party until it came into power. I aided in fighting the battle of the Republican party until this rebellion was crushed. And now that this party, in the pride of its power, and because it is counting its majorities or has counted them, has entered upon a policy which in my judgment is destructive of the Constitution, and if persisted in and not recovered from, and that very soon, will destroy the Constitution of the United States and involve with it constitutional liberty, I have differed with that majority.

They may be right; I may be wrong in my convictions; but it is because I have those convictions that I have differed from them. I do differ from the majority. I do go again into a minority. I expect to fight the battle in reference to those principles which I believe to be the true principles of the Constitution, and whether I shall remain in the minority, or whether a majority of the great mass of the American people shall come to the position which I occupy, is a thing of the future altogether. I boast not myself of to-day nor of to-morrow. But, sir, from what has occurred, not merely in the State of Connecticut, to which my honorable friend alludes, but in Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, New York, everywhere where the popular elections have been held and are taking place, we see, in my judgment, that which goes to show most conclusively that the mass of the people of this country are dissatisfied with what I regard as the unconstitutional policy which has been urged and pushed and crowded upon Congress and the country by the party in power.

But, sir, I shall not go into that question. I do not desire to get up a discussion here about what the future is to be, how strong the majority is to be, in the future, or the minority. I do not profess to be a prophet, and therefore I never speak of the future. I only say these are my convictions. I may be wrong; or my honorable friend may be wrong and I may be right. I shall not continue the discussion, for I desire, if there are no others to speak, to have a vote of the Senate on the resolution before us.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada in his remarks, which have been heard with so much interest by the Senate, took occasion to allude to the Connecticut election, and to speak of Connecticut in language not quite so respectful as that which he addressed to the people of that State not long since in person. I have never alluded, nor do I know that I should have alluded, to the recent election in Connecticut. I confess I felt what might, perhaps, even amount to exultation with regard to that election; but I did not like to exult over my friend from Nevada, nor do I like to express or manifest a spirit of exultation anywhere. I should not therefore have alluded to it now if that Senator had not done so in language which I think calls for some notice from me.

Now, sir, it is true that during the last winter it became manifest to all observers who were at all skilled and experienced in the signs of the political times that there was a change of opinion going on in the State of Connecticut. The Radical leaders there were alarmed. They felt themselves to be in a demoralized condition, and they looked about for a remedy. The disease was somewhat desperate, and desperate diseases demand desperate remedies. They inquired what they should do; and the first step was—and it was a wise step, I admit, and a step that might well have caused some trembling anxiety in the minds of the conservative men of Connecticut—to send for the Senator from Nevada. They felt that they were well nigh ruined, and they sent for that Senator with the hope that he might save them from destruction. He accordingly went to Connecticut and addressed the people. He made a speech which produced a powerful effect, as I need not assure the Senate. It would be very disrespectful for me to say that the Senator ever made a stump speech in the Senate; but it is no disrespect to any gentleman in this body, no disparagement to any one, to say that on the stump or in a popular assemblage there is no man who can move the masses like the honorable Senator from Nevada. That his speech in Connecticut produced an effect I will not deny. That it excited the hopes of the Radical party I will not deny, although when the Senator returned here he said the State had gone somewhere in his apprehension, and I believe he proved a prophet with regard to the result of that election.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to know the place that the State went to. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Nevada never uses improper language, and of course it was no place which such language would describe. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. I understood the Senator to say that the Senator from Nevada had proved a prophet in saying the State had gone somewhere, and I wanted to know where.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to answer that prophecy myself. Connecticut went as I thought it would go. I found that the real trouble was that my friend had proved to Connecticut what the heaven did to the meal. He had leavened the whole heap of office-holders, and they went conservative; and that is the place I meant to say the people of Connecticut had gone, into that fire of conservatism where they do not rake it up nice.

Mr. DIXON. Very well; the Senator predicted the result in his own expressive manner. I saw it stated in the papers that when the Senator returned he despaired of carrying the State of Connecticut. Now, he says, it is an unimportant State, with only eight little counties, and has no influence in the affairs of this Government. I have in my possession a report of that Senator's speech in which he told the people of Connecticut that they had an immense influence. I do not know that he said, as went Connecticut so went the Union; but he spoke in most flattering language of the influence which Connecticut always had had throughout the Union; and he told them it was vastly important that they should exercise that influence in the proper direction, for it would be powerful; that whatever verdict they should render would produce a powerful effect on the people of this country. Now, he says it is a small State, with "only eight little counties," and it is of no consequence. He rivals Toots in his utter contempt for the result; it is of "no consequence" at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I agree that Connecticut is a small State. It has, as the Senator says, but eight counties. It has a comparatively small, but a very intelligent, population; I might say perhaps equal in that respect to any State in the Union; and they had an opportunity to consider this question in an intelligent manner. The whole question of the politics of this country was presented to the people of Connecticut in the last election, beginning with the Senator from Nevada and followed by my honorable colleague. There never has been a time when the people of Connecticut holding opinions with the Senator from Nevada and my honorable colleague have been so thoroughly canvassed and so ably addressed as during the recent election. If there ever was a time when the questions were fairly presented to them it was then. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] also did us the honor and the very great advantage of visiting that State. He replied with convincing effect to the able arguments of my friend from Nevada.

Now, sir, a change has taken place in Connecticut. That cannot be denied. What was the cause of this change? Various causes have been assigned. The Senator from Nevada says it was this practice of proscription, the use of Federal patronage. The Senator is mistaken with regard to the State of Connecticut. Every man who knows anything about that State knows that the greatest degree of tolerance has been there exhibited on that subject. We have not very much Federal patronage; it is not very extensive or important. There are only a few valuable offices, and I do not recollect that more than one of those was changed. But, sir, we have a great number of post offices, with comparatively small emoluments, which may possibly produce some effect on the minds of those who hold them. Whether they do or not I cannot say; but I will say that the office-holders of that character are nearly all Radical men, who vote for the party to which the Senator belongs, and as a general thing they have remained undisturbed. I do not think that in the list of three or four or possibly five hundred postmasters in the State of Connecticut twenty-five have as yet been removed, including the whole time from the Philadelphia convention to the present moment. The Senator therefore is mistaken in supposing that any effect on the public mind has been produced in that way in the State of Connecticut.

Sir, it was another cause. The people became alarmed at the extreme radicalism of my friend from Nevada, of Congress, of the Senate. They thought that this extreme radicalism had gone quite far enough. They thought it was time to pause. There is in the State of Connecticut a large number of men heretofore, and I do not know but now, Republicans, conservative in their character and feelings, who looked upon the proceedings of those with whom the Senator from Nevada acts as alarming. They thought it was time that those measures and those principles should receive a rebuke, and for that reason they changed their votes. What the future will be I cannot say. I believe the Senator intimated that this change would not be permanent. I think it depends very much upon the course of the Senator himself and the party he represents. If they take this check as a warning; if they pause in their destructive measures; if they change their course, possibly this change which is setting against them may be arrested; but I say to them now, if they go on in what they propose—if, for example, they go on with the scheme which has been offered here by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] and by his colleague, who unites with him in proposing by act of Congress to regulate the suffrage in the State of Connecticut—it will not be arrested, but will become still more emphatic and decided.

I do not know whether my friend from Nevada is in favor of that measure. Perhaps he is opposed to it. If he is, he will say so; if he is not, he will say so; for he never conceals his opinions. What his views on that subject are I do not know, and I regret that he does not inform us. But if these Senators go on with this proposition, not confining it to the State, of my honorable friend from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] which they call a quasi rebel State, and therefore exclude a portion of their representation at this time, not confining it to the southern States, but enacting by law of Congress that universal suffrage shall prevail in the State of Connecticut, then I say to them this change of opinion will go on increasing, and the Senator from Nevada will see such a majority against the radical measures which he now advocates at the next election as will surprise him far more than anything which he has seen at the recent election.

Mr. NYE. Allow me to ask the Senator a question about those who agree with him in conservative feeling. The Senator was not elected by the Democratic party here?

Mr. DIXON. No; but I was elected as a conservative.

Mr. NYE. Was it the conservative or the Democratic party that succeeded in the recent election in Connecticut?

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator that the Democratic party and the conservatives of Connecticut have united upon a platform of men and a platform of principles. I will say furthermore to the Senator that one of the officers elected at this election is the present secretary of state who was last year elected upon the Radical ticket, and that another officer elected, the State treasurer, has always been a conservative Republican.

Now, sir, such is the condition of things in Connecticut. I will not attempt to predict what future results may be, but this I know: that the people of Connecticut are patriotic, that they are intelligent, that they are a wise people; that they are not to be led on by any ignis fatuus of radicalism into a region which they do not know and understand. They wish to know where they go. They wish to know to-day whether that Senator and his colleagues on this floor are in favor of the measure to which I have alluded.

Mr. NYE. One question more. I understood the Senator to say he was elected as a conservative. Now, I want to ask him the question direct, whether he did not claim to be a Radical, and had not the certificate of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] showing that he was a Radical?

Mr. DIXON. I am glad the Senator has alluded to that. I do not know what the Senator from Massachusetts ever certified for me. He may have uttered what he considered kind expressions with regard to me; and if he did on that occasion I trust he acted in accordance with his own views of propriety. He certainly did not act by my request or with my knowledge.

Now, Mr. President, since allusion has been made to my position, if the Senator means to intimate that since I have been a member of this body I have changed my views, he is mistaken. The opinions which I hold to-day I have always held. I held them when I was elected; I held them before I was elected. I shall not now detain the Senate by going into them at length. I once had the honor of presenting a resolution on this floor many years ago, which was, if my recollection does not fail me, indorsed by the Legislature of Connecticut during the same session at which I offered it, in which I laid down what I thought to be correct constitutional views with regard to this whole question. I discussed the subject before the Senate. I alluded to it again a year ago; and I think it was admitted by all that I was consistent, and that I had always held those views. I think, therefore, the Senator makes nothing by the intimation that I was elected upon a different platform from that which I now occupy.

But suppose it were so; suppose I had changed; does the Senator mean to say that I do not represent my constituents? Sir, if I have changed, I am indorsed by the people of Connecticut. I may properly and rightfully and without exultation make the claim that I now stand here indorsed by a majority of the intelligent electors of the State of Connecticut. Out of over ninety thousand voters, forty-seven thousand have voted for the principles which I now advocate. I do not speak of that in a spirit of exultation. I speak of it in a spirit of rejoicing. I speak of it as a support to me in the position which I hold, as a result which is certainly to me in the highest degree gratifying, and which I think would justify me in saying that even if I had changed my position I am sustained by the popular voice of my State. Encouraged and supported by their approbation, I intend to persist in the course which I adopted when it seemed unpopular, and shall continue to contend for the true principles of the Union and the Constitution.

One word further, sir, with regard to prescription. The Senator has stated that this election was carried in the State of Connecticut by compelling office-holders to vote in conflict with their own views lest they should be removed from office. Nothing of that kind has taken place; but I regret to say that I have seen in the papers recently what I am not prepared to deny, but what I hope is not true, that some of the employers in the State of Connecticut who think with the honorable Senator have, since the election, expelled free men from their employment because they differed with them and voted in accordance with their own views at the recent election. I trust that this will not be found true. I trust it will be explained. I am unwilling to believe that there is in the State of Connecticut any large number of men who would resort to conduct so atrocious. Possibly there may be some; but, sir, I trust the people of Connecticut cannot be characterized as a people who would be guilty of such a wrong. If it should prove to be true, then I think that even the Senator himself will unite with me in denouncing it. If the time ever comes when it shall be agreed and conceded that the central power can legislate for the States, can legislate to regulate the suffrage of the States, and if it turns out, contrary to my hope, that there is any portion of the people of Connecticut or any other State who are willing to coerce the labor which they employ in voting contrary to solemn convictions and conscientious views, then, sir, I hope that the suffrage law will not stop with giving suffrage to all men, but that it will also provide severe penalties against those who shall attempt to influence and control the opinion of their laborers by such wicked and outrageous oppression.

Mr. HOWE. A poet has said that—

"Man never is, but always to be blest."

The reverse of that seems to be, according to the estimate of my friend from Connecticut, about the condition of the Republican party. It never is, but is always just going to be damned. It never is in any danger for anything it has done, but seems to be continually in danger of doing something that is going to bring judgment and perdition upon its head.

I remember during the early years of the war, when we were most strenuously admonished that if we dared to lay our finger upon the institution of slavery the Republican party would be dissolved, the Republican party would be divided, the Opposition would be united, the Government would fail in the prosecution of the war, the rebellion would triumph, and the Union would go to pieces!

I remember after we had done that, and after the Republican party did not divide, and after the election of 1864, and after the rebellion was crushed out, we were just as urgently admonished that if we did not recognize at once the institutions of governments which we found in those rebellious districts the Republican party would be divided, the Opposition would be united, the same consequences would ensue, and ruin would overtake and overwhelm the party which had so far controlled the country. Well, sir, we did not accept the admonition. We did not recognize those governments. We refused to do so.

Subsequently there was a shout set up that the Senators from Massachusetts and two or three reckless agitators like those had lurking somewhere about them an idea that those States down there had committed suicide, had destroyed their political organizations, and had forfeited their right to have the government of States; and they told us if we did not abandon that doctrine of State suicide the Republican party would commit suicide. And so they went to the country during the late campaign, not particularly finding fault with anything we had done, but insisting upon it that we were going to do something else. There was nothing particularly objectionable in the constitutional amendment which we had submitted to the people of all the States; the country could probably stand that; if they could not stand that, they would probably forgive that; but behind that lay the idea of ignoring the right of those communities to maintain State governments.

In spite of that warning the country did not withdraw its confidence from the Republican party. Since that time that threat seems to have been executed; that prediction has been verified; that doctrine of State suicide has passed into a legal enactment. I do not understand that the Senator from Connecticut is finding any fault with that; but he now insists that we are going to take to pieces the government of Connecticut and of some other States which never did destroy their own governments; and he tells us, in the old tones and with the old solemnity exactly, that if we do that thing surely destruction will fall upon our heads. Well, I will wait to see first whether we shall do it; and secondly, whether this prediction will prove any truer than those that have preceded it.

Mr. President, I shall occupy no considerable time in commenting upon the Connecticut election.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator was opposed to the doctrine of State suicide at one time.

Mr. HOWE. No, sir; the Senator does not remember the time when I was opposed to the doctrine of State suicide, as he calls it.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator talked in such a way in the Senate that I supposed so.

Mr. HOWE. When I talked upon or toward that question I always urged it very strenuously. The Senator is entirely mistaken as to my views on that question.

Mr. DIXON. How about the other?

Mr. HOWE. What other?

Mr. DIXON. The question of forcing equal suffrage on the States.

Mr. HOWE. I will answer that question whenever that subject comes up before the Senate if the Senator will wait until that time. I was about to speak upon another topic. The Senator endeavors to alarm us with the idea that the late election in the State of Connecticut is the commencement of a popular reaction, which is to be followed by the recantation of each of the Republican States of the Union in its turn. That may prove to be so; but I have not thought myself that we were in any great danger of it. What is that popular reaction which we have witnessed in the State of Connecticut? A year ago, preceding the election, I had the pleasure of spending a few days in Connecticut myself. I witnessed the fact that there was a very active and sprightly contest going on there; that the people were very much in earnest, and opinions were very much divided as to what would be the result of that election. I met then several gentlemen, the political and personal friends of my friend from Connecticut, holding responsible, high, and important offices in that State. I believe the Senator from Connecticut was then with the Republican party in that contest. I found all these gentlemen, with whom I conversed and who held these offices, to be with the Republican party, fighting for the Republican cause, upholding the Republican candidates. By and by the election came off, and there was a majority for the Republican ticket of about five hundred in the State of Connecticut.

Hearing that the result in Connecticut was somewhat doubtful the other day, some time before the election came off, I had occasion to ask some of my friends familiar with that State where these gentlemen were whom I met a year ago, and who then seemed to be very nervous for fear there would be a division between the President and Congress. I asked how they were now since there had come to be a division between the President and Congress. I asked how such a man was. I will not call names. He was with the Opposition. "And such a one?" "With the Opposition;" and so on through the whole catalogue of those whom I remembered to have met there. They were all with the Opposition. I did not ask where my friend [Mr. DIXON] was. I was in no doubt on that point. I had been informed by himself repeatedly. So that I saw our political friends in the State of Connecticut were going into the contest this year with the whole body of office-holders in that State against them, and whom they had with them a year ago; and I waited for the result with a good deal of anxiety and trepidation. I had not much confidence. Knowing that we had but a margin of five hundred to sink in that vote a year ago, I did not think it a very extraordinary thing that a Senator of the United States, that the postmasters of all the principal towns of that State, that the collectors of customs, and with all the patronage in the possession of all of them, should be able to sink that majority of five hundred.

Mr. DIXON. Allow me to set the Senator right, as this is a matter of fact and not of opinion. In my belief, as a question of fact, four-fifths of those holding the important offices in the State of Connecticut which require the confirmation of the Senate voted for the Radical ticket throughout; perhaps not the whole ticket. They have never been threatened; they have never been told that if they so voted they would lose their offices. Nobody ever proposed to intimidate such a thing.

Mr. HOWE. I shall not go to trial upon this issue of fact, nor ask for a feigned issue and send it down to the country to be tried. The Senator from Connecticut ought to know better than myself as to the truth of that matter. I only state what I was informed, and I was informed by more than one.

Mr. DIXON. In my own county in that district every one, with the exception of the postmaster of Hartford, voted the Radical ticket; and I think it was so in my colleague's district.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly, the information that came to me was very different from that. Every one of the individuals with whom I conversed a year ago, when I came to talk about their position now, I was told had changed. I may have been misinformed.

Mr. DIXON. You were certainly. A few important officers went with the Administration. That gave rise to the idea that all did. They are but a few of the most important, three or four.

Mr. HOWE. I do not mean to call any names, and I will not; but I met a gentleman, and a very intelligent man there, who I believe was collector of New Haven.

Mr. DIXON. He is one who went with the President. I included him in the three or four. He is a very prominent and able man.

Mr. HOWE. I met another who was postmaster at New Haven.

Mr. DIXON. My colleague can state with regard to him.

Mr. HOWE. I had occasion to inquire about him. I met another gentleman who was a candidate, if I remember aright, for Lieutenant Governor upon the Republican ticket last year.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, yes; there was a rush, I agree, of the people. I agree with the Senator in that; but when you come to the national office-holders they generally went the other way.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to have an opportunity to explain the Connecticut election as it really was.

Mr. HOWE. I shall be very happy to hear the Senator on that point. He can elucidate it much better than I can. I rose only to say, and this is all I wanted to say, that the fact that a Senator of the United States and all these office-holders combined, with the prospective patronage of the President thrown in, should be able to carry the State under a bare majority of five hundred in a vote of ninety thousand, I did not think gave very extraordinary indications of a popular reaction, and so far I let that pass. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] will speak upon that point much better than I can myself.

The main purpose for which I rose was to reply to a remark or two made by my colleague in reference to the appointments which have been made and the nominations which have been rejected in the State of Wisconsin. My colleague says, and I think he says rightly, that the Republican party has no occasion to complain in the State of Wisconsin of the way in which those appointments have been made; I do not know that the Republican party does complain. I have heard of no complaint. I certainly do not complain myself on behalf of the Republican party. My colleague says that he believes the large majority of those appointments which have been made are Republicans. I believe he is entirely right. So far as I know they are all Republicans.

The simple fact about this matter is: I have never made any complaint about what has been done in Wisconsin. Yesterday, in explaining to the Senate why I felt as if my work here was ended, or was nearly ended, I did not find occasion to make any allusion to what had been done, what had been accomplished toward filling the offices, but I did go on to explain the difficulties in the way of filling those yet remaining to be filled, speaking especially in reference to a single district, the fourth district represented by a Democrat in the other House, and in which there are now two offices to be filled. I felt bound to explain that, so that both the Senate might know and my friends at home might know precisely the difficulties in my path. I felt that I had got to do one of two things, or at least one of three. I had either got to say that I would not consent to the appointment of any man unless he thought as I did, or I had got to say that I would consent to a division of those offices, or I had got to say that I would surrender all pretext of standing by and of upholding the political opinions of my friends. I could not consent to do the last. I offered to do the second. I did not think myself, under the circumstances, quite justified in standing for the first. So much as to that district.

As to what has been done in other districts I think the statement made by my colleague is essentially correct. I think the offices have been filled in almost every, and I do not know but in every, instance by Republicans; but my colleague knows very well that I did not insist upon that; that I was not consulted about that. He knows very well that to him I said what I have said here in reference to the fourth district; that I was perfectly willing to make a division of these matters. But he seems to have preferred selecting the men himself and men of my own political persuasion. For this I am very glad, and I think it certainly a more satisfactory disposition of those offices than if he had accepted my own suggestion. If he has heard of any complaint of my political friends out there as to what has been done, I can only say that I have not heard of any, and as for myself I certainly have not made any, and I did not intend to be understood as making any yesterday or on any former occasion. The difficulties I wish to explain were not those I had encountered, but those which lay before me just now.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I do not like to detain the Senate; I know it is impatient to get at the active business of the day; but I think it is right, under the course which this debate has taken, that I should spend a little time in giving the real philosophy of the recent election in Connecticut, for there is a philosophy underlying that election; and it is twofold. It arises first from the nature of the population of my State. Close to the great commercial metropolis where the vast bulk of the European immigration lands, that immigration overflows into Connecticut, and fills up our villages scattered along our lines of railroad all over the State. Our young men of American birth, as they grow up and attain their majority, leave their homes, go to the cities or to the West, and their places are filled by the peasantry of the Old World just poured into this country. We have about ninety thousand votes in Connecticut. Of these more than one-fourth to-day are cast by naturalized citizens. Of those votes at the recent election nearly forty-five thousand were cast for the Republican candidate and about forty-six thousand for the Democratic candidate for Governor. Of the votes cast for the Democratic candidate more than one-half were cast by citizens of foreign birth, and of those citizens more than the majority which the Democratic candidate obtained were citizens who were naturalized within three weeks prior to the election. And when my colleague talks of the intelligence of Connecticut as reversing the verdict of the State last year, or as arrayed in opposition to the great Republican party of the United States, it seems to me that he must know that he is talking wide of the record. The vote given for the Republican candidate this year is larger in numbers than that given last year. The increased vote given for the Democratic candidate over last year is less than the naturalized votes of this year.

Owing to this nature of our population and the mode in which it increases we Republicans in Connecticut have always a hard battle to fight. We must win the accessions to our side from the young men of American birth, educated in our schools, reared in our churches, attached to the principles upon which this Government was founded. It is from them that we have got to get our accretions, while the ignorance and the superstition of the Old World year by year is poured into the Democratic ranks, with which my colleague is now happy to affiliate.

Again, sir, I said there was a twofold philosophy in this matter. As we have to win to our side from the young men as educated in our schools and of American birth it has been our true policy, and would have been our true policy for the last twelve years, constantly, persistently to have maintained a bold, manly front to the common enemy. Pluck, courage wins young men; they come where they see it. But, sir, the other branch of the philosophy underlying the result this spring has been this: while the great mass of the Republican party of Connecticut has ever since its origin been manly and faithful to the principles of the party, we have had among us a few hundred men, no more, holding the balance of power between the parties of our State; and of those few hundred my colleague has been the commander-in-chief; and we have in our annual conventions, I admit, in our intense desire to secure the vote of Connecticut for that party whose principles we believe to be essential to the permanence and the goodness of our institutions, yielded too much to this little praetorian corps. At their solicitations, upon their pressure from year to year, we have failed to place ourselves fairly and squarely upon the record which the Republican party was making for itself in the other States of the Republic.

During the war, in our anxiety to secure the influence of Connecticut; such as it was, for the maintenance of the great conflict, we have yielded to these men, we have given them the leading offices; we did not care anything about the offices; we wanted the Republic saved, and if these men could be got by an office to give us their votes and their influence let them take the offices so that we saved the nation. And when the war was over the patronage of Connecticut, having been for years in the hands of my colleague, (and no man in America knows better how to use patronage either for personal or political ends,) the offices in Connecticut were filled largely by men that did not need to be turned out; and consequently when my colleague, the commander-in-chief of this floating mass, large enough by its votes to swamp either party, made up his mind to leave the good old Republican ship and go over to the common enemy, they all followed him. You did not need to change the postmaster at New Haven; you did not need to change the collector in the eastern district; you did not need to change the collector in the western district; most certainly you did not need to change the collector of the port of New Haven or the postmaster at Hartford, because most of those officers could more effectively serve the purposes of my colleague by professing to remain in the Republican ranks, going to our conventions, apparently working with us, and then when election day came stabbing us in the back.

Sir, I had almost said that I am glad that the election in Connecticut has resulted as it has: the atmosphere will be clearer; the party will be purer. We stood this spring, for the first time, right square upon the platform of principle; we met the enemy on that platform; and if we suffered a defeat, the two causes which I have mentioned show that that defeat was not as my colleague thinks by a change of opinion on the part of the intelligent voters of Connecticut. I do not know where my colleague is to find those who were so alarmed at the radicalism of the Republican party as to have altered their votes from the votes they gave last spring when the record stares me in the face that our candidate for Governor got more votes this spring than he got last. And, sir, because now our party is liberated from the crew which has been clinging to it for the sake of spoils for the last twelve years, because now we go forth to the contest hereafter planted firm on principle, I am convinced that from this day forth in Connecticut we are and shall be stronger than we ever have been before. I am convinced that when the young men of Connecticut, born there and educated in our schools, see the Republican party of the State founding itself upon the principles of the Declaration, never afraid to meet the common enemy squarely in the face, never for the sake of getting the votes of a few selfish individuals of the party shrinking from the declaration of its real intentions, when the young men of Connecticut see this they will come to our party in such numbers as they have never come before. And when an election has taken place in a Commonwealth like Connecticut, where upon the record of that election itself it is evident that more than two thirds of our own citizens, born among us, familiar with our institutions, grounded in the principles of American liberty, have voted for the unsuccessful candidate, I say defeat with such followers as those is more honorable than success in the association in which my colleague finds himself.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, as my colleague has made pretty direct allusion to me in the course of his remarks, I shall be excused perhaps for taking up the time of the Senate for a few minutes in reply.

The Senator has attempted to give the philosophy of the recent election in Connecticut, and he has given two reasons which I propose to consider.

In the first place, he states to the Senate what is true, that we have in the State of Connecticut a large foreign vote so-called: a large portion of our citizens are of foreign birth; and he goes on to remark that they are ignorant and superstitious.

Mr. FERRY. Nothing of the kind did I say.

Mr. DIXON. The "ignorance and superstition" of Europe—I took it down from his own mouth—comes in from the great marts of commerce and thus overwhelms the true intelligence of Connecticut; and therefore he says that when I speak of the intelligence of the people of Connecticut I speak of that which does not exist as relating to this recent change at our election.

In the first place, with regard to the "foreign vote," I have this to say: I make no distinction between foreigners and natives; I know nothing of foreigners; I know nothing of natives; I only know American citizens. They are all American citizens, and until they are such they cannot vote in the State of Connecticut. I am a little surprised that the honorable Senator should speak of this class of our population in the manner in which he has seen fit to do this morning. I have heard it charged heretofore, and it has been sometimes true, that the honorable Senator himself and other gentlemen who address the people of Connecticut are in the habit of speaking very differently of this class of our voters before and after election. I do not think the honorable Senator would have gone to Connecticut and made the speech which he has just made before the election. He made several speeches there; he addressed the people of Connecticut; and while I will not say that he made abject appeals to this foreign vote, for I do not think he would do it, still I do not believe that he told them they were overflowing with the ignorance and superstition of Europe; that their vote would not be any proof of the intelligent verdict of the State of Connecticut.

On the contrary, I think he addressed them as adopted citizens, as men who ought to look above all such considerations, forget that they were of foreign birth, and vote as men should who have cast in their lot with us. I have no doubt he appealed to them in that way; and while I have said that I do not believe he made abject appeals to them, this I do say, that some of the radical speakers in the State did actually disgrace and degrade human nature by the abjectness of the appeals which they made to this very vote of which the Senator now speaks so contemptuously. Take the leading paper in the State, take the paper conducted by the Governor; I may speak of it because he is the Governor of the State of Connecticut. For six weeks before the election the honeyed words which he poured through those mellifluous columns upon the Irish and the foreign vote would have charmed my friend from Connecticut if he could have read them. Nothing was too good to say of these highly intelligent people; then the Irish were going to vote with the Radicals; their eyes were opened; they had become intelligent, and Radicals would receive their votes, especially since Andrew Johnson had been so base as to obey the laws with regard to the Fenian insurrection! No sooner was the election over, and the editor of the paper found that he and his friends were not elected to office, than their whole course changed with regard to this vote, and the language which my colleague now uses is contemptuously applied to our foreign-born population.

Now, it does seem to me there ought to be some little consistency on the subject. If this vote is of the character stated; if this people are of that character; if it is proper to denounce them as ignorant and superstitious and not intelligent after the election, why not say so before? Why not meet it? The Senator claims to be actuated by high principles, and he has intimated pretty strongly that those who are opposed to him are not. Now, the truth of it is that if there has been any means which has not been resorted to by that Senator's friends, if not by himself, to obtain the foreign vote, I am ignorant of it. So much for that.

Now, sir, one word with regard to the character of those people. It is true that they have not had all the advantages of education which some of our people have had. They have not all had the advantage of common schools. I do not think, therefore, that they should be denounced, as they have to-day been denounced by my colleague, as "the peasantry of Europe." If they were "peasants" at home, here they are freemen, and here we make no distinction. Is the Senator a Republican? Is he in favor of allowing the untaught, uneducated negroes of the South to vote; and does he wish to refuse the vote to those citizens of European birth who were invited by our laws to settle here? Is that his position? I understand him to be in favor of inviting a universal suffrage throughout the whole country.

Mr. FERRY. That is my position.

Mr. DIXON. And still he says to us that when the verdict of the State of Connecticut is influenced by the foreign vote it cannot be called the result of the intelligence of Connecticut.

Now, sir, I will close what I have to say upon that point by saying that I do not believe the honorable Senator will make the same speech which he has made here to-day at the polls or on the hustings at the next election. As the period approaches for holding the next election he and his friends will begin to think more favorably of the intelligence of our citizens of foreign birth, and not until after they have voted will they become "ignorant and superstitious."

The Senator has gone into matters of somewhat a personal character, and if I allude to the Senator personally he will excuse me for so doing, inasmuch as he has, very properly perhaps, alluded to me. I make no objection to that. The Senator has said that for the last twelve years the standard of Republicanism has been so low in Connecticut, inasmuch as it has been controlled and led by myself and a small praetorian band controlled by me, that it has resulted in their final defeat. The Senator forgets that during that time we gave one majority at one of our State elections of nearly twelve thousand; he forgets that at another election, and that, I may be permitted to say, was the year when I was reelected, the majority was six thousand, with these same leaders.

But, not to dwell upon that, the Senator says that men have been appointed to office who did not need to be influenced by an official bribe, that they were ready to go over with their leader whoever he might be—I do not claim to be that person—men to whom had been given offices for the sake of obtaining and controlling their votes; men who had not been influenced by high considerations as he had and those with whom he acted. Will the Senator allow me to remind him of the manner in which he emerged from the perhaps more honorable pursuits of private life into public position. When he left the honorable pursuits of the bar, how was it? As a Know-Nothing. When I first had the pleasure of hearing that honorable Senator's voice in the Legislature of Connecticut he was a leader; this pure Republican, who never followed any popular issue for the sake of office, was a leader of the Know-Nothing party!

Mr. FERRY. I believe you and I were together that session.

Mr. DIXON. And he remained true to that party, for he of course never changed. I beg the honorable Senator's pardon. I had the honor of being elected to the Senate by an American Legislature; but I never claimed to be a leader in the party, and in point of fact I never belonged to the party proper. The Senator never saw me in any of his secret lodges.

Mr. FERRY. Does the Senator mean to say that he never belonged to a Know-Nothing council?

Mr. DIXON. Never. I never was inside of them.

Mr. FERRY. Never was initiated?

Mr. DIXON. I was never initiated.

Mr. FERRY. You were terribly misrepresented then in the Legislature of 1856, for you were elected by that Legislature on the express ground that you had been initiated in a Know-Nothing lodge. I am glad to be corrected if it is not so.

Mr. DIXON. On the contrary, in 1856, when I was first elected to the Senate, a speech was published which I delivered, the first speech which I ever had the honor to deliver in the House of Representatives, in 1846, (I have been here a long time in one House or the other,) against the native American party; and that speech was published and circulated with the view of preventing my election. If it was said at the time that I belonged to the Know-Nothing party proper, or had ever joined their lodges, or had ever entered into any initiation, a mistake was made. I never heard that such a claim was made. I should have probably met the Senator if I had been in their lodges. I should have met him in one of their secret meetings. The Senator knows perfectly well that I was an outsider. There were some of their principles that were proper and right, and when they discarded their proscription and became an open party, I was willing to support those principles. I am not now denouncing them. I am only saying that the Senator who claims that he has been throughout a consistent Republican, and that he has been one of that pure angelic class who despise all office and would resort to no means to obtain office, leaving that to more unworthy spirits, has, I think, mistaken or forgotten a portion of his history. I do not deny that the Senator had good reasons and good motives for entering into the Know-Nothing party. I do not dispute his right to do it: honorable men went with him; but if he was in at the birth of the Republican party he was very much belied in the State of Connecticut. It was supposed that the Republican party was formed without his aid and against him; that he acted with the Know-Nothing party long after the Republican party existed. That is the belief, and I think the Senator will not deny it. But, sir, I do not propose—

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I believe that the motion pending is to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is so.

Mr. DIXON. Well, Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I believe it has never been the practice of the Senate to restrict Senators in the course of debate in which they see fit to indulge in arguing these questions. We cannot enforce that kind of order. Each Senator must judge by his own sense of propriety of the way in which he will handle his argument. This argument is supposed to relate to the subject of going in executive session. It is true I do not see any connection with it, but Senators do, and they are the judges.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will beg of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, then, that he will give way for an adjournment this evening, and close his speech to-morrow.

Mr. DIXON. I will obviate any necessity for the Senator's motion by closing in one moment. I have only a few more words to say. In this allusion to the Senator [Mr. FERRY] of course I mean no personal offense; but he has assailed the motives of my friends; he has declared that they have been governed by impure, improper, and corrupt motives for the last twelve years; and he has claimed that he and his friends have acted from none but the purest motives, have merely desired to advance the interests of the country. I have shown how that Senator himself has acted. If there is anything which authorizes him to assume that superiority in regard to party excellence of conduct, then I am very glad to find it possible for him to enjoy that consolation, although the record disproves his claim.

Now, perhaps, I ought to say a word in regard to the office-holders in Connecticut. He has alluded to some of them. I do not know that they need any defense from me.

It would perhaps be a work of supererogation. They are a portion of our citizens. The Senator seems to be dissatisfied with the people of Connecticut, his own constituency. Sir, I did not expect to be called on to defend my own constituents against the attacks of my own colleague, and I could wish the blow had been struck by some other hand.

One portion of them he says are of foreign birth, ignorant, unintelligent, superstitious; and another portion of native birth are corrupt office-seekers, not needing bribe, ready to follow anywhere for the sake of office. Is that so? Is my colleague just toward those people of our noble Commonwealth? Is that true of the people of Connecticut? If so, the honor of representing that State is not so great as he and myself had fondly believed. No, sir, the Senator is mistaken in regard to their character; they are honest, intelligent freemen; they have had no threat held over them. A large number of the office-holders, a majority of them, have voted for his candidates, perhaps favored his election; a portion of them have voted as I think right; but not a man of them has ever had it intimated to him or ever suspected that he would be removed from office if he did not do so.

Now, sir, a word as to the platform of principle which these gentlemen have followed. The Senator says that last year his friends succeeded by five hundred majority, and this year they are defeated by twelve hundred, and yet there has been no change of sentiment. Has the Senator forgotten the position which they took last year? Does not the Senator know perfectly well that the paper conducted by the Governor of the State then declared that there was no virtual difference between the President and himself and his party? Has the Senator forgotten that record? Does he not remember that they claimed then to run as Johnson men? Does the Senator remember the interview which that gentleman had with the President of the United States, as it was reported in the Connecticut papers a few days before the election, in which in the form of a dialogue the interview was related to the people of Connecticut, and it was declared that there was no virtual difference; that Governor Hawley and President Johnson thought alike; and that, too, after the veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and after the speech of the 22d February, 1866? And now the Senator says these same men have always acted on high principle, and last year, avowing their principle, they elected their ticket by five hundred majority. The Senator remembers all these things; the Senator very well knows the position they then took, claiming to be par excellence the Johnson party of the State of Connecticut. Yet when the election was secured by the means which I have described, the result was announced in the Radical press as a verdict against the President and his policy! Such are the lofty and honorable means by which unselfish patriots who now boast of their spotless purity have been accustomed to win their triumphs.

Sir, I regret very much that the question of the Connecticut election should be brought into discussion here. I have not introduced it. The Senator from Nevada saw fit to introduce it. I attempted to reply to some portion of his remarks; I made no allusion to my colleague except in the most indirect way; I do not complain of his reference to me; but I barely beg leave to say that if I have referred at all to his course it has been in reply to his own direct reference to myself and my friends. I am willing to concede to that Senator honesty of purpose; I suppose him to be honest. Probably he was honest when he was in the dark-lantern society. I will not deny that when he led that patriotic band of office-seekers and office-holders he was governed by patriotic motives, and when he emerged from that into the Republican party, the Know-Nothing party having collapsed, I concede to him, if he claims the concession, that even then he was not governed by any selfish motives. I am willing to concede everything to him upon that subject, and even to his friends in the State which they so loudly claim. They are rabid, and rather uncomfortable; they are somewhat difficult men to deal with, hard to satisfy, always complaining; but still let us say, since they will have it so, that they excel all men in honesty of purpose and purity of motive. Honesty is rugged in its character. They certainly never could be called men of a flattering aspect, and they have always possessed a wonderful capacity of winning dislike. They say all the severe things they think and sometimes a little more than they think, as I trust is the case with my friend to-day. But while I am willing to submit to this for myself, I cannot silently listen to assaults from any quarter upon my constituents, whether of native or foreign birth.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I have come to the conclusion this morning that the Senate is not very anxious to adjourn, and we seem to have departed from the pending business to discuss other subjects. Now, sir, I wish to make one point while this question of the continuance of our session is under consideration. The Senate, by passing the tenure-of-office bill, by agreeing to the enactment of that measure, assumed a peculiar and novel obligation, one that has never before rested upon it at any former session, whether a regular one or a special one, under a call of the President. By that tenure-of-office bill we have deprived the President of the United States of the power of filling offices which may be vacant at the time of our adjournment. Not only have we imposed a prohibition upon him in this particular, and thus changed the practice of the Government as it has obtained from the earliest periods, but upon the appointing power, and upon persons appointed or selected to office in violation of that prohibition, we have imposed severe penal enactments. The Senate, therefore, by agreeing to that bill, by passing that bill, have assumed the obligation and duty of filling these offices before adjournment. I think that that duty ought not to be shirked; it is one that cannot be honestly and fairly evaded.

Senators are to remember also in this connection that within the last year we have increased our compensation; we have largely increased the pay allowed us by law. Having done so, and having prohibited the President from filling the public offices of the country, it is our clear and plain duty to remain here until all those offices are filled, at least those that are important, all those that there is not any existing provision of law for their management and control in the absence of a regular appointment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of executive business; and on that question the yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do hope since we have now disposed of Connecticut, and Wisconsin, too, I believe, [Mr. SUMNER. Have we?] for to-day I trust, that we may be permitted to come to the question of adjournment, if that is the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not the question before the Senate; the question is on going into executive session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that whoever made that motion will withdraw it and let us have the question on the adjournment. If we had settled it yesterday we should have saved this debate to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will withdraw the motion if I can be permitted to do so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, then, let us have a vote on the question of adjournment.

Mr. SUMNER. I renew the motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island cannot be withdrawn but by leave of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on granting leave to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Leave was granted.

Mr. SUMNER. Looking at the clock I beg to remind the Senate that it now wants twenty minutes of four. I think at that hour we had better adjourn and go home if we are not disposed to go into executive session and attend to the business on our table. If Senators are disposed to adjourn and go home for the day I have no objection to that; but I do not think it advisable for us to open again to-day the debate on the question of a final adjournment. It is evident from the very discursive and multifarious speeches to which we have listened with so much interest on this subject of an adjournment that there is much more to be said. The subject has not been exhausted. Connecticut is not exhausted; nor is Wisconsin; in short, I believe that is a perennial fountain which must always flow as long as my excellent friend [Mr. DOOLITTLE] is in this Chamber. It is evident there is much more to be said on the subject; it had better, therefore, go over until to-morrow. If the Senate is not disposed to adjourn and go home let us at least go into executive session. To that end, therefore—I supposed that motion was pending; if it is not I make the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion has been pending for three hours.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 24; as follows: YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Fessenden, Harlan, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sumner, and Van Winkle—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Yates—24. ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Edmunds, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, and Wilson—16.

So the Senate refused to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution fixing the day of adjournment, as amended.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is Tuesday at four o'clock, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the resolution as amended.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Williams, and Yates—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, and Sumner—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Edmunds, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, and Wilson—16.

So the resolution was adopted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 13, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in response to a resolution of the Senate of March 29, calling for various items of information as to Indian affairs, which was ordered to be printed, and lie on the table.

TENURE-OF-OFFICE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that there be printed for the use of the Senate five hundred copies of the tenure-of-office bill. There is occasion for reference to it all the time, and there is no way of putting our hands upon it. It may be printed in the newspapers, but such copies are not at reach always. I make the motion; the expense will not be much.

The motion was agreed to.

GOVERNOR OF COLORADO TERRITORY.

After a pause—

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that there are several resolutions on the table that may be acted on if Senators see fit to call them up.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I withdraw the motion if there is any other business to be done.

Mr. THAYER. I move to take up the resolution I submitted on Tuesday last, relative to the Governor of Colorado.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, when Alexander Cummings was appointed Governor of Colorado Territory; how much of the time the said Cummings has been absent from the Territory since his appointment, and whether by permission or not; and how much of said time with permission and how much without permission, and whether on public duties or not; and whether his salary has been paid to him during his absence or not, and how much has been paid to him as salary for the time he has been absent from the Territory.

The resolution was agreed to.

SENATE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. CRAGIN submitted the following resolution: which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to the clerks of committees and pages employed during the present special session of the Senate, and such other employes as are paid by the day, the usual per diem compensation.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. FESSENDEN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed to revise the rules of the Senate, and to report thereon early in the next session.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after five hours spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, April 15, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, information relative to prisoners of war taken by belligerents in the Mexican republic.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that those papers lie upon the table, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 28, 1867, information in relation to the absence of territorial officers from their post of duty; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] offered a resolution on Saturday, which was laid over, which ought to be considered in open session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would rather wait until more Senators get in this morning before taking it up.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. RAMSEY. If there is no business in open session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of the present session of the Senate sine die.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the time fixed by the resolution of the 12th instant for closing the present session of the Senate by an adjournment sine die be extended to the hour of four o'clock p.m. on Wednesday, the 17th of April.

LOUIS V. BOGY.

On motion of Mr. ROSS, the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, dated April 8, 1867, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, information in relation to the employment of Louis V. Bogy in the Department of the Interior, was taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, information in relation to the employment of an attorney to represent that Department in the Court of Claims in certain cases pending in said court; which, on motion of Mr. CHANDLER, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DRAKE. I wish to ask leave of absence for the remainder of this session of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am averse to the Senate beginning this practice of giving leave to Senators to absent themselves. It has never been done in the Senate since I have been here to my knowledge. A request was made the other day which was not acted upon. Every Senator has a right to go away when he chooses, and we cannot compel him to remain. He can justify himself to his own mind and to his constituents if he needs any justification. By undertaking to give leaves of absence we introduce a practice here which has never prevailed to my knowledge. Every gentleman acts upon his own responsibility. I have no doubt, as the Senator says, that there is very good reason for him to go; but there is no reason why we should pass upon it in any way. He does not need any leave from us. He can go and return at his pleasure. That has been the practice of the Senate hitherto, and I hope that it will not be broken over.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state that I made the application under a misapprehension. I thought that it was a customary thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. DRAKE. Now, being informed by the honorable Senator from Maine that it is not, of course I do not wish to continue the application.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

CONDENSED REPORTS.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be authorized to enter into a contract in the name of the Senate with some proper person to furnish condensed or synoptical reports of the proceedings and debates of the Senate, the same to be free to the press of the country or to any authorized agency thereof, such contract not to continue for a period exceeding one year, and to be submitted to the Senate for approval.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is it a resolution of inquiry simply?

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. That is a very important proposition, indeed. I should like to have it considered at least by our Committee on Printing.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will state that my motive in taking up the resolution is to permit the chairman of the Committee on Printing to make a motion with regard to it. I do not see him here at the present moment, however. I will make the motion in his absence. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution in order to submit a motion in regard to the subject. I do not want it adopted now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What motion does the Senator make in regard to it?

Mr. BUCKALEW. To proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it lies over.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not know why we should object if it is merely to go to a committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It authorizes the committee to contract.

Mr. SUMNER. But I would send it to the committee for inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The objection, I apprehend, will be withdrawn. The Senator from Pennsylvania stated that he did not wish action upon the resolution, but desired to have it taken up for the purpose of making a motion in regard to it. I apprehend there can be no objection to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand that the Senator's object is to offer a substitute.

Mr. BUCKALEW. No, sir. The chairman of the Committee on Printing desires, when this subject is up, to move to refer it to a select committee. He is not present, but I will submit that motion in his absence as if he were here. I want it acted on to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection has been made, and if it is persisted in the resolution goes over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no other objection be interposed the resolution will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW. At the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, I move to refer this subject to a select committee of three.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if this resolution goes to a committee of three whether it goes to that committee with authority to enter into this arrangement?

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; to report upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. To report it back to the Senate?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. Then should not the resolution be altered to the common form, that the committee be directed to consider the expediency of entering into such an arrangement?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator does not understand it. The resolution authorizes the Committee on Printing to contract. Now, the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is to refer the resolution to a select committee, and they must report whether it is advisable to direct the Committee on Printing to make such a contract. There is no objection to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am in favor of the proposition in that view, and I hope it will be adopted, and that the committee will report; and I am prepared to say that I hope they will authorize the Committee on Printing to make such a contract, to have some way by which the reports of this body can go out in other than the garbled form in which they have gone out heretofore, misrepresenting the positions of Senators almost daily. I have never made a complaint in my life; I have never risen, I believe, to a personal explanation since I have been a member of the body; but I have seen the abuse of this thing, and I shall be very glad indeed if we can get a reform in some way.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understand the objection heretofore made to any action of this kind is that the Senate is in the power of the Associated Press, and that if we have authentic and accurate reports prepared that association will not receive them; they will by their extensive power, by their control over the press of the country, use their own reports in the future, and our attempt to extricate ourselves from the existing situation will be fruitless. That is the objection which has been stated, and I believe the only one which has induced delay with reference to this question of reform. Now, sir, I want to know whether the Senate of the United States is at the mercy of anybody who may be placed in our gallery under our rule; whether the reports of our proceedings shall be given to the country in precisely such form as an unauthorized and irresponsible individual may choose; whether his partialities shall be exercised in representing members to the public; whether his incapacity shall brood over the information which is given to the country of what we do.

I have been in the habit occasionally during the recent sessions of Congress of looking at the daily reports, and I must say that they are essentially unjust; they are essentially unfair as to individual members; and that they convey an improper view to the community of what we do. I think upon due inquiry it will be found that we may exercise some control over this subject; that if we attain accurate, intelligent, authentic reports the Associated Press, and all the press not connected with that association, will eventually take them. By producing a better article we will command the market. If the Associated Press, when that provision is made, will not take these reports when they are furnished to them free of charge, we have the power to defend ourselves certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to refer this subject to a select committee of three.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. BUCKALEW. By the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 16, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. There was a motion made,

I think, yesterday to reconsider the resolution of adjournment. I do not see the Senator in his place who made it, but under the circumstances I think the motion to reconsider perhaps had better be acted upon and the resolution be reconsidered, and then it can lie on the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. There was another motion made to postpone the time of the adjournment. I think that had better be acted upon rather than the motion to reconsider. The Senator who made the motion to reconsider will be in presently, and perhaps we had better defer action on the subject until then.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

CONDENSED REPORTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to announce the special committee appointed to consider the resolution offered by Mr. BUCKALEW, directing the Committee on Printing to make a contract with regard to condensed reports of the proceedings of the Senate. The Chair will appoint Mr. BUCKALEW, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. TRUMBULL to be that committee.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to call up the resolution that was laid on the table yesterday by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] with reference to extending the time of adjournment.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the time fixed by the resolution of the 12th instant for closing the present session of the Senate by an adjournment sine die be extended to the hour of four o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, the 17th of April.

Mr. HOWE. What assurance is there that we shall be any better prepared to adjourn to-morrow than we are to-day?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we are not, we can postpone it another day. I think there is some chance of our getting through to-morrow. If not, we can postpone the adjournment a day further.

Mr. HOWE. What assurance is there that we shall have a quorum to-morrow to postpone the adjournment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then we cannot do any business. My own impression is that probably we cannot get through at best until Thursday.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask, would it not be better, then, simply to reconsider the resolution of adjournment, and let it lie on the table, to be called up when we can see the time to fix it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we reconsider the resolution, and are left without a quorum, with no time fixed, we cannot adjourn at all. I think this is the better way. I think there will be a quorum.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the resolution read.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the resolution by inserting "Thursday, the 18th of April."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that. I do not think we can get through before Thursday. If we should get through to-morrow we can adjourn then if we have a mind to.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course we can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It is moved to amend the resolution by striking out "Wednesday, the 17th of April," and inserting "Thursday, the 18th of April."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot vote for the resolution. I have no sort of assurance that we shall be any better prepared to adjourn to-morrow, or Thursday, or next week, or next month than we are to-day. There is nothing in the world that I know of to prevent our adjourning to-day except the simple fact that there are certain offices in the United States which have not been filled yet; and those offices have not been filled simply because the President has not found time since the 1st of December last to send men to the Senate that the Senate could or would confirm. Not having been able to accomplish this in that time affords to my mind a very clear indication that he will not find time to do it before the middle of next week, and strong reasons for suspecting that he will not do it before the middle of next fall, and I think a very satisfactory ground of belief that he will not do it at all if the Senate once advise him that they are prepared to stay here until he does do it.

These offices have been vacant, if they can be vacant, since the 4th of March last. Somebody is to blame for that. If the President has sent us men whom we ought to have confirmed, we are to blame, because we have not confirmed them. If he has not sent us men whom we ought to confirm, he is to blame, because he ought to have sent us such men. Every time we have voted to reject a man whose nomination was necessary to filling an office we have voted to leave that office vacant, and every time he has sent us a man whom he had satisfactory reasons for believing we would not confirm he has concluded to let that office be vacant rather than send us another man.

Now, I do not think the Senate ought to be required to stay here forever to try this question. I have once said to the Senate that whenever I had voted to reject a man I had voted that I would rather that man should be rejected than confirmed, though the consequence was that the office should be closed. I have rejected all that I have any appetite for rejecting. I would like to close out the entertainment; and I would like, if the Senate felt satisfied with the way it has discharged its duty heretofore, that it should come to the conclusion that it had done enough in that direction, and should go home and take the responsibility of these offices being closed, if the fault is ours, and if it is not ours let it rest on the only other quarter where it can fall. Therefore I voted deliberately last week to fix four o'clock this afternoon as the hour for adjournment. I do not want to extend it one minute. When four o'clock comes I want this Senate to dissolve, not exactly into thin air, but into individuals, and I want permission to retire from this Capitol.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope we shall not extend the time of adjournment beyond to-morrow at furthest. I did believe when I came here that some kindly treatment toward the President might induce him to act wisely in his appointments; but so far as Pennsylvania is concerned every appointment that he sends in is worse than the preceding one. I do not believe if we were to remain here until next December, as far as my State is concerned, the appointments would be satisfactory to the Republican party, that party which elected him. I think his intention is, if possible, to throw the responsibility upon us of leaving these offices vacant. I for one am willing to take the responsibility which justly belongs to the action of the Senate. The vacancies which now exist in Pennsylvania were created last summer, when he believed, through bad advice, that he could control Pennsylvania and with Pennsylvania carry the Union for his policy. He failed to do so, notwithstanding he removed almost every office-holder in Pennsylvania. Almost every man in office there who had voted for him was compelled to give place to somebody who had opposed his election. It had no effect upon our election then, and I am willing to try it again. I do not believe that he has any intention of appointing anybody but the worst men he can appoint—the worst men he can select who are willing to take his places.

For myself I would much rather adjourn to-day than to-morrow, but I am willing to wait until to-morrow and give him notice that that is the end of the time. If he thinks proper to send in proper persons here we will confirm them; if he does not, let the responsibility be with him, where it will rest. I shall vote for no more of these compromises.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think we are a little at fault in this matter, Mr. President. Certain Senators on this side of the House proclaimed a few days ago that they were determined that these offices should be filled. Of course that was giving Mr. Johnson notice that he might continue to send in Copperheads and traitors, and that they would vote to confirm them. To correct that misapprehension on his part I am willing to give him one day's notice that Copperheads and traitors will not be confirmed, and that if he sends in loyal men they will be. I wish simply to correct the misapprehension that has arisen in his mind from the action of not more than two or three members on this side of the Senate, in proclaiming that they would vote to fill the offices no matter who the nominees were. I shall, therefore, vote for the postponement one day. I am willing to give him one day's notice, and then I would adjourn sine die whether the offices were filled or not. I said the other day that I would not be coerced into voting for improper men, and I will not; and I am willing to serve on him to-day notice that we give him one day more to fill these offices with proper men and no more time. I hope that the motion to extend the time for twenty-four hours will prevail, and that there will be no further extension.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was not aware, until I heard the Senator from Michigan, that any Senators on this side of the Chamber, or on either side of the Chamber, had given notice that they would vote for Copperheads or anybody else that the President might send here. I suppose if there are any such Senators the Senator from Michigan can name them. I was not aware of the fact before. Is the Senator disposed to say who they are?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Maine said he would vote to fill these offices, and it is the Senator from Maine I mean. He is the chief, certainly. I mean the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought so. The Senator is always trying to hit at me in some way. I know his blows are not very severe. They strike wide, but they do not, many of them, produce much effect. I said no such thing, intimated no such thing as that I should vote for improper men, for Copperheads or traitors; and if the Senator means to say that I did he states what is not true in any sense.

Mr. CHANDLER. I stated just what the Senator did say: that he meant that these offices should be filled, and that he would vote to fill them; and he saw the class of men whose names were coming in, and notice was given to the President, as I have been informed, that if he persisted in sending in these names the Senate would surrender.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No such inference can be drawn from anything I said except by a man who is determined to draw wrong inferences. Take the record, look at it, and see if any such inference can be drawn from what I said. The Senator cannot find it. It was not said or intimated in any shape. I said, sir, what I say now, that in my judgment it is the duty of the Senate to stay here until these offices are filled; and I said, moreover, that if the President sent in proper men, men that we ought to vote for, I should vote for them. I said nothing and intimated nothing about others, and when the Senator puts that out to the country I repel it with the scorn and contempt I feel.

Now, sir, the Senator must not be too hard upon us in his late position of leader on this side of the Chamber. When he assumes it he at least must be reasonably generous, and at any rate confine himself to facts and to proper inferences drawn from what is said by other Senators. Let him turn to the record and see if I said anything that would bear any such inference as he has drawn.

Sir, I think the Senate has got to stay here properly until all hope of agreeing with the President on these appointments is lost. I think the country will hold us responsible if we desert our posts. I am as anxious to retire as anybody. But, what have we done? We have passed a tenure-of-office bill which prevents, what has hitherto been done, the President from filling the offices in the recess, so that in some cases the duties of the office cannot be performed by any one. We have passed that bill over his veto. Now, having done it, if we undertake to go away as long as he is making an effort, by sending in names here, to fill these offices, without doing it, I say the responsibility is upon us and we cannot avoid it. The advice that is given upon that subject in my judgment is bad and dangerous advice; and if my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, is willing to take the responsibility for Pennsylvania, let me say to him that I think he will find the responsibility a weighty one. I know he is ready to take it when he says he is; but I think he will find that he is not so able to carry it as he supposes.

There are other parties concerned in this question besides the President and the Senate, and those parties are the people of the country who want these offices filled. You may talk about shutting up a post office in an important town because we cannot agree with the President as to who shall be postmaster; but what will the people of that town say when they cannot get their letters and their newspapers? These little matters have a very important effect upon the public mind, let me say to Senators; and however they may talk about political effect in throwing the responsibility upon the President and off our shoulders, let me say to Senators that when it comes to a matter of personal inconvenience to every man, woman, and child in an important town or city in this Union, its people will hold everybody responsible who had any part in the matter, and say that it is more important to the country that the office should be administered than that the President should blame the Senate or the Senate blame the President. We cannot escape our share of that responsibility, in my judgment; and more especially can we not escape it if we do not fill the custom-house offices, where the revenue is collected, and leave the question of who shall collect it a moot question and a difficult question to be met.

The opinion I expressed before I express now in its full length and breadth; I say it is the duty of the Senate to stay here until we come to an agreement with the President on these matters, or until it is manifest that there is no possibility of our agreeing. Let us look at the facts and see how they will stare us in the face. The President removed between four and five hundred officers, as was stated here in debate; and at this day there are some fifty or sixty offices that are not filled—perhaps not so many; certainly not more. The rest have been filled, and filled with men who have been confirmed by this Senate. What is the inference? That the President has nominated nearly four hundred men who were acceptable to the Senate.

I do not mean to defend the President for his action in turning out those men. I find as much fault with it as anybody. I am ready to stay here as long as anybody to keep out improper persons; but I am unwilling that the argument should be turned against us and against me. I am unwilling that the friends of the President should have it in their power to say, "Look; out of nearly five hundred men the President has nominated four hundred were acceptable to you." Every day that he sends in names we confirm a dozen or more of his nominations. When that is going on can we say that the President is not making an effort to agree with the Senate? Do we take the position that he has no right to an opinion on the subject when he is the person appointed by the Constitution to make nominations to office?

As long as he continues to send men that we do not approve we have a right to reject them. I do not quarrel with the Senate for that; but what I advise is that we should try in good faith to secure the filling of the vacant offices and wait with a proper degree of patience until that object is accomplished, or at least until it is obvious to the whole country that we cannot agree and that the fault is not upon us. In my judgment that time has not yet arrived. From the very nature of things, from the very nature of the case, it is obvious that there must be a difference. The President is no longer our friend; he is no longer acting with us. We must accept the situation—we cannot help it—and do our duty in the best way we can, make the most and the best that we can out of it.

Sir, I think the advice that gentlemen give, to adjourn to-day at four o'clock, three hours and a half from now, with some forty or fifty offices of importance unfilled, is bad and dangerous advice. It is but a short time since we raised our yearly salary to $5,000. We have taken care to pay ourselves well. I am not responsible for that, but with others I accepted that situation, and having done it my time is and ought to be at the service of the community that pays me, and neither my own personal convenience nor any whim of mine should lead me to desert my post until I can do it safely to the best interests of the country.

Sir, this is a matter of indifference to me, as much so as to any other Senator. I have not more interest in it than any other individual, but I shall oppose these motions as long as I can, and if the Senate vote me down I shall go home, and gladly go home with the rest of them, and be willing to take the consequences.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator desires me to be modest in my leadership. I will inform that Senator that I never aspired to leadership. I have been, perhaps, one of the humblest followers of the Senator from Maine in his leadership for years. I followed him as long as I could, and I believe I followed him very closely up to the time when he desired to adjourn Congress and I did not. I then used the argument that we were paid by the year, and I desired to hold Congress here that we might have the remedy for any ill or any mistake or any crime that might be committed. But, sir, the Senator from Maine was all-powerful, and through his influence in this and the other House an adjournment of Congress was carried; and I give him the credit for it. I did not follow him in his leadership on that occasion. I have no recollection of ever having bolted my leader until that time, but then I did. But, sir, now the Senator says "Look to the record." There is no record. What has transpired has been in secret session. As a matter of course no record has been made of the doings in secret session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The record of what I said I alluded to. The language to which the Senator referred was in open session.

Mr. CHANDLER. What I alluded to was in secret session. I do not remember what the Senator said in open session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator had no right to allude to anything I said except in open session.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not name you or any other man; but you asked who I meant, and I told you frankly I meant you. You would not have been named if you had not insisted on it. I am generally ready to give a reason for the faith that is in me.

Now, the Senator from Maine says he is not in favor of confirming improper men. I am glad to hear it. He says also, however, that he is in favor of keeping the Senate here until these offices are all filled. The President knows very well that if he can hold us here day after day and week after week he can finally worry us out. He understands that perfectly well, and so does the Senator from Maine understand it perfectly well. He knows that we cannot hold a quorum here ten days longer; and he knows that if the Senate takes that position it will not be one week before every single nominee of the President, right or wrong, will be either confirmed, or the Senate left without a quorum and be powerless even to adjourn.

Mr. President, I repeat what I said before, that I am in favor of an adjournment of the Senate. While I opposed the adjournment of Congress I am opposed to the Senate's remaining here with its hands tied. While Congress was here it had its remedy at hand; but the Senate has no remedy. It can sit here from day to day and reject improper nominations as they come in, while at the same time it notifies the President that he may continue to send them in, and finally worry the Senate out. I believe that but for the intimation thrown out here, that the Senate could be worried out and that improper nominations would be confirmed, proper men would have been sent in before this. I believe that if we serve notice to-day upon the President that we will not and cannot be kept here to confirm improper men, that we have no fear of the responsibility which he has taken—the responsibility is his—the result will be beneficial. He removed good, reliable Union Republicans appointed by Mr. Lincoln and confirmed by the Senate, men of experience and character. Having removed those men, he now attempts to put in improper men. If he can stand that responsibility I can. I desire to serve this notice upon him: "You return those men, or men equally good, and we will confirm them; if you do not we will leave."

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I consider it my duty, as a member of this body, to remain here as long as the public interests call for it; but there is one thing that I do not consider it my duty to do, and that is to remain here to reject, time after time, nominations by the President of the same individual to the same office. There are two cases of officers in the State from which I come, in one of which the President has nominated one individual twice for that office after he had been previously rejected for another office; and in the other case he nominated the same individual three times for the same office, and every time he was rejected by this body. Now, sir, I do not concede that it is the duty of the Senate to remain here in session for an indefinite length of time to enable the President to try that same game with regard to offices all over the country, and in that way finally worry the Senate into confirming men that it does not think ought to be confirmed. And, sir, I think that the time has come, referred to by the honorable Senator from Maine, that we discover it to be an impracticable thing to agree with the President when he thus, instead of sending in new men for offices, undertakes to nominate the same men over and over again for a position for which the Senate has rejected him. I think when the President's game has come to that point it is time the Senate had adjourned and gone home.

Mr. ANTHONY. There seems to be a difference of opinion whether we should extend the time until Thursday or not pass the resolution at all. I think we had better go back to the original resolution. The original resolution fixed the adjournment for Wednesday. It has been amended by extending it to Thursday. Now, I move to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment so that we can go back to Wednesday, and then if we find it necessary we can extend the time another day. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator from Rhode Island vote with the majority?

Mr. ANTHONY. There was no division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted. The question is on that motion.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a word on this subject. The offices that are unfilled do not belong to the President of the United States; nor do they belong to the Senate. They belong to the country. It is the interest of the country that they should be filled, and that they should be properly filled and filled before the Senate adjourns. There are two coördinate branches of the appointing power; the one is the President and the other the Senate. We have had parties in our Government ever since its origin, and parties of great acrimony and of fierce competition; but when was the principle or the purpose ever laid down before that the Senate would compel the President to nominate for office particular persons whom the Senate desired? From the time of the election of John Adams up to the present Administration every President has exercised the discretion of nominating to the Senate his own friends for office. I do not know that the present Executive of the United States has any particular friends; but if he had, and that was the principle upon which he was acting, he would be acting in conformity to the practice of the Government from its origin up to the present time. I concede fully that it is his duty to send a competent and an honest man to the Senate for every office. When he has presented such a man as that to the Senate he has performed his duty, and his whole duty, within the spirit of the Constitution and in accordance with the uniform usage of the Government. I concede that the Senate has the power, and further, that it is the duty of the Senate, if the President sends an unfit person here for office, to reject him; but what is this matter of fitness for office?

There used to be an old-fashioned idea in relation to fitness for office. If a man had sufficient intelligence and conversance with its particular duties, and he was an honest and faithful and capable man, such a man in times past, and up to the present time, was always deemed fit and eminently fit for office. Is that the test and the measure of fitness now? No, Mr. President; there is a new and a summum bonum qualification that has been interposed in this day as the sine qua non for office, and that is that the nominee must be a Radical. I do not assent to any such principle as that.

Senators have spoken of nominations for their respective States. My State has but little patronage and few nominations, and the most of them are filled, and a good many of them are filled with Radicals, too. But there is one office there that is not filled. How did it become vacant? It is the office of collector of internal revenue in the ninth district. A Radical was in the office with the consent and ratification of the Senate. He resigned his position in the summer or fall of last year and made it vacant. It is a fact of public notoriety, of public knowledge, that a most competent man was appointed pro tempore during the recess of the Senate to fill that office. He entered upon the discharge of its duties, and when the Senate convened the President nominated him, as it was his duty to do under the Constitution. There was not a voice or objection against him for unfitness for that office in any respect save and except that he was not an extreme Radical. His intelligence, his integrity, his perfect comprehension of the duties of the office, his disposition and ability to perform them faithfully to the country, everything connected with the proper filling of an office he was conceded to have possessed, and yet he did not fill that office. It is a matter of public history that he was rejected. On whom, then, does the responsibility devolve that that office was not filled? Certainly not upon the President.

It is known as a public fact in the country that this nominee of the President was rejected, and then he nominated another man for the office who had been a soldier in the Mexican war, a gallant colonel in the late war, who had led his regiment into bloody fields with the most distinguished bravery, gallantry, and good conduct, both in East Tennessee and southern Tennessee and northern Alabama; and at Resaca de la Palma he led his regiment with as much gallantry and rendered as much effective service on that hard-fought field as any colonel in it—a modest soldier, an intelligent lawyer, a business man, not a party hack; as true a friend of the country and of the cause of the country in this late war as any man that is within its broad limits; true to the Union, true to the stars and stripes, true as any man for putting down the rebellion; and yet such a man as this was presented to the Senate, and it is a matter of public history that he was rejected. Now, sir, here is the second effort of the President of the United States to fill that office, and to have it filled by such a man, and the Senate will not receive him. He is rejected, and the office is still permitted to remain vacant and its duties unperformed and unattended to. Who is responsible for that, the President of the United States or the Senate?

Well, sir, the President, true to his constitutional duty to nominate for office, sends still another man to fill this office that had originally become vacant, not by his ejecting any man from office because he differed from him in his politics, but because of the voluntary resignation of the incumbent. He sends in another nominee. That nominee has been presented to the Senate, Judge Apperson. A man more fit for the office to which he had been nominated could not be designated in the civil history of our country. No man less a party hack than he, intelligent, a learned judge and lawyer, honest, of the highest character for integrity and truth, a business man, diligent, capable, acceptable to his people, elected a judge by the popular vote since the commencement of the war, as spotless and as unobjectionable a man as lives; and yet the fastidious Senate will not accept such a man as him from the President as the third effort to fill the office; and why? This man was no party hack. Neither of the gentlemen who had been nominated for the office previous to him was a party hack. But the Senate reject him as inexorably as the two former ones. Why? Simply because he is not an adherent, a supporter, a partisan of Congress against the President. Sir, he is no partisan of the President. He is no partisan of Congress. He is a partisan of the Constitution and the Union of his country. That is the only partisanship that he has ever known or recognized or acted upon; but that partisanship does not suit the Senate. They are not willing to take a man who has every quality of intellect, of business, of character, of integrity, and of morals of three different men for this office that was vacant by resignation, and they reject the whole of them seriatim; and all upon the simple ground that the men nominated were not Radicals, were not supporters of Congress, when they were not the partisans of the President. These men would scorn to be the blind partisans and tools of any President or of any Congress. They are men of character and of principle, attached to their Government, desirous of its proper and enlightened and virtuous administration. They are men eminently competent to take part in such an administration of the Government, and they would scorn to act any other part in it. And yet this third nominee for the office was rejected.

The President has sent in another. I suppose that the same fate awaits him, because although he comes up to all the requisites of a true officer, to every requisite that the appointing power, whether it be the nominating or the confirming power, ought to require, although he comes up fully to every requisite that any enlightened and virtuous appointing power ought to require, still he is deficient in this indispensable requisite: he is not an extreme partisan of the Senate against the President; he enters into no partisanship; he is for the Senate and for Congress when they are right; he is for the President when he is right. He supports the Constitution and the Union, was himself a soldier in the war, and also led his regiment into the field and into battle, and is ready to do so again, and has every requisite and qualification for the office but this indispensable one: he is not a partisan of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, I have spoken of my own

State, and of this particular office, simply because I had knowledge in relation to my State and this office. I have not in relation to other States of course, and could not have; but this I have to say: that if the President is acting in as noble performance of his duty in other States as in the State of Kentucky in his various nominations to fill this office he has done his duty most preëminently, and is subject to no censure whatever, and if there be any default whatever it is the default of the Senate and not of the President, and it will so be regarded by the portion of the people of Kentucky among whom the duties of this office are to be performed.

Mr. YATES. I always listen with a great deal of pleasure to the able Senator from Kentucky, because he always presents his side of the question in the ablest manner; but, sir, I am unwilling that the rule which he lays down to the Senate shall go out to the country as the rule, or as what has been considered the rule, governing the Senate heretofore.

I am willing to admit that where a President has been elected by the popular vote, and he appoints partisans, the men of his own party to office, if they are respectable, if they are worthy, if they are competent, it is the duty of the Senate, or has been considered their duty, to confirm the nominations of the President. Why? Because that is the popular verdict; the people have so decided; it is the voice of the majority. They have decided that he is the President of the United States, and that he has the right to nominate his partisan friends to office, and the minority very properly submit to this expression of the popular verdict.

But, sir, the present case is anomalous. I find my friend, the honorable Senator from Kentucky, claiming that the men who have been elected in particular districts by Radical votes shall not name the men who are to hold the offices, but a renegade from his party, the President of the United States, who has abandoned his party, who has turned his face upon his party, who ignores the popular verdict, who repudiates the will of the people, who represents a miserable minority of the people of the United States, that he, forsooth, shall send in his nominations for a radical Republican Senate to confirm! Sir, this Radical party of which the Senator from Kentucky speaks has swept the country by majorities which have not been known in the history of this Government. Our victory was not only not doubtful, but it was complete. Our banner waved everywhere in the ascendant. And now the Senate, which represents this popular voice, the verdict of the people, are to sit here and confirm the nominations of Democrats, of men from the minority, or of mere quasi Republicans! Will the honorable Senator from Maine ask me to stay here and see my nomination for the man in my district treated with contempt, and name after name sent in until they number dozens? Am I to sit here and finally indorse the nomination of some quasi Republican it may be, taking not whom I want, not whom the people of the district or the people of the State want, but whom I can only get? Sir, the rule was that "the spoils belong to the victors," that the party which triumphed should have men in office to carry out the principles of that party.

I am not in favor of any speedy or sudden adjournment; but do we not know that if we sit here we are not to get our choice; that although we are in the majority, although we have carried the majority in the country, and are entitled to the offices according to the rule, we are to sit here from day to day and make rejection after rejection, and finally take somebody who is not the choice of the Senate, but a sort of compromise man, who is neither Democrat nor Radical, somebody that we will take because we cannot get whom we want?

Now, sir, I can see the effects of this delay of the Senate staying here upon Republican Senators. What is the fact? Name after name is sent in; we must confirm or reject; and if we cannot get the man we want, if we finally take some man who is not acceptable to the Republican party, we are responsible when we go home. We are responsible also for every objection which has been made. Who does not know now that it is a part of the policy of the Administration to look up lame and disabled soldiers who have turned traitors to the principles of the party which has triumphed in this country and flood the Senate with these nominations, so that the hue and cry may be raised that we are voting against soldiers, men who have fought and bled in the service of their country. The longer we stay here the more are we to be subjected to the charge that we are repudiating soldiers. I am opposed to any such course. I do not recognize the principle which the Senator from Kentucky lays down. The offices of this country belong to the men who have carried the elections at the polls. He says that we reject men because they are not Radicals. Sir, we have a right to reject them because they are not Radicals, because the sentiment of this country is Radical; the Radical sentiment has triumphed and gloriously triumphed; and the Senate of the United States will not come up to the high-water mark of its duties unless it sees that Radicals control this country.

Mr. ANTHONY. It looks as if this debate would last all day. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we can have a vote now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let us have a vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will give way if a vote can be taken; but I will not give way to any more talking.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we can have a vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will give way for a vote.

Mr. HOWE. I am not sure that we can have a vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I would rather go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw his motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to debate this subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unless we act upon the resolution we shall have to adjourn at four o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; I understand it is reconsidered.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it is not reconsidered. The motion to reconsider has not been taken up. This is a separate resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My motion is to postpone the time, and unless we do so we must adjourn at four o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. With that understanding, I shall oppose the motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw his motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We must act upon this subject and settle it now, and I hope my friend will withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise not to discuss this question at all, but simply to state to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Committee on Finance have in their hands now a large number of nominations, and it will be utterly impossible for us to do justice to ourselves and adjourn this evening at four o'clock, and some action ought to be had on this resolution. We must postpone the time. I am anxious for the adjournment; I have voted with the Senator from Rhode Island at all times for an early adjournment, and I am now in favor of fixing the earliest practicable moment; but as a friend of an early adjournment I cannot consent that the Senate should adjourn this evening. We shall do injustice to ourselves, and much responsibility will attach to us, if we adjourn this evening. The most important offices are yet unfilled—all the offices of Philadelphia. The collection of the customs cannot now be had in the interim if we adjourn at four o'clock, and it is an utter impossibility to have them filled before that time. I beg the Senator from Rhode Island to take this matter into consideration. If Senators persist in discussing this subject let them do so until four o'clock, and let the responsibility rest upon them.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, let us have a vote, then.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rose for the purpose of insisting that we shall not go into executive session.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, sir, I withdraw the motion if Senators desire it. I hope we shall have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for an executive session is withdrawn. The question is on reconsidering the vote on the amendment by which Thursday was fixed for the day of adjournment.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will withdraw that motion, for I state to him also that it is impossible for us to get through before Thursday.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then we can postpone the adjournment again to-morrow.

Mr. HENDERSON. We shall have to postpone it again, and have this same discussion over again.

Mr. ANTHONY. We shall have this same discussion upon something else. We cannot move to have an executive session, but a talk about every State in the Union is paraded out before us.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion to reconsider, and I state the fact, that it is utterly impossible—I know it as a member of the Committee on Finance—for us to adjourn to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will do anything in the world if Senators will only stop talking; but if this debate is to go on I would rather it should go on upon my motion to reconsider, which I desire to prevail.

Several SENATORS. Withdraw it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will withdraw it, but if there is any debate I will renew it.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator insists on my stopping this discussion I will simply state to him that I have not debated this subject of adjournment at all, though it has been frequently up here. I have kept my tongue on the subject. But the Senator from Rhode Island, with whom I have voted at all times, takes occasion every morning to bring up this discussion, makes some sort of a motion that keeps the Senate in a ferment for three or four hours—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is right; the Senator from Rhode Island has done one good thing. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. HOWE. How is it amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as it stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the time fixed by the resolution of the 12th instant for closing the present session of the Senate, by an adjournment sine die, be extended to the hour of four o'clock p. m. on Thursday, the 18th of April.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after four hours spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

40TH CONG. 1ST SESS.—No. 54.

WEDNESDAY, April 17, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 13th instant, a report from the Secretary of State as to when Alexander Cummings was appointed Governor of Colorado Territory, and how much of the time he had been absent from the Territory; which, on motion of Mr. THAYER, was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, reports from the heads of the several Executive Departments in regard to any official opinions which may have been given by the Attorney General, the Solicitor of the Treasury, or any other officer of the Government, on the interpretation of the act of Congress regulating the tenure of office, and especially with regard to appointments by the President during the recess of Congress; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, and ask that it lie on the table:

Resolved, That the time fixed for closing the present session of the Senate be further extended to four o'clock on Friday, the 19th instant, and that the President pro tempore do at that hour adjourn the Senate without day.

Mr. SUMNER. I would move that that be amended to Saturday.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not proposed to act on the resolution now. We can take it up to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; but I think we had better make it Saturday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie upon the table.

RULES AND ORDERS IN BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate two thousand copies of the rules and general orders in bankruptcy, together with the forms of proceeding therein prescribed by the justices of the Supreme Court under the tenth section of the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, and one thousand copies for the use of the Supreme Court.

This resolution comes from the Committee on Printing, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I laid on the table the other day a resolution providing for a committee to revise the rules of the Senate. It may be as well perhaps to have that taken up and acted on now.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed to revise the rules of the Senate, and to report thereon early in the next session.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very glad that such a resolution is about to be adopted by the Senate, for I presume it will be adopted; but I wish to make a suggestion of one amendment which I hope will be made in the rules, and that is, the ancient, time-honored habit, which is still kept up here, and also in my own State, but I believe in no other legislative body on this continent, of enrolling our bills at the last stage on parchment. This habit causes unnecessary delay and considerable additional expense. Now, that we have an official printed copy of the statutes immediately after every session, I think that is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That should be a joint rule. It would require joint action.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator is right; it would require joint action I admit, but I think this committee possibly might initiate some proceeding to that end. However, I content myself now with throwing out the idea, and if this committee should not undertake it, I give notice that at the next session I shall take such steps as I can to bring about that change. I think that we have suffered under the burden of that habit long enough. It exists in Massachusetts, and on inquiry I find that it does not exist in any other State of the Union. Proceedings in all the other States, as they are in the Legislative Chambers of France and of all the continent of Europe, are on paper. In Massachusetts and in Congress they are on parchment at the last stage.

Mr. ANTHONY. I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. I think I obtained the information from a very instructive speech that the Senator himself made on this subject, that in Great Britain it is customary to have the official rolls printed, which is certainly much better than to have them written; they are much less liable to mistake; and that a certain number of copies, about twelve I believe, are signed and are put upon parchment; and I think those are distributed in different places and filed. Each one is an official copy.

The resolution was adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall this committee be appointed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. By the Chair; and I hope the Chair will not appoint me upon the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. POMEROY, and Mr. EDMUNDS the committee.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I notice in the report of the Associated Press of the proceedings of yesterday that I am made to say precisely what I did not say, and that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] is made to answer what I did not say. The Associated Press report reads in this way:

"Mr. CHANDLER remarked that certain Senators said, a few days ago, they were willing to give notice to the President that if he sent in Copperheads and traitors they would vote to confirm them."

Now, in order that there may be no misapprehension about this, I will ask Mr. Murphy to read from the original notes precisely what I did say to the Senate.

Mr. J. J. Murphy read from the original notes of Mr. D. F. Murphy, as follows:

"Mr. CHANDLER. I think we are a little at fault in this matter, Mr. President. Certain Senators on this side of the House proclaimed a few days ago that they were determined that these offices should be filled. Of course that was giving Mr. Johnson notice that he might continue to send in Copperheads and traitors, and that they would vote for them. To correct that misapprehension on his part, I am willing to give him one day's notice that Copperheads and traitors will not be confirmed, and that if he sends in loyal men they will be."

Mr. CHANDLER. That is all. It will be seen that that is entirely different from what appears in the Associated Press report. I simply wish to have it corrected.

AGRICULTURAL BUREAU.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas the agricultural interests of the country are of paramount importance, and the bureau for the promotion of that interest is much less efficient than is required: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be requested to report to the Senate, in December next, what means should be adopted to render the said bureau more efficient and useful, and whether the salary affixed to the office of Commissioner of Agriculture should not be increased so as to secure for that position the services of one thoroughly learned and accomplished in all that relates to that Department; and whether there should not be created the office of assistant commissioner of agriculture, to be filled by one distinguished for his ability as a practical agriculturist, and to whom might be committed the superintendence of experimental grounds at Washington.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. TIPTON. I am not certain what our province is with regard to any question of legislation that may come before this executive session. I take it for granted that whatever we might do independent of the House, if the House were here in session, we may do in this executive session; but I am not quite clear that we have any power, or ought to take any cognizance of any question which has necessarily to be thrown forward and acted upon, if ever acted upon efficiently, in conjunction with the House of Representatives when in session; and having a doubt as to the legitimacy of this matter to be acted upon at present, I simply raise that question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This is a mere resolution referring to the Committee on Agriculture the consideration of this subject, to report at the next session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear the resolution read. It assumes a state of things that may not be exactly correct.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The resolution seems to be based upon the idea that without an increase of salary it is impossible to get any one to hold the office of Commissioner of Agriculture. I know of no such difficulty in the country. I have never known of the office being tendered to any one who would not accept it on account of the salary. So far as I know, there has been no difficulty or complaint in that respect. I was not aware that there was any difficulty in that respect. The difficulty seems to be in another direction, that when men are selected for the office the Senate is not disposed to confirm them. I agree to the importance of the Agricultural Department of the Government, and that it ought to be in good hands; but I see no necessity for increasing the salary, and particularly when I have not understood that there was any difficulty in procuring persons to fill the office on account of the salary. I have no objection to the resolution, only I did not wish that impression to go out, that there was any trouble in finding persons to take the office in consequence of the salary.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the latter part of the resolution will not be adopted. I am perfectly willing that the Committee on Agriculture shall be charged with the duty of collecting information on the subject; but I think this is no time to talk about increase of salary. My own judgment is, and I think that is the opinion of the whole committee, that when we find a man equal to a high salary we will pay it to him. We want to get a good man first before we increase the pay. For such men as we have had, and who have been offering, the salary is abundant, in my judgment. I want to collect all the information I can as chairman of that committee, and I think the whole committee feel with me on that subject. Therefore I move that all except the first paragraph of the resolution be stricken out.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The resolution does not assume that a higher salary is necessary. It refers the subject to the Committee on Agriculture to say whether it is not necessary. My own opinion is that the present salary is altogether inadequate to enable us to procure such a Commissioner as this country ought to have, a man learned in that Department, one qualified to have correspondence with the various countries of the world, and to bring to this country the learning of those countries. I do not think that for $3,000 any such person can be procured. But the resolution merely refers the subject to the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. What is the present salary?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Three thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended by him.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the agricultural interests of the country are of paramount importance, and the bureau for the promotion of that interest is much less efficient than is required: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be requested to report to the Senate, in December next, what means should be adopted to render the said bureau more efficient and useful, and whether there should not be created the office of assistant commissioner of agriculture, to be filled by one distinguished for his ability as a practical agriculturist, and to whom might be committed the superintendence of experimental grounds at Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest to my friend from New Jersey that a clause in that resolution seems, what I know he did not intend to be, a slur upon the present incumbent of the office, and I would suggest that that be left out. The words are: "and the bureau for the promotion of that interest is much less efficient than is required." It is not necessary to put those words in.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. YATES. This resolution comes from that side of the Senate, I believe, who advocated or voted for retaining the present incumbent in office. These gentlemen, if I understand them, want an educated man; they want a man who is qualified to discharge the duties of this office; and they are like my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who voted persistently yesterday for a man who does not understand orthography, syntax, or prosody.

Mr. HARLAN. I call the Senator to order. I do not think the Senator has a right to disclose in open session what takes place in executive session.

Mr. YATES. I ask the Senator's pardon; but these debates, I believe, have been in open session.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. YATES. Then I ask the pardon of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I suppose it would not be proper to discuss the qualifications of the incumbent in open Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose there is not very much importance attached to this resolution. I suppose it does not mean anything; but if there is any importance attached to it, and if it is to be referred to a committee, it would be well enough to consider whether it is a fact that this interest is of paramount importance to every other interest. There are those engaged in manufactures, those engaged in commerce, and the other interests of the country. Agriculture is one of the great interests of the country. Whether it overtops and overleaps every other is rather doubtful.

But the Senator from Illinois refers often, and again this morning, to this side of the Chamber, as if there was something on this side of the Chamber that was not right. I never understand these allusions. They are often made by gentlemen who occupy the other side of the Chamber, as if this side of the Chamber was not voting right. I think this side of the Chamber votes quite frequently with the other side. This drawing a distinction between one side of the Chamber and the other I never could understand. We usually vote together on questions affecting the interests of the country.

Mr. DAVIS. If my friend will permit me, I think it is the general understanding that he is constructively on the other side of the Chamber. [Laughter.]

Mr. POMEROY. If it is only by construction I can stand it; but I judged that I was actually on this side of the Chamber, because I have always had a seat here. But we are constantly hearing about this side of the Chamber, and I really hope that we shall not hear much more of it, for I think this side of the Chamber votes with the other side very frequently. I believe this resolution is of no importance. It ought to lie upon the table or be indefinitely postponed. I do not think there is anything in it.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 18, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after a pause.) As there seems to be no legislative business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now move to take up the resolution that I offered yesterday, providing for an extension of the session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the time fixed for closing the present session of the Senate be further extended to four o'clock on Friday, the 19th instant, and that the President pro tempore do at that hour adjourn the Senate without day.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend the resolution by inserting Saturday.

Mr. CHANDLER and others. Oh, no.

Mr. SUMNER. Senators say, "Oh, no;" I say, Oh, yes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have the impression that the adjournment might as well be put off to Saturday, because if we get through with the business to-morrow, as we ought or may, we can adjourn then without any difficulty, and it will save the necessity of putting a new motion on the table to-day, which must be done one day beforehand in order to extend the time to Saturday. Therefore, I think it may just as well be done at once to save trouble. It will not lead to any further extension of the session, unless it becomes necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to say but one word, and that is, to express the hope that the Senate will not extend the time at all. I think we have played this thing long enough, extending the session from one day to another and two days at a time. For one I shall vote against any extension of the time, either until to-morrow or the next day. We may just as well close this session at four o'clock to-day as close it a week hence, in my judgment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are several very important nominations on the table now that have not been disposed of, and which will probably lead to debate, besides other questions, and it must be seen that we cannot get through by four o'clock to-day. We cannot even dispose of the business on the table by four o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, to strike out "Friday, the 19th instant," and insert "Saturday, the 20th instant."

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, and Sumner—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Drake, Ferry, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Conness, Corbett, Edmunds, Grimes, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Norton, Ross, Sainsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted—ayes nineteen, noes not counted.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 19, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING OF THE RULES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the resolution of the 6th instant, directing the printing of five hundred copies of the rules of the Senate with the Constitution and Manual, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded, and that there be printed two hundred and fifty copies of the rules for the use of the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest, if the rules are to be in any way amended or changed, whether that ought not to be done before we make an order to print them.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the object of the resolution. There was a resolution passed on the 6th instant ordering the printing of an edition of the Rules and Manual. This resolution rescinds that, strikes out the Manual altogether, and reduces the number of copies of the rules to be printed to two hundred and fifty. There are none now extant. It is thought so important a matter as revising the rules of the Senate would hardly be concluded and agreed upon by the Senate until some time in the course of the next session, and it would be very desirable to have some copies of the rules, especially when considering the report that may be brought in as to the old rules. This reduces the number and strikes out the Manual.

Mr. POMEROY. I supposed every Senator had one copy of the rules at least.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. There are no copies of the rules as they are now, because they have been amended in very important respects since the last edition was printed.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to printing two hundred and fifty of them.

The resolution was adopted.

REPORT ON INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate two thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Interior in response to the resolution of the Senate asking information in reference to the several Indian tribes of the United States, and that there be printed for the use of the said Department five hundred extra copies thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This resolution, under the rule, goes to the Committee on Printing.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of two members, be appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate has passed a resolution to close the present session by an adjournment on Saturday at four o'clock p. m.; and that unless he may have some further communication to make the Senate will, at the time named, adjourn without day.

Ordered, That the committee be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. JOHNSON.

Subsequently Mr. ANTHONY, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President and inform him that the Senate will, in pursuance of its resolution of the 18th instant, on to-morrow at four o'clock adjourn without day unless he may at that time have some further communication to make, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them; that the President had requested them to inform the Senate that he would to-day make some further executive communications, but that at present he knew no reason why the Senate should not adjourn at the time fixed by its resolution of the 18th instant.

RECESS.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, it was Ordered, That the Senate take a recess to-day from five o'clock until seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business. At five o'clock the doors were reopened, and the Senate took a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven and a half o'clock p. m.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business. At ten o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m. the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 20, 1867.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT ON INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Interior in reference to the several Indian tribes of the United States, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate two thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Interior in response to the resolution of the Senate asking information in reference to the several Indian tribes, and that there be printed for the use of the said Department five hundred extra copies thereof.

The resolution was adopted.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Resolved, That the time fixed for the adjournment of the present session of the Senate sine die be extended until five o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

MEDIATION IN MEXICO.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Resolution proposing the good offices of the United States between the contending parties of Mexico.

Whereas the republic of Mexico, though relieved from the presence of a foreign enemy by the final withdrawal of the French troops, continues to be convulsed by a bloody civil war, in which Mexicans are ranged on opposite sides; and whereas the United States are bound by neighborhood and republican sympathies to do all in their power for the welfare of the Mexican people, and this obligation becomes more urgent from the present condition of affairs, where each party is embittered by protracted conflict: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That it is proper for the Government of the United States, acting in the interest of humanity and civilization, to tender its good offices by way of mediation between the contending parties of the republic of Mexico, in order to avert a deplorable civil war, and to obtain the establishment of republican government on a foundation of peace and security.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution, intended to be proposed by him as a substitute for the resolution offered by Mr. SUMNER; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That in case Maximilian shall at an early day see fit to abdicate his authority in Mexico, and shall signify a desire to withdraw himself and his foreign troops from the country, to the end that civil war may be at once terminated, the Senate would be gratified that the President would tender the good offices of our Government to secure at the hands of the republican government of Mexico for the native followers of Maximilian such kind and humane treatment as characterizes the conduct of civilized warfare.

MEDIATION BETWEEN FRANCE AND PRUSSIA.

Mr. COLE submitted the following resolution:

Whereas a misunderstanding exists between Prussia and France, springing out of the ownership of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, and war between those Powers is imminent: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Government of the United States be requested to offer its friendly mediation to the end that the effusion of blood may be avoided.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was

Resolved, That the time fixed for the adjournment of the present session of the Senate sine die be further extended until nine o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business. At five o'clock the doors were reopened, and, on motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the Senate took a recess until eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at eight o'clock p. m., and resumed the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

MEDIATION IN MEXICO.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolutions; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

Whereas during the civil war in Mexico the Government of the United States, acting in pursuance of its long and firmly established policy, has refused in any way to acknowledge the imperial government, of which the Archduke Maximilian was the head, but, on the contrary, continued to recognize the republican government of that country as the only legitimate government, and by this conduct has done much to frustrate the attempt of Maximilian and his supporters to overthrow such government, it is the opinion of the Senate that the Government of the United States should adopt every proper measure to avert the unnecessary further effusion of blood, and to restore at the earliest moment peace to that now distracted land; Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to offer to the contending parties the friendly mediation of the United States, so as to bring the civil war to a termination on terms honorable to both, and to secure to the native followers of Maximilian, and all foreign citizens and subjects residing in that country, the benefit of the laws of civilized warfare; it being understood, however, that such mediation is tendered with the understanding that Maximilian shall abdicate his assumed authority, and that he and his foreign troops shall leave the country at the earliest practicable day.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business. The hour of nine o'clock having arrived,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, in pursuance of the resolution of the 18th instant, declared the Senate adjourned sine die.

Reconstruction—Mr. Burr.

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction.

REMARKS OF HON. ALBERT G. BURR,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 9, 1867,

On the bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

Mr. BURR. Mr. Speaker, when the bill to which the one now pending is a supplemental amendment was before the House debate was prevented by the previous question, and now all amendments are cut off by the same rule, though as a matter of gracious permission we have brief opportunity to give our views on the amendatory act pending and assign reasons controlling our votes on its passage. I am, sir, opposed to the bill now before us, as I was to the two bills preceding it on the same subject. Sir, the country was justly alarmed when by solemn vote the Congress declared ten States out of the Union, their municipal organizations subverted, and their inhabitants denied representation in this body. And when by further vote the Congress declared that the people of those ten former States should be denied self-government and held subject to the military law as expounded and enforced by district commanders, without limitation on the one hand or the right of appeal on the other, the alarm of the people was largely mingled with indignation at the legislative usurpation that dared strike at American freedom in the person of even the humblest American citizen. These acts were passed before the recess, in March, and as an illustration of what I meant by public alarm and indignation being aroused by it, let me ask your attention to the elections immediately succeeding. In the State of Connecticut a defection from the dominant party occurred sufficient to change it from the control of Radicals and place its State interests in the hands of Democrats, as also to displace three Republican members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress and fill their places with Democratic Representatives in this Fortieth Congress. In further answer to your radical legislation Kentucky, by her recent election of members to this Congress, condemns in every district the mad fanaticism controlling the party in power. In my own proud Illinois, at an election held in June in one of the three grand divisions of the State for member of our supreme court, in a district giving my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] last fall several thousand majority, the Radicals seeming to rely on that majority for party success, made party nominations for judge and clerk, and the people ignored both by a majority of about five thousand. Why these reverses? It is, sir, because you are presuming, in a part of our jurisdiction, to subvert civil government and substitute in its stead an unlimited military despotism; and the people read danger in the record you are making, and will, I trust, in time avoid the danger by suppressing its authors. Monstrous as was the legislation to which I have referred, violating not only the spirit but the very letter of the Constitution, you are not content, but now propose still more obnoxious provisions in the same direction, under pretense of defining or explaining the latent or concealed meaning of the original measure. And according to the terms of the bill now pending what was the meaning or intent of the bill to which this is an amendment? The very first clause in this bill declares it "to have been the true intent and meaning" of the two bills of March 2 and 23, "that the governments then existing in the rebel States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas were 'illegal and void.'"

Now, sir, so far from its being true that those two acts, respectively, of March 2 and 23 considered those governments as "illegal and void," they directly and in terms recognized and sanctioned their existence. You, sir, of the majority were not then ready to do even from policy what you now dare to do from a pressing political necessity. You were not ready to declare in direct terms that no government should exist south of a given point except that of a dictator, nor dared you then proclaim that all law in that region should emanate from the unbridled will of one man, and that man a stranger to the people whom he is sent to govern. But as it seems you are now ready to take the full measure of responsibility, let us fully understand what is now embraced in the act before us, in order that its "true intent and meaning" may not remain concealed until still later legislation shall bring its beauty to the light.

It overthrows all the State governments in ten States, and declares illegal all the municipal organizations within those States, and places the people of that portion of the Union embraced in those ten States completely under the control, or in the language of the bill itself, "subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts."

It authorizes these "military commanders" to fill, by appointment, absolute and without responsibility to others, all the positions of honor, trust, or profit necessary to the enactment, interpretation, and enforcement of law. It enables them to create new offices at will, filling them with chosen favorites, and authorizes them to exact from the defenseless inhabitants the same slavish obedience to such irresponsible deputies as to themselves.

It authorizes these same "military commanders" to "prohibit, suspend, or set aside" any act or proceeding, whether of a legislative or judicial character, which may be to themselves distasteful, whether the public welfare be involved in such proceeding or not, thereby enabling them to review and reverse all laws, whether statutory or otherwise, regulating personal liberty, inheritances, marriage, and rights of every conceivable nature.

It makes the "boards of registration" acting under their direction sole and exclusive judges of the qualifications of voters; and provides that "said boards of registration shall not be bound or governed in their action by any opinion of any officer of the United States Government."

It deprives even the United States courts of the right to inquire by legal proceeding into the regularity of official action of any commander or any officer or person acting by his authority.

It makes the position of such commander a life office, by providing that, except with the prior advice and consent of the Senate, no commander shall be removed "unless by sentence of court-martial he shall be cashiered or dismissed from the Army, or unless he shall consent to be so relieved."

All these privileges and this vast and alarming amount of absolute and irresponsible power is vested in the military commanders during a time of profound peace, when our flag floats without obstruction over every foot of our public domain, and when writs of courts can be served and will be obeyed with equal promptness in Florida as in Ohio, and in Texas with much more alacrity than formerly they were obeyed in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Why, then, this usurpation of power and this vast military establishment at a cost of millions of money, wrung from the hard earnings of the people? Is it the exercise of a "just power," "derived from the consent of the governed?" No; for they protest against its exercise and adjure you by the ties of a common humanity to forbear in your tyrannical conduct. Is it to preserve peace? No; for the peace is not threatened by them; and we have high radical authority for saying that they are not only a thoroughly conquered, but abjectly and slavishly helpless people. What, then, is the purpose of this legislation creating standing armies and making the military superior to the civil power—or rather making the military the only power—in one third of the Union? Is it because rebellion once existed there? Have you not laws already in force to punish crimes against the Government? If these laws be enforced and these burdens be placed on the people because of their treason and as a punishment for their rebellion, then they are ex post facto, and therefore unconstitutional.

Not, therefore, as a safeguard to peace nor as a punishment for crime are these laws passed and the grievous burden of taxation imposed on the people, but for a purpose very different from either. Your real design is to make these laws supplemental and auxiliary to the Freed-men's Bureau, and, as a system, sufficiently powerful to control southern political action; and all this at public expense, for the mere advantage of the party in power. It must be true that some political wiseacre, holding fellowship in the dominant party and influential in its councils, has discerned the handwriting on the wall giving notice that the people of the States not heretofore engaged in the rebellion have weighed the party in the scales of justice and found it wanting. It must be that the hope of electing a Radical President next year by northern votes is becoming "small by degrees and beautifully less" to certain ambitious spirits in the party, and hence the effort to radicalize the South by governmental machinery, moved by Government bayonets and directed by uncontrolled dictators. It is an attempt to force the negroes of South Carolina to supply, in the next Electoral College, the lack existing by reason of the defection of Connecticut, and to prepare the reconstructed rebels who adopt the tenets of radicalism in Virginia, North Carolina, and other southern States to make up the deficiency caused by the anticipated political revolution now pending in New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, and other northern States. This is, I imagine, the true answer to the question, and to sustain my theory I refer to a fact known to all. When any southern, formerly a rebel, yields to the "powers that be" and advises the people South to be obedient to law, and to struggle with the same devotion to upbuild the Union as they once did to destroy it, such southron is simply a rebel still, and has no rights which a loyalist is bound to respect; but when some other former rebel advises his friends, in chosen language, to "accept the situation" and coöperate with congressional missionaries in establishing Radical political organizations in the South, presto change! how great the difference! his "red hand" is cleansed and his "black heart" purified by the faith that is in—Wendell Phillips and the irrepressible negro. The one surrenders his flag and lays his sword down and is kicked for his surrender; the other surrenders his self-respect and lays down his manhood and becomes the pet of the Radical party. Now, while I have no objection to any zealous electioneering or earnest proselyting on the part of any organization, I protest against this stupendous system of tyranny, usurpation, and fraud at the expense of labor and industry, for the mere sake of building up a political organization for the benefit of the few.

And by the way, Mr. Speaker, if you will on this bill enforce the rule which prohibits gentlemen from voting on any subject in which they have a personal interest we few Democrats can defeat this measure; for when we omit the votes of all the presidential aspirants on the other side of the Hall it will leave us with a majority of votes in the body.

I need not assume the easy task of showing that this bill is in violation of the Constitution, for no gentleman on this floor presumes to support it on the ground of its constitutionality. Indeed, I believe the theory underlying all this sectional legislation is that those people by rebellion suspended the Constitution, and that as to them it has ever since remained in abeyance; in other words, that they are not entitled in any respect to the guarantees of the Constitution. Why, sir, we on this side of the House are charged with opposing this bill and all kindred measures from the prompting alone of sympathy with treason. But, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen will ascertain to their cost and confusion that such legislation as this affects others than quondam rebels and loyal blacks. Gentlemen will be forced to acknowledge in time that disregard of the Constitution will be remembered and punished by the mass of American citizens as an innovation upon the rights of each citizen in the Republic.

"In nature's chain, whatever link you strike—Tenth or ten thousandth—breaks the chain alike."

And in our grand but simple system of government, whoever aims a blow at the Constitution in any of its provisions is leveling the same blow at the liberty of every citizen whose shield and protection that Constitution is.

Your proposed action, coupled with what you have already accomplished, is a deliberate and fearful blow at the laboring classes of the country. You have already, by shameless class-legislation, exempted the wealth of the country from taxation for its support, and devolved increased and continually increasing burdens of taxation on the laborer and producer, who has no hoarded bonds free from taxes as have his wealthy neighbors. This grievous burden will rest mainly on the citizens of the northern States; and their enterprise, industry, and skill will pay tribute to your party through the operation of your partial and unequal laws. And, as if to make the burden still greater, you now aim in the very wantonness of unchecked power to crush out all industry in the South and thus leave, not part, but all the burden to be borne by the labor of the North; and, sir, let me say that however willingly and uncomplainingly our people might consent to unusual taxation to support the Government in time of war, they will not as a mass submit to pay compulsory tribute to a political party in time of peace, especially, sir, when from the very nature of your measures there is no prospect of relief at your hands or of remedy by your consent. True, the act creating the Freedmen's Bureau will expire by limitation; not so, however, the provisions of the "civil rights bill;" not so the provisions of the series of military bills, in which series we have reached the third in a period of four short months. These several acts provide for the perpetuation of the machinery created by them without limitation of time.

Nor do you give assurance of any definite relief to an overtaxed people when you say these laws will cease to burden the people North whenever the people South shall have been fully reconstructed. When, sir, will that be? Not when they cease fighting; for the war ceased more than two years ago, yet your military bills are of recent date. Not when they surrender the dogma of secession; for they have long since denounced it as a heresy, and even the boldest and most spirited among them speak of it as a "lost cause." Not when they shall send Representatives to your Congress as invited by Mr. Lincoln and required by General Grant, for such Representatives have for two years been knocking in vain for admission to this Hall. When, then, will you cease this taxation of our people under plea of reconstructing the South? Not, sir, until, as the result of party legislation, you shall have disfranchised a sufficient number of whites and placed the ballot in a sufficient number of black hands South to insure there a political indorsement of the very radicalism which is now overriding the Constitution and setting all law at defiance.

Persuaded that this is the programme, and that you of the dominant party have predetermined to carry it out in strict severity, I say to you, go on in your wild fanaticism; proselyte with the bayonet; persuade through the potent voice of "commanders;" give efficiency to party decrees in general orders; tear down with impious hands the fabric of your fathers, and rear in its stead the dwarfed and ungainly structure which will result from your labors of reconstruction; and when you imagine your labor completed and your edifice finished, you will find it is but a modern "Tower of Babel," which will cause your discomfiture, overthrow, and dispersion as a party. Ultimately your bayonets will be without power, your persuasions without efficiency, your decrees without potency, your labors without successful result. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war," and while you are proselyting in the South through a compulsory political missionary system, the people of the North, remembering the lessons of the past, will rally in their might and sweep you from place and power. In contemplating your burdensome and tyrannical conduct and seeking a remedy for the wrongs by which they are oppressed they will in deep earnestness, and that right speedily, adopt the sentiment as against your bayonet taxation:

"There is a weapon surer yet,
And firmer than the bayonet—
A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flake does upon the sod,
And executes the freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God."

That weapon, Mr. Speaker, is the ballot, and by its silent yet peaceful operation the people of the North will disenthral and redeem the country, while you with the bayonet are laboring to enslave and impoverish the country. In the plenitude of your present power you are exhibiting all the indications of political madness, and there is consolation in the assurance that "whom the gods intend to destroy they first make mad."

REMARKS OF HON. J. L. GETZ,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 9, 1867,

On the bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

Mr. GETZ. Mr. Speaker, the "true intent and meaning" of this act and the acts to which it is a supplement are, if I understand them aright, to abolish every vestige of civil government at the South; to sweep away even their fundamental laws or constitutions, without which no State claiming to be republican can exist. Their "true intent and meaning" are to place a people, who, whatever may have been their past offenses, are at this hour as obedient to law as the people of any portion of this land, under an absolute military dominion. Their "true intent and meaning" are to deprive the President of his constitutional authority over ten States which, whether in or out of the Union, are at least territorially within its bounds, and therefore equally entitled to the protection and subject to the rule of the executive head of the Federal Government. Their "true intent and meaning" is to rob the President of his constitutional power as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, and make his subordinate officers, creatures who hold their appointments under him, his superiors in all things pertaining to their present positions, with the arbitrary right to defy his authority and disobey his orders at their own irresponsible will and pleasure. If, sir, these be the objects of the acts to which I refer, then indeed is Congress establishing a dangerous precedent, which, sooner or later, may return to plague the inventors. If these be their objects, then was the unanimous declaration of Congress at the memorable session of July, 1861, that—

"This war is not waged on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired."

Then, sir, I say this solemn declaration has become a monstrous lie; then, sir, are the repeated proclamations of the then President and the numerous pledges given to the country by the Republican press and Republican leaders during the war, speaking here and elsewhere, utterly falsified.

History gives us numerous examples of the unerring truth of Holy Writ, when it prophetically pronounces that "They who sow the wind shall reap the whirlwind." I would that any feeble words of mine could induce the majority upon this floor to pause and consider the portent of these inspired words before they heedlessly, and may I not say sacrilegiously, rush into their violation. I know full well that this and similar acts of legislation, to strip the President of the high prerogatives of his office are intended to be but temporary in their operation; that they are directed rather against Andrew Johnson the man than against Andrew Johnson the President of the United States. I know well enough that as soon as you shall have elected, as you hope to do, a President after your own choice, you will hasten to repeal these acts of usurpation even more speedily than you have enacted them. But is it not possible, nay, probable, that when that time shall have come you may not possess the power to undo your present work? You cannot always expect to retain your absolute control of both branches of Congress. Even now it is beginning to give way, and the time may come much sooner than you are prepared for it, when the people in their sovereign power will drive many of you from the seats you now hold, and fill your places with men of different political views, clothed with the authority which an outraged constituency has a right to give them, to commend the poisoned chalice to your own lips, and compel you to drink the draught. God forbid, sir, that any party that may hereafter gain the ascendancy in the Congress of the United States should follow the revolutionary example which is now being set. But should that ever be, gentlemen upon the other side may have to remember, in sorrow and in anguish, that the immutable laws of nature and of nature's God have decreed—"As ye sow, so shall ye reap."

I am aware, sir, that the fiat has gone forth. This iniquitous bill is to pass—it is to become a law, so far as the action of Congress can give it validity. To say more would be but to beat the empty air. Thankful, therefore, for the privilege that has been granted me of uttering these few words of protest, and for the right which the Constitution has guaranteed to me of recording my vote against the bill now pending, I resume my seat.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. CHANLER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 8, 1867,

On the bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed on the 2d day of March, 1867, and the act supplementary thereto, passed on the 23d day of March, 1867.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I think every member of this House must at once admit the manifest propriety of a recommitment of this bill at this time. Ample opportunity should be afforded for its full and careful consideration. The history of the preceding measures of a like character, measures hurried through under the most stringent party pressure, and the consequences that flowed from our hasty legislation, ought to suffice for this body and the country that this bill ought to be recommitted, and, in my humble judgment, not only recommitted and postponed till to-morrow, but postponed indefinitely. A measure of such vital importance ought to have the fullest consideration and deliberation at our hands; nor should it even be allowed, in my judgment, to pass this House except under pressure of the weightiest demands for the public safety, in view of an array of facts as strong as Holy Writ; but debate and deliberation, and a calm, reliable statement of facts upon such an important measure as this seems to be the last of all considerations that occur to committees reporting such bills to the House. Nor has any authorized report or proper demand for this supplementary bill been filed upon the Journal, laid before the House, or submitted to our consideration at this time by the committee reporting this supplementary bill. Sir, the whole country is now reaping the bitter fruit of your haste heretofore. Nor is this the only harvest which the aged chairman of the committee has sown for posterity to reap. He is passing away, having accomplished, it may be, an act of vengeance; it may be, the gratification of personal hatred; it may be, a great philanthropic measure. Time alone will prove it, and in the future will his name stand recorded with these measures and their results. I know he courts the condemnation and reprobation of those who differ from him, and he professes to look to the future for his reward. There let him seek it.

But, sir, there are others interested in this measure who are not here to speak, and whose future is locked up in the results of the present action of Congress. I refer to the youth of the South. I do not allude to those who have passed through the rebellion, taking an active part against this Government, and stand to-day as criminals before the law as participators in the rebellion, but of the youth who took no voluntary part against the Union. Such a measure as this materially affects every young man who may present himself at the ballot-box. It renders him liable, without any contamination resting upon him, to pass through the ordeal which this bill creates, without trial, on mere parol evidence, before no jury, but at the will of a military subordinate, hired to act as an inquisitor, and upon mere suspicion he can be disfranchised, and there is no appeal. That, sir, is the refinement of legislative cruelty. There is no argument upon which this measure can be based which will extenuate the results which will be inflicted upon that portion of the southern community. If the right to vote be an inalienable right, as claimed by the majority of Congress, this depriving a citizen of that right and branding him as a criminal without any wrong fully proved is treason against our laws and against the rights of man. It will not affect alone those born on southern soil, but those who may migrate to the South. It affects alike the black, whom the majority here pretend to seek to protect, and the white, both native and naturalized. In that point of view I declare this measure hasty and unwise, unnecessary and unjust.

But, sir, the object of this bill is professedly for reconstruction, for the reorganization of southern society and the reestablishment of the Union. Sir, I believe that when this Government has to seek for its safety in the passage of such measures as this its liberty is dead and its existence in jeopardy. For a military commander, created under a past special necessity, to be allowed by a measure such as this to hold within his grasp the rights and destinies of the people whom he may be sent to rule over is inconsistent with the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

I repeat, sir, the policy and laws passed by the majority of Congress are in spirit and effect tyrannical. They carry the brand of tyranny upon their front, and we recognize that brand, by the eye of experience, as the same which marked the laws of the Parliament of Great Britain, which drove these Colonies to the Declaration of Independence. Read that glorious document and sacred testament of the fathers of the Republic to all posterity. The record of the oppressive acts of Great Britain have a most startling and offensive likeness to the acts, general orders, and supplementary acts with which the people of the southern States are made to yield submission and obedience to our Government. We "have affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power." We "have dissolved representative houses repeatedly for opposing, with manly firmness, the invasions on the rights of the people." We "have erected a multitude of new offices, and sent 'thither' swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance." We "have quartered large bodies of armed troops among" them. We "have deprived them, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury." We have taken away their charters, abolishing their most valuable laws, and altering, fundamentally, the powers of their governments. We have suspended their own Legislatures, declaring ourselves invested with power to legislate for them in all cases whatsoever. We have excited domestic insurrection among them by inaugurating a war of races. Sir, we have done all these things against a portion of the American people, not in time of war, not when they were in rebellion against the United States, but in time of profound peace, after a series of glorious victories, when that people had laid down their arms and were literally prostrate at our feet, begging for bread and the right to live among us. We have not only enjoyed the glory of a complete triumph, but we have gloated on our victory with the cruelty of a tyrant. Such is useless tyranny; we have nothing to fear.

In a word, your policy, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it and read it in your acts and laws, is in direct hostility to the Bill of Rights; overrides the Constitution and makes void the whole scheme of representative government. Sir, you are seeking, not the restoration of this Union, not the reorganization of society, the revival of commerce, and reestablishment of law in the southern States, but you are seeking to secure a new constituency for the Republican party, to give a new life to your party organization, and to increase the power which you now hold over the conquered people of the South and over the whole Union; imitating the tyrant who sent his armed legions to oppress the Colonies in 1776. Sir, you are demonstrating your reckless disregard for the liberties of the people, whom you pretend to protect, by trampling on the fundamental principles of justice upon which those liberties were founded, and without which all claim to free government is a mockery and a snare. You are seeking to restore society; to restore society through men who are sent by political organizations for the purpose of preserving their party power here in Congress by crushing out free opinion and the right to vote among the people. Is this Congress the pivot of American society? Has it come to this, that the American Government issuing from this Capitol essays with armed hand to strike down those who dare to differ with the party in power here as to the proper person to represent a constituency in the American Congress?—ay! or in the humblest capacity in the State governments through a large portion of this Union? Will the society which you thus reconstruct be worthy of this labor of the American Congress, and will the States you thus restore be a fit home for the children of the freemen of the North, to say nothing of those whom you have disfranchised at the South?

Sir, it is the painful duty of the minority on this floor to raise the voice of perpetual complaint against this cold-hearted and reckless party legislation. It is painful, for it comes from those who, elected to meet you here in debate, are allowed no other right to protest except the right to resent your assaults and insinuations that we are arguing in defense of criminals and not for the protection of citizens. Sir, so long as an opportunity is given to the minority to maintain and defend the Constitution from misinterpretation by this majority, so long I, for one, deem it an honor to be classed in any category rather than that of those who pass such measures as this. I am proud of your denunciation, but still more proud of the privilege of opposing your usurpations of power and encroachment upon the rights of a free and brave people, irrespective of the section where they live or the errors they may have committed.

But you profess by this act to protect the sacred right of the ballot. You propose to give to the soldier the power to protect the citizen in carrying about him the armor of his franchise and the sacred weapon of the ballot, which the law gives him to protect himself with against tyrants of every grade, and above all against the military tyrant. How absurd! How inconsistent with personal independence is a law which in time of peace gives to the soldier the right to say to the citizen, "You shall or you shall not do so and so; you shall or shall not vote!" Examine the provisions of this supplementary bill; mark well the sweeping and limitless power of the military commander. Section by section it strikes at the most valued and sacred rights of a free man by robbing him of the only security the wisdom and cunning of statesmen and patriots have devised to protect the citizen from the proud oppressor and brutal soldier. Here all the inventions of tyranny are condensed in a scheme of treachery. The power of the people is betrayed into the hands of military despotism under the false plea of public safety, law, and peace. That, sir, seems to me to be the spirit of this bill. No plea of necessity has been or can be advanced. The only argument advanced by the majority, so far as I have been able to understand it, is that the lawful executive authority of the country differs with the Legislature in regard to the carrying out of a certain law; and in carrying out that law the Executive has exercised the powers vested in him by the Constitution, having during a recess of Congress consulted the proper legal authority allowed him by special act of Congress for this and similar purposes. And because of this difference between two branches of the Government the whole machinery of the military organization is brought to bear upon the citizens of this section of the country, and it is urged that it is for the protection of the ballot, that it is to protect the organization of society, that it is for the preservation of the Union. Sir, because two branches of the Government differ; because two branches of the dominant political party differ; because the Vice President, elected by your own votes, placed in the position he now holds by your suffrages, in carrying out the policy of your own party differs with you, instead of striking at him you strike a blow for political and partisan purposes at the votes of a whole section of this Union; you strike a cruel and tyrannical blow at the people.

When may we hope that this reconstruction will begin? Your action has been, step by step, by crooked and indirect paths, to crawl, crab-like, half backward, half sideways, over this whole subject, without advancing at all in the direction of reconstruction, but in fact steadily advancing to the grand central point of a centralized military despotism, the subordination of civil authority to military authority, the humiliation of the citizen, and the undue elevation of the military commander. That has been the practical working of all that you have presented on the subject of reconstruction. At first it was placed upon the ground of philanthropy toward the negro; but of late that distinguished citizen of your model Republic has rather given you the slip, and, according to the latest accounts, is setting up a kingdom for himself. If the reports we hear are true, and the press is reliable, along the coasts of Georgia and Florida a black King John has been reared as a magnificent tribute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and these negro citizens, endowed with the suffrage by his magnanimity, his genius, and his eloquence, turning away from republicanism, are rallying around a dusky chieftain from Africa, a descendant of the royal blood of Ashantee. They want none of your legislation. They repudiate the dominion of the chairman of the House Committee on Reconstruction. All they want is liberty in idleness, and the privilege of governing themselves in their own way and after the customs of their African ancestors. And you propose to reconstruct the continent of North America upon the suffrage of the African race! Yes, you do; there is the gist of the whole matter. That is the secret of your military laws. You propose, through your central political organization here, by all the political and personal influence you can bring to bear, to rule the South through the African vote. In the name of conscience, when will the people of this Union, who are panting for peace, and praying to God to send them peace, have peace under your operations? Why did not the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the other eloquent gentleman from the other end of the Capitol, who was in such hot haste to instruct the negro in his rights—why did they not leave this issue to the development of time? Why, soon after the recess of this Fortieth Congress, did those missionaries to their fellow-citizens of African descent rush to the southern States and commence to stupefy and confuse the negro mind with their speeches? The whole question had been set at rest as to negro suffrage. The white men at the South only wanted bread and rest from civil war. What organization is there, save their own and the divisions in it, powerful enough to disturb the country, or interfere with the reorganization of the southern States? There are not here to-day, in either House of Congress, representatives of the minority enough to agitate any political question which need give these worthy gentlemen one moment's apprehension. Your military commanders hold full and undisputed sway over every department south of the Potomac; all civil government is dead so far as a Republican decree in caucus can make it. Why, then, did these Congressmen become the unwelcome disturbers of the public peace when all were weary of the protracted strife of civil war?

Their only object seems to have been political agitation, agitation which shall last from this day forth until that meeting of the Electoral College which shall nominate a successor to the present President, and dispose of the power, patronage, and control of this Government for four years more. That is the truth as I firmly believe. It required no invasion of the South at this time by those worthy Congressmen to save the Union. The whole land was at peace; we were even adding new territory to our northwest boundary, through the skillful diplomacy of their own Secretary of State, one of the pioneers in their organization, without drawing the sword, and even using fewer flourishes of his brilliant and busy pen than at any previous period of this Administration. The Indian tribes and the contractors for whisky and fire-arms have raised some slight disturbance, it is true. But with this exception, the whole Union is at peace within itself; strong at home, respected abroad, with no enemy worthy of the name to threaten our people, except, perhaps, the restless demagogues who are continually rousing the bad passions of two hostile races by laws and speeches fatal to our domestic peace and public safety.

There is not a shadow of a reason for disturbing the South by such measures as this, unless to gratify the bitter rancor of past political associations or to satisfy the longings of a present wicked ambition. The new constituency thus created are ignorant enough, stupid enough, and may be made bloody-minded enough to follow the cry of anarchy where ever it is raised. Brought into being by you, they stand ready to do your bidding. Why, sir, when the illustrious statesmen of Massachusetts leave their acropolis to collect votes among the late slaves of the South, do they forget the standard of intelligence fixed there by law entitles a freeman to vote among their home constituencies? There the spelling-book and the Boston primer are the two books of modern salvation from all political sins. They cleanse the leper of his spots. To be ignorant of how to spell is to be unfit to associate with a Senator of Massachusetts in his own State; but in any southern State to be ignorant is virtue, and a claim to his respect, esteem, and eloquence. To be a citizen at the North, where white men claim the majority, accurate knowledge of grammar, reading, writing, and arithmetic are needed; but at the South, where the negro is to be master, one may talk mumbo jumbo and be accepted within the pale of your civilization as an equal and a voter, and he is better than a white man, according to the logic (provided always the negro vote your ticket at your dictation) of some gentlemen on this floor on the Administration side. If you can elect the coadjutor of the Massachusetts statesman and of the Pennsylvania statesman into the Halls of Congress through the ignorant constituency of freedmen, then it is all right; but when you come to measure the capacities of an intellectual constituency a man must read, write, and cipher, or he is damned forever politically.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. CHANLER. With great pleasure.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether a majority of the white people of the South are familiar with the primer and spelling-book; and whether the census of 1860 does not show that in Alabama there are more than thirty thousand, in North Carolina forty-seven thousand, and in Virginia seventy-four thousand free white adults who can neither read nor write; and whether those three States do not fairly represent the condition of the whole southern people?

Mr. CHANLER. They may; yet all those men vote. Therefore, that does not touch the issue. The gentleman undoubtedly knows as much as they, and they know as much as he. He is welcome to the constituency of northern Alabama, and he is welcome to the other constituencies that he mentions.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me one further question?

Mr. CHANLER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to inquire whether a colored man who was loyal to the flag, and who cannot read, is not likely to vote as judiciously as a white rebel unable to read, who fought against his country and its flag?

Mr. CHANLER. Yes, sir; when he votes for the gentleman from Pennsylvania. We all know that that is exactly the point. The gentleman intends that they shall vote "judiciously."

Mr. KELLEY. Still a third question, if the gentleman will permit me. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it is not within his knowledge, from universal report, that the colored people, children and adults, are crowding the schools in the South in order that they may learn to read the Constitution and the laws, while the mass of the white people of the South cannot be induced to enter those schools or others?

Mr. CHANLER. No, sir; I do not know it, nor does the gentleman know any such thing.

Mr. KELLEY. It is within my observation, and I have it by general report from the South.

Mr. CHANLER. Public rumor often lies, and may be right or may be wrong. The gentleman knows that perfectly well. I am speaking of the facts, and not what people may say.

Ho. of REPS.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman, I trust, will allow me a single instant further; for I do not desire to interrupt him without his consent. I do not appeal to public rumor. I appeal to the reports of all the organizations, benevolent, religious, or political, that have attempted to disseminate instruction in the South, to testify whether the colored people do not crowd the schools; while the whites, under the lead of demagogues, refuse to avail themselves of the facilities for education.

Mr. CHANLER. It may be or it may not be. Whether the gentleman has satisfied himself or not I do not know; that is with himself. What it has to do with the present question I cannot see. What I say is, that the South has the right to vote, and I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to accord that right to it as freely as he accords it to Pennsylvania. It is not my purpose, nor is it pertinent, to enter into any statistical comparison as to the intellectual capacity of the people in one section with the people in another section. It has, sir, nothing to do with the question before the House. I was pointing out the inconsistency of the Republican party in making mental capacity a test against the northern voters, when white men have the majority, ignoring that test when negroes are in a majority at the South. In legislating here we should make laws for the country that have equal force and extend equal justice to all its parts; and we have no more right to force the constituency of the South than we have to force the constituency of Massachusetts or New York. When Congress adopts a like standard for Massachusetts that is adopted for the South it will be time enough to enter into comparative statistics as to the intelligence of the northern and southern people.

Mr. KELLEY. I responded to the gentleman, and only interrupted him because he alluded to me. There is nothing in this bill, I believe, which provides for an educational standard. When he charged that a distinguished Senator and a member of this House had hastened to appeal to ignorant voters, I wanted to show him that if their appeals had been, as they were not, to the colored people alone, they had addressed that portion of the population which is striving to acquire intelligence, and not to those who are wholly indifferent to the value of education.

Mr. CHANLER. Very well, then; the gentleman from Pennsylvania has assumed the responsibility of settling that question, and I welcome him to all he has made by it.

Mr. Speaker, I say that by this bill the South is forced to act and vote according to a standard that is not forced upon any of the other States of the Union. You are seeking by military despotism, under the false pretext of protecting the ballot, to take the ballot away from the white race and to give it to the black race. You are giving it to a race that you have to admit with all of your arguments is at least as ignorant as the "poor whites," and then you declare that the "poor whites" are rebels and leave them out. The whole ballot is thus left with the black race whom you expect to carry your candidates. That is it. It is a question of political power. It is a tyrannical assumption not warranted by the Constitution, the disastrous consequences of which time will prove. It is a tyrannical political machine; a hydra-headed tyrant, whose soul is black with the bitter hatred of the South because of political defeats in the past. You who have stood the brunt of past party strife as the minority in the Halls of Congress, who had been stung, it may be, with insult and outrage from Representatives from the South, may still entertain revengeful feelings. I admit that a Senator from Massachusetts had a load of outrage cast upon him to carry into the South and put it down there. I admit that he has borne a load of outrage put upon him by an insolent aristocracy. But ought not your hatred to stop now? Is not your foot upon the neck of the poor and defenseless people of the South? Did not you at the first portion of this session feel called upon by a sense of humanity to send bread to the starving South, which, after the terrible ravages it had suffered by the war, was about being depopulated by famine? I again appeal to the nobler attributes of our common nature. I ask that the policy of hatred and revenge shall now end.

Why, sir, the late slaves of the southern people now go through their streets as their masters. The people of the South have called upon you to send them a police to protect them from the outrages of these very negroes whose passions you have aroused against them. Are you not content with having conquered them? Must you disfranchise all who will not vote as you wish? Must you carry out your system of policy and deprive every man of the right to vote merely because he does not come up to the standard of patriotism which you prescribe? By putting obstacles in the way of the white people who have been accustomed to the use of the ballot, and thus gradually absorbing all the rights in the hands of the black race, you expect to entirely destroy all political opposition. You know, then, that you may elect any candidate and control any district. These Halls will be filled with your tools. Do you suppose, with such men in these Halls, that our laws will be respected? Will such a body stand before the world as an American Congress representing the honest, free opinion of the people of this Union? I do not believe it.

I do not believe in the expediency of any such high-handed measures for the purpose of any party retaining political power, or for the purpose of satisfying political vengeance. And these bills are brought in for no other purpose. This is but one of a series. We have had abundance of such stuff before. We had it in reference to the Army during the war. We had a provost marshal's department of the Government. Men had then to carry the bayonet; now you command the people to surrender the ballot. You controlled them when they were in the Army, and you would not let them vote if they opposed your party then. You refuse to let the people vote now unless they accept your political organization as the source of all power. By your law regulating the enrollment of our armies you secured easy majorities to fill the Halls of Congress with your partisans, but you completely failed through that law to increase the national forces to maintain our armies in the field, or in fact, to do any of the things the title of your bill pretended to do. True, you filled your provost marshal's Bureau with valuable political tools, and filled the coffers of those bureaus with commutation money wrung from the people under the pretense of increasing the Army and putting down the rebellion. By furnishing a substitute the citizen could satisfy your demands then. Three hundred dollars was the price of your consideration. Now there is no escape from the insolence and inquisition of the military commanders in the departments of the South except by voting as your political leaders may dictate.

Mr. Speaker, there is one view of that case which I took at the opening of my remarks, which I think of very vital importance and worthy of review. I mean the element of foreign immigration. From the condition of Europe, the disturbance of the various nations of that continent, a very great increase, according to the statistics, of foreign immigration is flocking to our shores. These immigrants have their choice to seek a home in the West, following the old beaten track, or to spread along the range of the Alleghanies or spurs of these mountains that trend toward the Gulf of Mexico, and so develop a new element in the southern States and add new power and glory to this Union. It is not necessary in the presence of the Representatives of the great West to allude to the greatness and advantage of that immigration, the absolute necessity of encouraging it by making the immigrant satisfied with his new condition, and ready to develop the resources of the country where he may locate.

Now, the effect of such a measure as this cannot fail to throw a blight upon any section of country where any body of people in pursuit of personal liberty are called to settle. Military despotism is the chief terror of the European immigrant. His home is made desolate by conscription, and when he exercises any right of citizenship he is subordinated in every respect to military power. Now, you propose to recreate upon this continent a military system in the face of the influx of foreign immigration under the plea of security to the country, which practically will prevent the development of the resources of a very large portion of this Union. There is no means of overcoming that innate prejudice against the very system which this bill inaugurates except by its abolition. No argument can induce the farmer, the miner, or mechanic from Europe to put himself in the category of suspected persons, liable to be marched off at the option of a captain or major in the Army to take his position back or front as the military officer may choose; for by this system, by this supplementary act, you force him to take that position which the military commander chooses to give him among the people where he is to dwell. The limitations upon the power and caprice of the officers having charge of the registration of voters and fixing the qualifications of voters under this bill are too vague to protect a stranger coming for the first time into a disturbed district to vote. The truth or falsehood of charges which may be made against a person claiming to vote cannot be fairly and fully decided on under this bill. It is impossible for any honorable man to jeopardize his character as to loyalty by coming in contact with a set of low informers and petty bullies such as this bill must bring to life and clothe with power.

A large portion of the soldiers of whom you speak so much have won the right to the ballot, have won the right to partake of all the privileges of citizenship by having fought in the Army; and now when these men under your invitation, endowed with the franchise which your law has given them, go to that section, their loyalty will not perhaps be questioned. But they take the position of citizens not as by right nor as having won it by service in the field, but at the will and caprice of a military commander. They are no longer citizens by inalienable right, but the subjects of a political organization. It is announced that this meeting of Congress is for the purpose of interpreting the laws. Sir, the laws have been interpreted as you made them. They may be right or they may be wrong. I do not enter into a discussion as between your own officers and yourselves. But, sir, as long as you seek to interpret the law, it is but just that you should first respect the power which creates the law; and as all power under which we live is based upon the individual independence of the citizen a Congress which violates the Bill of Rights in the framing of a law to restrain the right to the ballot commits a crime against liberty.

With these remarks, sir, uttered under the influence of a stern necessity to meet the issue now presented on a question which strikes at the vital liberties of my country, having thus feebly endeavored to awaken in the minds of the majority of this House a sense of the great wrong they are about to perpetrate, as I hon-

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. C. R. BUCKALEW,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

July 11, 1867,

On the passage of House bill No. 123, supplementary to the acts of 2d and 23d of March, 1867, for the more efficient government and reconstruction of the rebel States, the same having been amended by substituting therefor Senate bill No. 131 upon the same subject.

Mr. BUCKALEW said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I had prepared some memoranda at my desk for a speech upon this measure, comprising the different material points involved in its discussion; but as we are driven into our final action upon the bill without an adjournment, I forego my intention of going over the whole argument. I must, however, before this subject passes from us, express my opinion upon a few points which have not been touched in the debate, and without some mention of which I think our published debates will be imperfect, will not convey a fair report of the views of all those who have been connected by position with this legislation.

I have now, and have always had since they were passed, a very clear opinion concerning the general character of our former laws on reconstruction. I assisted in their discussion when they were passed, and have bestowed a reasonable amount of attention to the observations which have been made upon them by the press of the country and by speakers in the country. I think that the differences alleged to exist between the Attorney General and the President of the United States upon the one hand and leading prominent men in Congress upon the other, have been greatly exaggerated, and that a very false view concerning both the magnitude and the nature of those differences exists abroad among the people. Upon carefully examining the points which have been brought into debate in this Chamber as well as outside of the Chamber, they will, in my opinion, be found to be either unimportant, insincere, or misconceived; and that in truth, upon the main point which is raised by the bill before us we have, as is very often the case, a dispute about words rather than about substance.

This bill proceeds formally and gravely in its first section to declare that the military power in the southern section is superior to the civil power set up there by the inhabitants. That is announced as a great and important fact. A declaration of that kind is a very singular thing in an act of Congress. Ordinarily, a law, after it has been enacted, is left to stand and to speak for itself, or, if it receive exposition, receives it from the courts who are appointed for the purpose of making obscurity plain in public enactments; and the legislative power to enact supplementary measures ordinarily confines itself to adding something to the former legislation or to taking something from it. It is very unusual indeed for us to take upon ourselves the duty of exposition and of explanation to the people of the country concerning laws which we have passed.

I will now state briefly the general character of the reconstruction laws, as I understand them. By the act of 2d of March, found at page 60 of the pamphlet edition of our laws for the last session, certain powers were conferred upon five military commanders in the South, and what those powers were was defined; they were set forth, they were enumerated. Now, complaint is made against the Attorney General that he speaks of the authority conferred upon those military commanders as a police power, in general terms a power of preserving peace, and of preserving order, and of protecting the inhabitants in their rights of person and property. It after all, perhaps, turns out to be a question whether the expression used by the Attorney General is accurate or not; whether the term "police powers" accurately describes those powers which were conferred upon these military commanders by the act of the 2d of March. If the Senator from Illinois, who introduces and champions this bill, thinks the Attorney General at fault upon this question of definition, and if by good and sound logic—which he has at least attempted to present—he can make good his accusation against the Attorney General, he convicts him of an inaccuracy which is nothing to the purpose. It is nothing, sir, to us or to the people of the country. The question recurs back behind this question of definition as to what were the particular powers conferred. No matter how you name them, the inquiry is, what were they really? They are set forth on the face of that statute in language perfectly plain and clear. They are, to protect the rights of person and property of the inhabitants within their respective jurisdictions; and to punish crimes, and they may execute this jurisdiction through the civil courts, if they think proper, or they may organize courts-martial and military commissions for the purpose. That is what the law says. Before that, it proclaims that the southern country shall be divided into five military districts, and a commander placed over each. The Senator from Michigan argues that because the South is divided into military districts, therefore this military power is supreme and complete, and it absorbs all power in that region. Why, sir, the northern States were divided into military districts also. Commanders were placed over districts in the northern and central States.

Mr. HOWARD. One word, with the Senator's permission. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania misunderstood me. It was not because of the division of which he speaks that I held that the military authority was supreme; but I alleged as one reason for that supremacy the very language of the bill which gives to the military officer the command of the district, a military term which certainly implies everything that is in the nature of military authority.

Mr. BUCKALEW. And just so General Meade and each of the other generals assigned to a district in the North was assigned to the command of the district; but his duties were very restricted and limited indeed; so that no conclusion arises from the use of that term, "command." But to return. Districts were established and commanders assigned to them, and then in the subsequent part of the section the powers of those commanders were enumerated; and it is with that donation of power that we are alone concerned. I have stated what it was. In addition to what I have stated, there was authority conferred upon those commanders to declare martial law. They were to preserve the peace, to suppress insurrection and disorder, and if an emergency arose they were authorized by the act to declare martial law. As a matter of course, if they did so the operation of the ordinary civil laws there would be interrupted and suspended; all the jurisdiction of the civil authorities, to the necessary extent, would be suspended or in abeyance while martial law continued to exist; but no longer.

One clause in the section authorized them to permit criminals to be tried in the civil tribunals. Of course those civil tribunals were the State courts established or existing under the provisional governments which had been set up.

Now, what is the conclusion of the whole matter upon that material and vital section of the act of the 2d of March? That these commanders had certain powers conferred upon them and certain duties enjoined, which they were sent there to use, execute, and perform, and that no power was conferred on them over the civil governments there unless those civil governments undertook to interfere with their jurisdiction—that interference was forbidden—or unless the necessities of the service required the declaration of martial law, when the action of those civil jurisdictions would be interrupted. So long as those civil governments did not interfere with this military jurisdiction which we conferred, and so long as martial law was not proclaimed, those civil governments stood firm and effectual to all the intents and purposes contemplated by the act of Congress in declaring in its concluding section that they were provisional governments, and to continue so long as the proceeding of reconstruction was going on.

What was another feature of that law? It provided for the reorganization of effectual constitutional governments, to be represented in the Congress of the United States. How? Either by the initiation of these provisional governments in the ordinary way, by their calling upon the people to elect delegates and form constitutions, or by the voluntary action of the people themselves, one or the other. That was the provision of that law. It was left to the people themselves. In other words, the whole proceeding of reorganization, the enumeration of voters, the fixing of the time for voting, the holding of a convention, the submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, &c., in short, the whole proceeding from beginning to end, was left to the people of those States themselves, free from any interference or control of the military commanders.

What else did that act of the 2d of March do? In its concluding section, as I have already stated, it declared the existence and validity for certain purposes of those local governments. It declared and pronounced them to be provisional governments, and limited their duration and jurisdiction to the time when new constitutions should be formed and the States admitted into the Union. Thus Congress left this subject at the time of adjournment upon the 4th of March.

On the 23d of March, however, three weeks afterward—at the special session—further reflection having been bestowed upon this subject, and partisan necessities appealing to gentlemen in both Houses of Congress, another act was passed supplementary to the former; and what did that act do? I can describe it in few words. It transferred the control and direction of the reorganization of those States from the provisional governments which existed in them to the military commanders who had been placed over the districts. It was a law to transfer the control of reconstruction to the people of those States and from the civil authorities of those States to the military commanders; they were armed with power over this great subject, and for the first time. It was apprehended that reorganization under their management could be made much more effectual for the purposes of those who then had power to control the legislation of the United States than it would be under State management.

But the power conferred upon the commanders by the act of March 23 was a power over reorganization only. They were authorized to select the persons to make registries of voters; they were authorized to call the conventions, and were to transmit the new constitutions after they were formed to the Congress of the United States for its consideration. But in other respects their powers remained as before. Described in general terms, the supplementary act was to turn over the management of reconstruction from those State governments and the people to the military commanders.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Buckalew.

SENATE.

Then, sir, in addition to what I have stated, both the laws of the 2d and 23d of March contained provisions regarding suffrage and other matters with which my present argument is not concerned.

Mr. President, the great material point determined by the Attorney General, with the concurrence of all the members of the Cabinet (except one) and of the President of the United States, and announced in a circular, was that the military commanders had no power to remove civil officers in those provisional governments pending the proceeding of reorganization. Where was the power ever conferred upon them? Point me to any provision in your legislation which looks to it. They did not determine that if the military commander proclaimed martial law the operation of those provisional governments would not be suspended. On the contrary, I think the Attorney General affirmed that doctrine. Of course that would be a reasonable construction of the law, as I have already stated. But they ruled and determined the point that so long as martial law was not proclaimed, so long as those civil authorities did not interfere with the military, they were independent of them; they were for the time being provisionally there, legally there, there under an act of Congress, with powers restricted only so far as control or power had been granted to the military commanders in the acts of the 2d and 23d of March. Can any man, much more a lawyer, doubt that this was a just and proper construction of your laws? Now, consider the point. The other questions determined in the opinion of the Attorney General were either not vital or are acquiesced in, and the decisions upon them are comparatively unimportant. This is the thing upon which the country was to be aroused. This was the question upon which we were brought here, the one used to provoke this session of Congress, and it is the business of one who disagrees in opinion and sentiment with the majority to proclaim his opinion upon it and the grounds upon which that opinion has been formed.

In the first place, as stated before, there was no power in express terms conferred upon the military commanders to remove any of those officers. In the second place, the clause which authorized them to cause criminals to be tried in the civil courts there recognized those courts as valid, at least for certain purposes. In the third place, as stated before, the concluding section of the act of 2d of March expressly declared them provisional during the proceeding of reorganization, and reserved to the United States power to mold and to change and to control them in future. This section, taken alone, is conclusive against this power of removal. If there be any force, any meaning in your own laws, can you say that this power of control and of modification as to those governments was reserved to the military commanders by that section? Have we come to that stage of degeneracy that a brigadier general in command of a district can quote Louis XIV and declare: "I am the State?" The power is reserved to the United States, and to the United States only, over those provisional governments to control and modify them. Is that to be imputed to your brigadier or major general in any one of these districts? Is he supreme and not you? Will you abdicate your own manhood, your own functions, your supremacy, your original authority, your power of which you are proud, and bow meekly before the authority of your own creature, who went there by your command, and over whom one would think your jurisdiction was complete?

The supplementary act, also, which conferred upon these military commanders new powers is against the argument that they possessed general and unlimited ones before. It proves by every line and section in it relating to them that before its passage they had no control and no power whatever over the subject of reconstruction. They could not appoint a register. They could not issue an order for enumerating voters. They could not issue an order or speak a word officially concerning the holding of an election, nor regulate a return. They could not interfere with the making of a new constitution, nor with its transmission to Congress. The very fact that the supplementary act of 23d March conferred powers upon them for regulating reconstruction proves that they did not possess such powers before.

Then again, I took occasion the other day to recall attention to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia at the last session of Congress, when the reconstruction act was pending before this body. He was dissatisfied with the volition and freedom left to the inhabitants of the southern country. He desired to bring them more perfectly under our control and under the military jurisdiction which we were then about to set up. Consequently he proposed that the tenure of office of all persons in authority in the southern governments should terminate at the expiration of ninety days from the passage of the law, and he proceeded to confer power upon the military commanders to remove them, to enforce your law and give it operation. What did you do? Did you adopt his amendment? Did you sanction his view? Did you participate in his feelings or in his wishes upon that subject. No, sir. By an almost unanimous vote you refused to terminate those governments; you refused to turn out those officers; you refused to arm your military commanders with jurisdiction and power over them. And yet, after this deliberate and open rejection of the Senator's amendment, we are to be told that any one of our commanders can remove civil officers at pleasure, and can do it under the reconstruction laws! And you are about to pass a bill declaring this to be a legal construction of those laws. Sir, your declaration is against the fact, against your own record, and against what ought to be, if our proceedings are read, the common knowledge of the American people.

The Senator from Illinois criticised the Attorney General. I hold that the Attorney General was right in his opinion upon this question of power, unquestionably right. If law be capable of construction, if the human mind be capable of grasping the meaning of your enactments, he was right, and it was his duty to pronounce that opinion as an honest man and as a professional man standing as the principal law-officer of this Government, before the American people.

The Senator from Illinois criticised the Attorney General on another point. He said that while the Attorney General held that all the qualifications necessary for registration were those enumerated in the oath contained in the act of 23d of March, in reciting those qualifications he left out a clause of the oath, that clause which says if a person has held an office as a member of a State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of a State, and afterward engaged in the rebellion, he shall be disqualified. Well, sir, that clause was an amendment which was put upon a Senate amendment by the House of Representatives. It never proceeded, thank fortune, from any member of this body. We are guiltless of originating at least that one absurdity in our past legislation. Why, sir, does not every school-boy in the country who reads the Constitution in the course of his studies know that every member of a State Legislature and every executive and judicial officer in a State is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States; and that it always has been so since the Constitution was adopted and became our fundamental law? Consequently, that clause is an absurdity. It was followed by another clause, which was in the oath as originally drawn by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] that whenever a person had been sworn as such an officer—enumerating those I have mentioned—and afterwards engaged in rebellion, he shall be disqualified. That covered the whole case. The omission by the Attorney General of noticing the prior clause, the duplicate clause, the unnecessary clause, the absurd provision, is brought up gravely in criticism against him, and he is to be arraigned as knowing nothing of fundamental principle or of the laws of his country. Sir, his opinion was exactly accurate; and it was all the more accurate and admirable for ignoring that unmeaning and absurd provision which was inserted by the House of Representatives. It meant nothing, it could convey no additional meaning or force to the section in which it was placed.

Now, Mr. President, under what circumstances did the Attorney General, and others associated with him in the Administration act? Let us inquire that, in fairness, when you are sending this bill forth to the public, to brand them with usurpation, with misconstruction of your laws, with obstructing the course of reconstruction. Let us see under what circumstances they acted, and see whether they are justified in the forum of honest debate, whether their course can be vindicated, or whether it shall stand condemned upon the high and imperial mandate of some sensation newspaper, which assumes to itself to construe the laws and to ignore the learned lights of the legal profession. We are very much at present under the influence of sensation newspapers; but their authority upon questions of law or of constitutional duty is not conclusive.

In the first place it is well known that instructions were asked of the War Department and of the President by several of the military commanders, perhaps all of them. The fact is stated by the Attorney General in his opinion. Therefore, the action of the Administration, the executive department of your Government, one of its principal branches, and solemnly charged with the duty of seeing that the laws be executed, was not volunteered; it was invited; it was asked for. And is it not plain that there would have been a dereliction, a failure of duty if there had been no instruction issued, no advice given, no rule prescribed?

In the next place, the executive department of the Government was appealed to by those officers who were displaced, by Governor Wells, and by Judge Abell, and by others, who complained that their legal rights had been violated and the laws of the country disregarded by officers of the United States who had been appointed by the President and were subject to his orders.

Again, let us consider how necessary and indispensable it is that there should be uniformity of administration throughout the South; that one set of rules should not prevail in South Carolina, and another in Alabama, and still another in Texas; that conflicting decisions should not be made by the military commanders and confusion thereby introduced. What a disgrace, what a scandal to our Government this would be. It was necessary that there should be uniformity of system; and that uniformity of system could be obtained in no other manner than by consultations of all these commanders meeting together as a deliberative body to pass upon doubtful points, or in the regular way by instructions to them from the President through the War Department. The latter was the constitutional and proper mode of proceeding to secure correct, consistent, and uniform administration of the laws, and it was resorted to.

Again, sir, recollect that this administration of the laws of the United States in those States was executive business. It was to be performed by appointees of the President of the United States, and he was responsible to Congress and to the American people for what was done by them. It was his proper business to see that they performed faithfully and fairly all the duties which we imposed upon them by our laws. He is Commander-in-Chief, and as such charged with the duty of the superintendence of the execution of the laws; and particularly is he charged with the execution of the laws pertaining to our military service. It is in his military capacity still more than in his civil capacity that the duty of superintendence, of control, of command, and of regulation is charged upon him. Although he is the civil head of the Government a large mass of the public business in civil affairs is performed by independent courts. But in the military branch of the Government business his eye must reach to the recesses of administration, to the extremities of the country, to the proceedings of lieutenant as well as of general; he must overlook your whole system and see to it that the laws are executed, that subordination is preserved, that justice (so far as the military are concerned) is enforced, and that the rights of the citizen are not trampled upon, while the just demands of the Government to his obedience are maintained with unflinching firmness and rigor.

It is to be remembered also that the Supreme Court of the United States, in a grave and formal opinion delivered in the Mississippi case, announced this very duty as binding upon the President. He was instructed by the Supreme Court, whose construction of your laws, if not always conclusive upon other departments of the Government, is always entitled to their profound respect. He was instructed by your Chief Justice, as the organ of the court, that it was his duty to see that his subordinate commanders executed the law in a faithful manner, and to exercise over them the control necessary to secure such execution. That declaration of the court is very properly referred to by the Attorney General in his opinion.

Now, sir, these considerations constitute, in my judgment, a triumphant vindication of what was done upon the ground of power, upon the ground of right, upon the ground of public policy, upon every ground possible, except perhaps party expediency. I have heard some gentlemen complain that this opinion was given because it afforded unjust and artful men in the country an opportunity for mischief; that such men were enabled to misrepresent the views, objects, and action of the executive department and to arouse against all concerned in the performance of a public duty in that department the hot and heady passions of men who do not reason, but who feel. But whether this complaint be just or not we need not now inquire, because it does not touch my argument upon its merits. It is sufficient for my present purpose that the action of the Executive was in good faith and upon sound convictions of public duty.

In fact, sir, has not the President acted throughout with fidelity, if not in a spirit of concession, to your views? What did he do, sir, after your law was passed? Who did he put in command in the southern country? General Schofield, General Sickles, General John Pope, General Sheridan, and, I believe, General Ord. Those were the commanders he appointed to execute the powers created by the act of 2d of March. Were they hostile to you? Were they men of doubtful antecedents? Were they disposed to deal unjustly with your political interests in that section? Did they not go there with the intention of favoring the designs of Congress? Have they not participated in your feelings with reference to the future? And had they not under your former laws substantial control over the whole question of reconstruction, which is so dear to your hearts because it connects itself with future power?

Has the Administration put a finger upon any one of those commanders to curb him in any legitimate act connected with reorganization? Has the proceeding of registration been meddled with? Why look at the reports from Mobile and from Savannah and from Richmond and from Louisiana, and from districts in which white populations largely preponderate, if your census is to be trusted. Consider the reports which come up to us of the preponderance of colored votes upon the registrations. Has not your system been administered by the strong hand of military and friendly power from the beginning, backed by your Freedmen's Bureau and by contributions of millions from your Treasury? Not yet satisfied with these political advantages, (in addition to the public considerations involved,) you are here to overrule the Attorney General upon questions of law, and such questions as I have discussed, upon which the reason of the case and the letter of the law confront you and proclaim unmistakably that your session was ordered, and is now held, not to vindicate your own laws, not to rescue those laws from perversion and reconstruction from obstruction, but that you might mold reconstruction more completely to a purpose of party, and secure your future control in the Government of the United States.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] informs us with a glow of genial feeling that three fourths of all these reconstructed States are in the accurate line of loyalty and of political action; that at least that proportion of them will come up here with constitutions uncontaminated with any blot or stain whatever, with the most salutary provisions, and above all and beyond all with the right men to represent them—"the friends of the country." He wants to wipe out these provisional governments, and renews his amendment for that purpose. He desires "to use the patronage of those governments to strengthen our friends." Well, sir, that is a benevolent object! We ought to do everything possible to strengthen our friends! The military machinery, five brigadier or major generals down South, with an infinite number of registrars appointed, and with election officers appointed, and with Freedmen's Bureau outlays and Freedmen's Bureau agents scattered all over that country, are not sufficient for our friends; we must do a little more; we must seize upon these poor, petty, provisional governments whose existence is already limited by law, and whose jurisdiction is exceedingly curtailed by our former enactments, in order to get a little patronage for "our friends;" in order, I suppose, that the whole proceeding of reconstruction shall be made perfect, that there shall be general satisfaction in the country upon the completion of the work!

Well, sir, I do not know that I care to interrupt the good feeling which prevails, or seems to prevail, by making impertinent or untimely observations and by protracting arguments which are useless and distasteful. What I rose for mainly was to express my opinion upon a few of the material points which have been made the pretext for assembling the two Houses of Congress at this unpropitious season of the year. My idea was to point out the insufficiency of the reasons, the hollowness, the unsubstantial character of the pretenses upon which we are assembled together. I suppose members of both Houses felt themselves called upon by a stimulated public or party opinion to meet here. They thought the people or a part of the people had got the impression in some way or other that the President and his Cabinet, and particularly the Attorney General, (who is an admirable man in the department of the law, but perhaps not admirable as a politician,) that all these high officials had combined together to obstruct the laws of Congress. Well, sir, I will say in conclusion that I think the only obstruction that will be interposed in the way of the execution of the acts of the 2d and the 23d of March will be interposed by over-zealous commanders who are to execute them, and by Congress itself, which meets to undo its own work under pretense of explaining it.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. W. E. ROBINSON,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 12, 1867.

The House having under consideration the bill supplementary to an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States—

Mr. ROBINSON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have desired to say a word or two during these debates on the subject of reconstruction, and now rise, not to make any set speech, but merely to submit a few observations which I deem pertinent to the occasion.

What, sir, has brought us together at this time in extraordinary session of Congress? Has anything been done by the South to provoke it? Has any southern man or southern woman or southern child done or said anything calling for harsher laws than those we have already imposed upon them? No; it is merely because the proper officer of our Government has given a proper opinion on what some call a very improper act of Congress, that the representatives of the people and the representatives of the States have been called away from their pleasant homes to this hot and dusty city in this heated term. You have not even the poor pretext of anything done by our southern brethren for this additional legislation, for they have submitted with unprecedented willingness to every enormity of legislation put upon them.

Sir, a short time ago, during the present Congress, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and gentlemen from every State in the Union then represented here voted the sympathy of the American people with the people of Ireland, suffering under the cruel wrongs and oppressive laws which England had inflicted upon her. That island is not much larger than the first three districts of New York, and has a population not exceeding five or six millions. Every Representative on this floor voted his sympathy with Ireland in her sufferings from British oppression. But here are ten States, with a population more than twice the number of that of Ireland, and ten or twenty times its extent; our own territory, our own people, under our own flag, enduring oppression such as no British Government ever attempted to force upon Ireland. Why, sir, have we not heard that a military governor, under a law which we have now met professedly to make more stringent and more despotic, has removed municipal and State officers without trial and without any given reason? Have we not heard of a military governor, under a law now to be made more severe, who stopped a civic procession till they procured and consented to carry a certain flag, to salute that flag, uncovering three paces before reaching it, bowing their necks as they passed it, and remaining uncovered three paces beyond it? What would have been the consequences if some poor fellow, blinded with dust and bedazzled with its splendor, had made a misstep or a miscalculation of steps, and uncovered only two and a half paces before approaching, and bowed when half a pace beyond, I cannot tell. But this I do know: that during the seven centuries of British misrule in Ireland no military commander ever dared to remove from office without accusation and trial even an alderman of Cork or Dublin, or any other Irish city; and though the Irish people had cursed the British flag in oratory and song, no military governor or tyrant ever dared to ask them to carry that flag in any of their processions or to uncover or bow their heads while passing it. Oh, sir, it is a sorry spectacle to see the Representatives of a Republican people voting sympathy with the sufferers under the misgovernment and oppression of our neighbors while planning and perpetrating for our own fellow-citizens acts of tyranny and misgovernment such as no monarch, emperor, or tyrant ever yet inflicted upon a subjected people, however rebellious they may have been. If British rule in Ireland were as tyrannical as ours is in these ten suffering States every man, woman, and child in Ireland would be a Fenian. It is with the deepest sorrow I make this assertion. I do it to avert, if possible, the spirit of oppressive legislation, which if practiced in any other country would call forth our sympathy for the sufferers and our condemnation of the oppressor.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield with pleasure.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to say to the gentleman from Ireland [laughter] that no longer ago than yesterday I introduced on this floor a very devoted son of the Emerald Isle, who has been for some years a naturalized citizen of the United States and a resident of the State of North Carolina, who appealed to the various members to whom I introduced him to overthrow by express letter everything in the form of government in the South, save the laws of Congress as administered by the military commanders, and he presented to these gentlemen, as well as to me, the argument that the very life was being crushed out of every loyal man, not by the United States Government, but by the pretended State and local governments of the South. And the gentleman will not, if he travels through the South, find one out of every ten of the Irish American citizens there who does not look to Congress to protect them from oppression greater than they endured in Ireland.

Mr. ROBINSON. In reply to what the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, I need only say that I doubt not there are a thousand Irishmen to-day living under British rule, for whose victims we so recently unanimously voted the sympathy of the American people, who would appeal to the British Parliament if introduced upon its floor to overthrow by express letter everything but British rule in Ireland as administered by her Castle-reaghs and Derbys, and would present that the very life would be crushed out of every loyal man if the Fitzgeralds and Emmets and O'Briens had succeeded in overthrowing that British rule in Ireland, against which we so recently and unanimously protested in this House; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not, if he travels through Ireland, find one out of every ten of the loyal men in Ireland who feed and fatten on the patronage of British rule in their starving country who does not look to the British Parliament to protect them and preserve them from the calamity of granting to Ireland her rights and liberties. And it is no argument to me that because some Irishman, who has foresworn allegiance to British power and British law and fled from their oppressions, has here become the apologist of laws more galling and oppressive than those whose authors he foreswore, that I should see others faults and not my own; that I should join in voting condemnation on our neighbors and cover up our own faults, equal, if not far transcending theirs. I care not who such a man is, he is not a true Irishman; but a British—you may fill up the blank as you please.

Mr. KELLEY. I did not say that that gentleman said he had fled from the oppression he speaks of. I apprehend that like the gentleman he came here because America was a freer country than Ireland.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the gentleman for that word "was." It was a freer country. I was here an old Clay Whig when the Democrats were in power, daily protesting against their attempts to infringe the rights of minorities and trample down the safeguards of our Constitution, but they never dared to trample on the rights of their political opponents; they never dared to override all constitutional provisions to perpetuate their power, as the party in a majority here are now doing. I was an old-line Whig then, and I would be a recreant and a coward if I failed to denounce now enormities greater than those I then denounced.

Sir, I have some idea what these loyal southern men are who come here to invoke oppression on their people. I know the power of misrepresentation. I know the efforts made to excite and keep alive a spirit of revenge against the people of the South by persons calling themselves southern loyalists. I know the indignities heaped upon the southern people and the threats made against them if they dared to complain. I know that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania made his speech to the people of Mobile he said they must be quiet for he had the military at his back. This must have been very soothing and calculated to hasten reconstruction when he informed them that it might be necessary to urge home his arguments with the bayonet.

Mr. KELLEY. I thank the gentleman for raising that point, and beg him to yield for a moment just here.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the gentleman say that he did not say so?

Mr. KELLEY. When the cry "Put him down!" "Pull him down!" was raised, I answered, "Gentlemen, you cannot put down free speech by pulling me down. That is one of the rights the exercise of which the American people established by the late war. You will do nothing toward suppressing it by pulling me down. You should bear in mind that the fifteenth infantry are at my back as a representative of that great principle, and if they cannot maintain it in Mobile the United States Army will." But that did not cause the riot. I proceeded, and the riot did not commence until a prearranged signal of two taps upon a bell, a pause and then one tap was given; then the gentleman's friends commenced shooting at me.

Mr. ROBINSON. I throw back the imputation with scorn upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania that those who commenced the riot were my friends. They were his friends who commenced it, and I presume it could be so proved if a proper committee were appointed to investigate it. I had no friends there, and the gentleman knows it.

[Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, who had taken a seat immediately in front of Mr. ROBINSON, said something not heard by the reporter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not time to answer every question put to me, but if the venerable and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has any question to ask me and will state it so that I can hear it, I shall take pleasure in trying to answer him.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I only said if the balls were going to fly I would rather be out of the way. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope he will not move away; I am glad to have the honorable gentleman near me; I rejoice to see him over on the right side. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] calls me the gentleman from Ireland. Sir, I do not claim to represent Ireland, but I am proud to claim, here as in all other places, the honor of being one of her sons; but is he not more an Irishman than I am, unless he has degenerated like his North Carolina Irishman? A great many Irishmen get degenerated, and sometimes they change their names. I rather suspect that if a committee to investigate the matter were appointed, with the gentleman from the Worcester district, Massachusetts, [Mr. BALDWIN,] one of the best ethnologists and antiquarians in the country, and my anatomical friend from Ohio, [Mr. MUNGEN,] and my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTFIELD,] who introduced the other day the belligerent letter of Professor Agassiz on the origin of the human races, it would be found that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was called O'Kelley at home. He may say that he has only mended his name by dropping the significant O. When he was mending his name he might have mended his manners without detriment to either. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I simply assumed that the gentleman represented Ireland, and therein differed from me in the fact that I sometimes consider and speak upon American topics, while he never alludes to any other than Irish. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman was the first to introduce the Irish topic.

Mr. KELLEY. On the contrary, I did but respond to the gentleman's suggestion, that we have inflicted upon the southern people greater wrongs than England has inflicted on the Irish.

Mr. ROBINSON. My reference was to American matters compared with those of other countries.

Now, when interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] I was about to say something as to the parties guilty of commencing these mobs and riots—for they have been made the cause of all this swarm of reconstruction bills enacted to subject the South to military despotism on the ground that life and property were not secure in those States. The New York Tribune a few days since had an editorial article on the recent Birmingham anti-Popery riots. It appears that a man had been sent down from London to Birmingham to speak against Popery and Ritualism. I have no doubt that he thought, if he did not say, that he had the British army at his back. His speeches probably were not more bitter than those of the gentleman from Pennsylvania were, and shrieked into ears as unwilling as those of the people of Mobile. No doubt the anti-Ritualist speaker said his audiences, whom he was abusing, commenced the row. The editor of the Tribune, however, takes this sensible view of the matter. He says:

"Vituperation, however, is not controversy. Religious enlightenment does not come of hard names and yelling defiance to a crowd of ignorant and excitable laborers. If a preacher will throw mud at his Christian brethren he must expect to get splattered in return. If he dares into a crowd of Irishmen and doubles his fists and dares them to come on, it is the most natural thing in the world that he should come out of the crowd with a black eye and a torn coat."

Now, is it not easy to see that vituperation or throwing mud or yelling defiance to a crowd or threatening to shut their mouths with the fifteenth United States infantry might lead to a riot in Mobile as well as in Birmingham? And is it not quite natural to suppose that the riots in Mobile, New Orleans, and elsewhere were just as chargeable to the speakers themselves as to the crowd who, even at the points of the fifteenth United States infantry bayonets, were compelled to listen? The fable of the poor lamb which was killed by the wolf for riling the water which he was drinking up stream might serve to illustrate many transactions between human lambs and human wolves, who must make some pretense to throw the blame of the quarrel upon those whom they had determined to worry into it anyhow.

But, sir, New Orleans, Mobile, and Memphis have not been the only places where mobs and riots have occurred, and where human life and property have been in danger. If I rightly remember, the city from which the gentleman from Pennsylvania hails had mobs and riots in which churches were sacked and burned and lives lost.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Robinson.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

of order. I submit that this discussion is altogether wide of the question before the House; and I make the further point of order that gentlemen must take their seats.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is that the remarks of the gentleman are very wide of the subject before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. Cook in the chair.) The Chair overrules the first point of order raised by the gentleman; but sustains the second; gentlemen must take their seats.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I remember correctly there were men in that city of Philadelphia, dressed in the apparel of men, who had the courage to spit in the faces and otherwise insult women; and those women sisters of charity. I know excuses were then made, as they are now made, that the insulted and maltreated were the guilty parties. The weak and insulted parties were belied and vilified. The spirit of revenge was evoked and scenes of carnage and outrage followed, such as have never disgraced any city of the South. But blood once shed, the demon spirit of revenge, born of hell and accursed of God, which has no eyes nor ears nor senses to discriminate between right and wrong, was evoked then, as it is now evoked, and let loose to shriek for more blood and clamor for more vengeance.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield as much of my time as I can afford.

Mr. KELLEY. I will endeavor to procure you compensation for any time I may consume. As the gentleman has made these remarks in connection with a somewhat personal colloquy, I desire to say that it was my privilege at the time to which he has referred, with a policeman's staff, to meet armed rioters, and to be bespattered with the blood of policemen shot at my side while performing the same humble duty that I did in defense of those churches. I beg leave to say further that the aspersion cast upon me in the Mobile Times as a means of fomenting a scene of murder was utterly false. The lie designed to excite the Irish citizens of Mobile against me, that I had abandoned the church of my fathers and burned the temples in which they had worshipped in Philadelphia, was as false as the heart that coined it—that of William D. Mann, late of Michigan, but now assessor of internal revenue at Mobile and owner of the Times. I was born into the Presbyterian church, but forgetting all save the rights of man, as the people of Philadelphia, both Catholic and Protestant, will bear witness, I periled my life to defend the churches to which the gentleman alludes, and, as prosecuting attorney, prosecuted those who could be arrested and brought to trial for the crime. I was then what the gentleman was not—a member of the Democratic party.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was going to ask the gentleman as to that. It seems that he has been getting wrong while I have been getting right. He was a Democrat then, and that with some may account for the correct manner in which he acted on that occasion; but I have made no allusion to him as having had anything to do with instigating that riot.

Mr. KELLEY. I then believed as I do now in the rights of humanity for all men, whether Irish or American, whether white or black.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have referred to that simply to show that life and property have been unsafe in northern cities as well as in southern cities, and that it is as unfair to inflict these oppressive laws upon the whole South for the Mobile or New Orleans riots, as it would have been to have appointed a military governor to play the tyrant over the entire people of Pennsylvania because a few people in Philadelphia had engaged in a riot, however fearful.

Take, again, the State of Massachusetts. A seminary of learning under the charge of innocent and defenseless nuns was burned down by a Boston mob. On the lofty walls of that blackened monument of Massachusetts' bigotry stood the significant inscription, "The Lord Seeth." Year by year these holy, defenseless, innocent women have appealed and appealed in vain to the State of Massachusetts to pay for their losses. Still "the Lord Seeth" that Massachusetts permitted the outrage, and refused all just compensation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a point of order: that the remarks of the gentleman are not relevant to the subject pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot see the relevancy of the argument to this bill, which is for the reconstruction of various States of the Union known as those lately in rebellion. The gentleman must be aware that his remarks are irrelevant.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. For a question only. I cannot yield for any remarks, as my time is nearly up.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not desire to ask any question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am sorry the gentleman has run short in his catechism. [Laughter.] I was going to refer to another State, if I am not out of order. I presume I shall be in order if I can move an amendment. Is the bill open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to say, and think I can say it in order, that if every State that has permitted a mob or a riot to take place, or in which life and property are not safe, or in which republican forms of government are wanting, is to be put under military dictatorship, (and these are the reasons given why the southern States are so put under,) then this bill should be so amended as to include Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, and these States should also be deprived of their representatives in both Houses of Congress, and more particularly New Hampshire, the constitution of which to-day precludes Catholics and other denominations from holding office. If any State of the Union needs reconstruction it is not Maryland, the mother of Liberty in this country, but New Hampshire, the only country in this world—as there is but one in the next—from which men are excluded on account of religion.

The SPEAKER. When the bill shall be open to amendment, if the gentleman then offers his amendment his remarks would be germane.

Mr. ROBINSON. I submit to the rulings of the Speaker, which are almost always correct.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to raise a point of order. The gentleman from New York having traveled through Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, ought to be permitted to come back to his own State of New York to explain to this House the draft riots in which innocent men were killed—

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. In which the colored orphan asylum was burned to the ground by his own Democratic constituents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. Would it not be in order for the gentleman to explain all that?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] has taken one of my favorite topics which are ruled out of order. I was coming to that riot, in which a brave Irishman and worthy Democrat died in defense of our glorious flag in putting down that mob. I was going to say something about its origin, but we have had no congressional committee as yet appointed to inform us whether New York also wants reconstruction and a military dictator. If Mr. Hoffman had been elected Governor it undoubtedly would. I should like to say more on this point if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman took good care, in his long, rambling speech, not to come down to his own city.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like, by speaking on that subject, to oblige the gentleman; but the Speaker's decision prevents both of us from further indulgence, and I must decline to yield any further. I must say, however, that while I shall always obey with pleasure the rulings of the Speaker, I cannot see how my remarks are out of order. All these reconstruction bills have been based upon the New Orleans, Memphis, and other mobs and riots. I cannot see why it is not entirely germane to the subject under discussion to show, as New York, Philadelphia, and Boston have had more serious riots than Mobile, Memphis, or New Orleans, and did not need reconstruction or military governors, that the southern States, where life is quite as safe, and religious liberty much better secured, should not have imposed upon them a despotism so cruel and antagonistic to the spirit of our institutions.

Sir, as to the New Orleans riot, it looked very like a preconcerted scheme to influence the fall elections against the Democrats of the North. There is no doubt that the meeting of the defunct convention was an illegal assemblage. Parties had come from Louisiana to this city to see if they could obtain congressional support in their rebellion against the government which they themselves under a Republican member of this House and under President Lincoln had established. It was urged in secret caucus of the Republican members of Congress that they had better not adjourn the Thirty-Ninth Congress then in session, for some important matters might come to them from New Orleans. General Sheridan had been applied to by the president of that convention to see whether, if it assembled, he would grant military protection. He replied that he would disperse the mob and the convention together. The president then abandoned all idea of calling the convention and came North. In his absence and the absence of General Sheridan a minority of that convention got together, having somehow made a president pro tempore without any authority, in the person of a man whom the convention had formerly refused to elect as its president, and having held public meetings to fire the hearts of the most ignorant classes of society, declaring that every man, woman and child in the interest of the Lincoln-Banks government should be killed, and urging that these ignorant classes thus stimulated to the killing point should come armed in procession to the convention. That convention, thus heralded, thus planned in Washington and New Orleans or in both, with assurances of support from Congress, came together with processions of these inflamed and ignorant classes, with music, banners, and arms, and all "the pomp and circumstance of war." The first shot fired was by a negro at a municipal officer.

Sir, this was the beginning of the riot. Had the police of New York been so assailed and their arrests so rescued, the streets would have run with blood or the guilty parties in the procession would have been secured. Unfortunately Sheridan, who had declared that he would disperse the convention, was away. The military allowed the illegal mobs in the streets and in convention to prevail over the municipal authorities, and the howl for vengeance and blood swept down truth and reason before it.

Mr. KELLEY. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman again, but he is wrong in saying that the gentleman to whom he refers testified that he could get support from Congress. The gentleman from New York will find if he examines the record that the gentleman referred to stated that he did not find here the support he had expected.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Robinson.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, the gentleman did come here. He got encouragement enough to proceed to call that illegal and revolutionary body together. The proceedings of the Republican caucus here showed that parties here were cognizant of the movement. The gettters-up of that convention had been the most bitter secessionists, voting to take Louisiana out of the Union, making speeches against our flag and our Union, one of them since removed by General Sheridan. The gentleman who stated that a letter signed by three members of Congress was in existence, was not called by the committee, though his attendance was requested by the minority of the committee. The gentleman to whom I refer is, I believe, the so-called Governor of Louisiana, now in this city, Mr. Flanders.

Mr. KELLY. No sir; it was Judge Howell who swore that he did not get the moral support of Congress.

Mr. ROBINSON. At all events the man who said he had seen the letter was not called by the committee, because, I presume, they did not want too much information. That the riot was planned to influence the fall elections of 1865, I have no doubt, and such will be found the fact if ever a full and impartial investigation can be had.

Sir, the South is not represented here to-day. Loyal and disloyal are both excluded, though it is admitted there are people now waiting for admission numerous enough, after stooping their necks to the military yoke, to comprise ten States in our Union. The chain is eating into their flesh, the blood is oozing from their pores, while we apparently infuriated into madness by the spirit of revenge, are dancing on their prostrate bodies to the music of reconstruction.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I suppose the gentleman is referring to Andersonville?

Mr. ROBINSON. No, sir, I am not. Those who shriek for more blood and suffering may unfold the gory record of Andersonville. That record is terrific enough and ever to be condemned. But there may be exhibited a worse spirit than was manifested at Andersonville. That has been claimed by the rebels as a military necessity. But there is a spirit of wrong, a spirit of Satan, a spirit entirely inconsistent with the spirit of the age and of all religion, which without the poor excuse of military or other necessity shouts for vengeance and yells for blood. The present fall elections are approaching: again must the horrors of Andersonville be revamped, revarnished, and rehearsed: committees at enormous expenses wrung from a suffering people be published in huge volumes and scattered broadcast over the land to renew the wearied spirit of carnage and revenge. The poet Moore represents Erin sitting on the banks of the Boyne, her Andersonville, the very mention of whose name always renewed the spirit of hell, which the spirit of Christ had almost conquered:

"When will this end, ye powers of good?"

She weeping asks forever.

But only hears from out that flood

The demon answer, 'Never!'

And never shall we have reconstruction till reconciliation fans its holy spark into a vivifying flame. Never, while men who should be pleading for forgiveness as they hope to be forgiven crawl around the tombstones of the bloody past like another "Old Mortality," with incessant mallet and steeled chisel deepening the records of human frailty which the winds and rains of Heaven were mercifully providing to obliterate.

"A canting crew,
So smooth, so godly, yet so devilish, too,
Who, armed at once with Bibles and with whips,
Blood on their hands and Scripture on their lips,
Tyants by creed and torturers by text,
Make this life hell in honor of the next."

Let "bygones be bygones" if you ever mean to let us become one people again. If you mean to keep us forever apart, say so and be honest. We have fought the South with their Johnstons and their Stonewall Jacksons, and they, by our superior numbers and resources, are at our feet. The prodigal son, at whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] recently sneered, has returned from scenes of dissipation and riotous living. If you mean to take him back, do so, and kill the fatted calf. If you mean to slay the prodigal son and keep the fatted calf kicking up its heels around the barn-yard, say so. Do something; but do not talk reconstruction while you are plotting disunion. If the erring wife has returned, take her to your bosom, or if you cannot do this, cast her from you forever. Do not be reconstructing her into another and different person, for that would not be reconciliation, but bigamy. [Laughter.] If you mean to live with her, banish from beneath your roof, as you would a spirit from hell, every croaking miscreant who would shriek into both your ears the follies and the crimes which you both committed and which led to your separation. If you mean to restore to the weeping Union its former children, oh give her back her darling boy, and not the sickly, fairy child with which you would mock a mother's prayer.

Sir, these are words of truth and soberness. I believe the speediest way to reconstruction is honest reconciliation and mutual forgiveness. I stand not here to justify the South. While she was in rebellion she was my enemy; in submission she becomes again my friend. I would not inflict upon her one single unnecessary humiliation. Of crimes against us she has been guilty, but who can cast the first stone of innocence? I tell you that there were more crimes against life, person, and property perpetrated in Massachusetts since the rebellion was put down than in South Carolina; crimes deeper and more damnable, some even nameless, for which no punishment was inflicted, not even expulsion from the legislative body of which their perpetrators were members. I tell you that life and person and property have been more unsafe, that crimes against them have been more numerous in one single northern district than in the entire State of North Carolina. Life, liberty, and property to-day are in more jeopardy in Tennessee, which you do not propose to reconstruct or control, than in any other portion of the world.

Let me go back and say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] that I never read the article from the Mobile Times to which he referred. I do not know, nor is it my business to inquire, whether he is a Catholic or a Presbyterian. I do not profess to be the champion of any religious denomination. I was simply showing that people who burned churches dedicated to the service of the living God, and spat in the faces of defenseless women, should be slow to charge upon other localities a want of safety to person and property.

Mr. KELLEY. I prosecuted the cases and I never heard of such an allegation before. If it were so I think I was in a position to have heard it.

Mr. ROBINSON. If they were not guilty of spitting in women's faces they have enough to account for instead of hunting up others' crimes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. This bill has nothing to do with the burning of churches or spitting in women's faces.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. This is a bill supplementary to the reconstruction act, and the burning of churches or spitting into women's faces, as the gentleman from Illinois states, has nothing to do with the subject.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. That being the case I rise to move that the speeches hereafter be confined to five minutes, and shall be confined to the pending subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the floor and cannot be taken off it for that purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to any further interruptions of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. He has the floor and has uttered no disorderly words that would take him off it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker how many minutes have I left?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Sir, we have not got at the entire secret of this legislation. Its authors strike at the distinguished Attorney General of the United States through the prostrate South, on which they can further trample, rather than answer his arguments. They want also to show their teeth at the President of the United States. Sir, I have been pained, sitting here from day to day, listening to remarks in reference to the President, which, if it were parliamentary, I would denounce as ribaldry. I have been pained to witness the degeneracy in the debates of Congress since I was here twenty-five years ago in the capacity of a correspondent. As a Clay Whig then I used to denounce the Democratic party daily for lack of dignity and for assumption of power; but, oh, how changed since then? Is it not degeneracy when members on the floor will rise from day to day and in a spirit utterly disgraceful to American citizens—

Mr. PILE. I rise to a question of order. I ask if this course of remark is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair must decide that it is not in order for the gentleman to speak of the conduct of his fellow-members as disgraceful. He may say that it is unjust, but to say that it is disgraceful is a personal reflection, which is not considered parliamentary.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course I yield to the decision of the Speaker. It seems perhaps a little Pickwickian to say that a man's actions are unjust and yet not disgraceful. But, sir, I will say, I trust in order, that I have been pained to hear abuse of the President of the United States. I believe that any one who would try to degrade the President of this great Republic in the eyes of the world is a greater traitor to our institutions than those who starved our prisoners at Andersonville or plotted treason under Jefferson Davis. It would be a greater calamity to have the President, the head of our country, made a hissing and a scorn to the rest of the world than the continuance of all Jefferson Davis's forces in the field for forty years. I have been particularly pained by the conduct of a committee of this House, which seems to act upon the principle, which was formerly followed in Ireland, of hanging men for being suspected of being suspicious!

Sir, there is one in our list of Presidents who is, and I trust ever will be, supreme in the affections of the American people. Upon his pinnacle of glory he now stands, and there let him stand forever. I say that, with that one exception, and perhaps without exception at all, no one of our Presidents could have stood the searching investigation which Andrew Johnson has successfully endured at the hands of this energetic committee. That investigation has proved that he is the purest man, with perhaps this one exception, who ever occupied the presidential chair. I doubt whether the household of George Washington or of Thomas Jefferson, or of any other save that of his own, could have stood the ordeal. The committee, not seeming contented with examining into everything themselves, have an attendant, for whom we have no name, and for whose services I hope there will be no pay, who hunts up information for them, descending to visit haunts of perjury and crime and the convicts' cells, raking the bottoms of these dens of iniquity to see if anything can be found to be bribed or suborned to testify against the executive head of this nation, that he and the people at whose head he stands may be degraded in the eyes of the world; eavesdropping and keyholing around the back and under entrances of the White House, and kneeling to its scullions to see whether they can find out what the President eats or drinks, or what he does before he goes to bed.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Mr. BROOMALL. I must raise the question of order that the gentleman's remarks are not relevant to the question under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not like to check the gentleman from New York, who appears disposed to take a wide range, but he does not see what relevancy the examination of the scullions of the White House has to the military reconstruction bill. Perhaps the gentleman may be able to explain its relevancy.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, sir, I had understood that the President and the Attorney General were the sole cause of this session. I cannot understand why all this interruption and these calls to order are now made by a party who in almost every speech delivered, either in the last or the present Congress, made executive action the pretext for these unconstitutional reconstruction bills. If the President's failings are urged as an argument for the severity of these measures, may not his virtues be pleaded against them?

But I shall try to continue my remarks in order. I thought of moving to lay this whole matter on the table. I believe that would be in order, notwithstanding the pendency of the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. My opinion is, as I said on opening, that this measure is brought in, not because the South has done anything to call for this new legislation, but to oppose the action of the President and his distinguished legal adviser; and I am trying to show that there is nothing in the executive action to justify it. After descending to the most unjustifiable means in search of scandal, to be printed at vast expense and to the disgrace of the nation, after two years of searching and swearing, no man here can stand up and make one single charge against Andrew Johnson, either as citizen or President; and his persecutors, after all their searches, reputable or otherwise, stand mute when challenged, as we now challenge them, to report a single charge against him.

Nor has his patriotic family escaped, for even on this floor we have heard their names dragged in to serve base party purposes. Sir, the charming hospitality of that Mansion, the spotless purity of the character of its inmates, the weeds of woe scarcely removed which told of a gallant son dying in the military service of his country, and a lovely daughter widowed by the same holy service, might have protected that household from the prying propensity of committees and the things that pander to their purposes. Well might I say, sir, that even the household of Washington or Madison or Jackson could not have stood the ordeal through which our present Chief Magistrate has passed.

Sir, the character of Andrew Johnson defies the viper that bites the file. There is, perhaps, no better example of American character than his. Born in the humble walks of life; reared in lessons of industry, virtue, and religion; self-educated, self-supported, and self-reliant; rising by that American rule of gradation from a town commissioner and mayor of Greenville and trustee of its academy to be member successively of both Houses of the Tennessee Legislature; a member of this House, in which he proved himself during his repeated terms of reelection an able, upright, and eloquent statesman; urging high considerations of national policy, inculcating love and harmony between the North and South; denouncing then as now all usurpations of power by the General Government; defending that sacred doctrine of our Constitution, State rights, which now, through the folly of its violent friends, has been crushed to earth, but will rise again; jealously guarding the Treasury from plunderers; defending the rights of naturalized citizens; introducing in 1845 and, by determination and indomitable tenacity of purpose, carrying and marching with it through both Houses of Congress and over executive vetoes, the homestead law; then Governor of the State of Tennessee; then Senator of the United States, where he stood true when almost every southern Senator faltered and fell. Then appointed by President Lincoln military Governor of Tennessee, saving, by his firmness and bravery, the capital of that State by opposing its evacuation. Then nominated by the Republican party on a platform on which he still stands and which they have deserted, hurling curses like all deserters at those who remain true; himself and that platform, since abandoned by its framers, contributing largely to the success of the ticket which without them would not have been successful. Then President of the United States; a southern man true to the North; presiding over a northern Congress unforgiving to the South; himself the providential link around which the returning emotions of union and harmony will yet crystallize and cluster when the enmities of the present hour will be forgotten or remembered only to be deplored. Wise in forethought, brave in danger, forgiving in victory, posterity will award to him a high position among American Presidents, equal to any, if not superior to all save one.

The historian Rollin, in sketching the character of Cyrus, thus describes his beau ideal of a statesman and patriot:

"But an inward stock of goodness, compassion, and gentleness toward the unhappy; an air of moderation and reserve, even in prosperity and victory; an insinuating and persuasive behavior; the art of gaining people's hearts and attaching them to him more by affection than interest; a constant, unalterable care always to have right upon his side, and to imprint such a character of justice and equity upon all his conduct as his very enemies are forced to revere; and lastly, such a clemency as to distinguish those that offend through imprudence rather than malice, and to leave room for their repentance by giving them opportunity to return to their duty. These are qualities rarely found in the most celebrated conquerors of antiquity, but which shone forth most conspicuously in Cyrus."

Sir, I tell you and this House that Andrew Johnson does not deserve and can despise all these persecutions heaped upon him. The people of these United States, forgetting all his trivial faults and remembering his great virtues; the independent tiller of his own soil, secured to him as a homestead through the foresight of Andrew Johnson; the naturalized citizen, enjoying his rights largely through the opposition of Andrew Johnson to Nativism and Know-Nothingism; the northern people, remembering how he stood as a tower of strength against the inroads of secession and disunion, and the South remembering that he received the most violent abuse which any man ever received because he contended that there were rights and should be clemency for the fallen: these will win for him the gratitude of all true citizens of a restored and united country; while those who are persecuting him and seeking to secure and perpetuate disunion and strife through these measures falsely called reconstruction bills will be execrated by their posterity, who will efface their forefathers' names from the tombstones of their burial-places, or apply to the Legislatures of their several States to change their names that they may get rid of the disgrace of being the descendants of their ancestors! I feel no hesitation in believing that Jefferson Davis will, with all his faults and crimes and follies, stand better with posterity than will any one who by vote or voice or deed, after the military necessity had passed, struck or attempted to strike one star from our glorious constellation of equal and sovereign States, or dimmed its luster within the Federal Union. The genius of American liberty around each State beneath her banner draws the magic circle of the republican church, and on the head of him who dares to invade with hostile foot the sanctity of that circle she will launch the awful curse of her eternal hatred; and in the fire of that hatred and the withering power of that curse his memory will shrivel into nothingness or live only in the stench of its quenching.

But, sir, there is another suggestion I wish to make, inasmuch as I believe that all this legislation is instigated simply through a desire to influence the next presidential election. This truth is so patent that it is difficult to look serious when denying it. I urge, then, against further legislation of this kind that the next President is already chosen, and the gentlemen on the other side cannot help it. The people have already anticipated and rendered useless all caucuses and conventions and their concomitant corruption and log-rolling. The other side, though they are afraid to trust him, and are plotting to weaken him, cannot prevent his election. They dare not put up any of the recognized advocates of their principles. [Laughter.] They will be compelled to vote for him, and when elected they will try to use him for their own purposes. Need I say that in that they will fail, and failing in it, they will denounce him as they denounce Andrew Johnson, and as they had already begun to denounce President Lincoln. Had President Lincoln lived, the more conservative, the better half of the Republican party, who now seem afraid to break away from their bell-wethers, would have been with us in sustaining his policy of restoration, and the more radical portion of the party would have been howling to-day for his impeachment, as I venture to predict, and am willing to risk all the character of prescience in politics I might wish to get credit for that before our next President gets through with them—the first session of next Congress—they will be clamoring for his impeachment. I need not say that our next President, if he lives, will be Ulysses S. Grant.

"There's a divinity that shapes our ends," and that divinity has shown His Almighty hand throughout our history. Whether it was Washington or Lincoln or Johnson, just as we wanted him, the man fitted for the times appeared. And now, after having led our armies with a power and energy never witnessed in any war before, and when there is danger of any mere politician playing the demagogue and pandering to the excited passions of the multitude, the man for the crisis, in whom all classes have confidence, who is above the arts of the demagogue, and has power with the people to dispense with the wire-pullers and act for the public good, steps into the place which needs him.

And now, sir, for the few minutes which remain to me let me say that the policy which I would adopt has been well and wisely stated by my illustrious constituent, Henry Ward Beecher. Mr. Beecher was at Peekskill, on his Mount Sinai, and there the Almighty revealed from Heaven to him the true doctrine of reconstruction, which he wrote in his Cleveland letter, and which should be engraved on tablets of stone.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a point of order. I insist that the rule should be enforced, and that the gentleman should keep to the question. His remarks are certainly not relevant to the subject before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the gentleman from Iowa say that a message from Heaven is not in order in this House? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman raises the question of order that the inscription of Mr. Beecher's letter upon tablets of stone is not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall then adopt his sentiments as my own, and hope they may then be in order. [Laughter.] Here are his words:

"Our theory of government has no place for a State except in the Union." * * * * * "The Army Reconstruction—Mr. Logan.

HO. OF REPS.

becomes indispensable to local government and supersedes it. The Government at Washington is called to interfere in one and another difficulty."

"Our Government, wisely adapted to its own proper functions, is utterly devoid of those habits and unequipped with the instruments which fit a centralized government to exercise authority in remote States over local affairs."

"The Federal Government is unfit to exercise minor police and local government, and will inevitably blunder when it attempts it. To keep a half score of States under Federal authority but without national ties and responsibilities; to oblige the central authority to govern half the territory of the Union by Federal civil offices and by the Army is a policy not only ungenial to our ideas and principles, but preëminently dangerous to the spirit of our Government."

"It is, in fact, a course of instruction preparing our Government to be despotic and familiarizing the people to a stretch of authority which can never be other than dangerous to liberty."

"I hear with wonder and shame and scorn the fear of a few that the South once more in adjustment with the Federal Government will rule this nation."

"Unless we turn the Government into a vast military machine there cannot be armies enough to protect the freedmen while southern society remains insurrectionary. If southern society is calmed, settled, and occupied and soothed with new hopes and prosperous industries, no armies will be needed; riots will subside."

"Whether we regard the whole nation or any section of it or class in it the first demand of our times is entire reunion."

"For the sake of the freedmen, for the sake of the South and its millions of our fellow-countrymen, for our own sake, and for the great cause of freedom and civilization, I urge the immediate reunion of all the parts which rebellion and war have shattered."

With this message Mr. Beecher came down to his people, as Moses descended, with words of wisdom from Heaven. But in his absence the Aarons of his congregation had set up a new god, a blatant calf. He found his pulpit in possession of Governor Brownlow and a godless crew, who were "swinging round the circle" after the President. Amid the cheers of his people he heard Brownlow, with the spirit of hell condensed into one sentence, and embracing the extreme radical creed of reconstruction, shouting: "First kill, then burn, then survey;" shoot and otherwise kill the men, cut the throats of the women, and dash out the brains of the infants sleeping in their cradles; and then, for fear men, women, or children might linger through the massacre or recover from the carnage, burn the houses over their heads that their gore and gashes might be licked with the tongue of flame or consumed with its breath; and then confiscate. Such were the terrible blasphemies which greeted his message from Heaven. I forgive him for dashing the tablets of stone to pieces. God never condescended to give him another copy!

Sir, did time permit, I should ask attention to words of wisdom from others who in the past and present have pleaded for mutual good will, forgiveness, and reconciliation: from George Washington, from Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, Horace Greeley, and others, who, "with malice towards none, with charity for all," would bind up the nation's wounds; and contrast them with those who in the Radical column, with Brownlow at their head, and "all hell following in the rear," are shouting "kill, burn, and survey, impeach, and confiscate, and when the South asks for restoration give them the penitentiary of hell."

Sir, we have been playing political thimble-ri- with the South, and who can tell under which thimble the little joker which will secure restoration is to be found. The lower the South has bent the knee the more intolerable have become the terms of pardon; even kindly words from any friend of the South were answered with greater indignity, till finally conditions are exacted which none but bullies would demand or cravens yield, for "the knee that is forced had been better unbent." But there is hope ahead. In after years, from a common bond of love, beneath a common flag, from a common brotherhood born of our northern children, mingling in holy family ties with the children of the South, men will look back and wonder that there was wickedness enough in the world to inflict such injuries upon one another; but will bless the peacemakers among their ancestors and curse the miscreants who fanned so long the flame of contention. Nay, I shall live to see that day; and shall not be ashamed to look my children in the face and to say that there was one who fought the rebels throughout the rebellion, but when the war was over pleaded for forgiveness, believed in southern honor, and voted as he believed; who never attempted "the future's portal with the past's blood-rusted key;" who would rather grasp the bloody hand of an open foe than touch the slimy finger of the coward that skulked from danger; who never kicked the undermost dog nor struck a fallen foe.

"When the foe has knocked under, to tread on him then—

By the fist of my father, I blush for thee, Ben!"

Let me say a closing word for my fellow-citizens of the South. I cannot forget that they, too, have sorrows that might well arouse revenge. There are vacant chairs around many a lonely southern hearth. There are maddening memories which matched against our own and shrieked into each others ears would keep us for ever apart. They have hearts to feel and eyes to weep for loved ones lost; for husbands buried on distant battle-fields, fathers slaughtered in the mountain passes, and sons taken away by early death, all buried in nameless and unknown graves. They fought gallantly, but they are down, and cursed be the hand that smites the fallen. I long to see them back in the Union, that they and we, forgiving and forgetting the past, and girding up our loins for the magnificent future, may enter upon the career of greatness and glory which stretches away before us.

I have sought to elevate my own mind above the vengeance of a divided present, and have looked to the brightening flag of a united future as the inheritance of glory for a common posterity. In days gone by I learned my creed from Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, John M. Clayton and John J. Crittenden. I stand by the record and refuse the teaching of Brownlow and Phillips.

I see in the future an ocean-bound Republic; in the immediate future a hundred millions of her united people. Where but a few stars flickered in her sky I see constellations blazing; the flutter of her flag is reflected on every sea, the plash of her propeller vexes every ocean; and to that future I summon back our brethren of the South, for without them success would be a failure, and our glory would be but shame.

"Oh would thou wert near me, my southern brother, I love thee as dear as the son of my mother; I am lonely and sad since the day that we parted, My lips have the tone of a maid broken-hearted; But come, from the future fresh flowers we'll gather, And sing the sweet songs of our Union forever."

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN A. LOGAN, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 12, 1867,

On the supplementary reconstruction bill, and in reply to Mr. ROBINSON, of New York.

Mr. LOGAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It was not my intention to have taken any part in this debate, but I cannot get my own consent to sit and listen quietly any longer to such extraordinary speeches as have again and again been pronounced on this floor within the last few days. If the wisdom of the policy of excluding from a representation in this Hall the South had ever cost me a doubt it could never again cost me another. More earnest advocates of their political theories and more eloquent apologists for their darkest crimes traitors have not in the South or elsewhere than they have here. A resolution blotting out the Constitutions of the United States and the respective States is recommended by one gentleman, who evidently means thereby to intimate that in his opinion at least this House had already destroyed everything like fundamental law in the land, and trampled ruthlessly in the dust the liberties of the people.

Mr. ELDRIDGE: That is what I thought and what I meant.

Mr. LOGAN. I so understood the gentleman, and the thought occurred to me at the time, sir, that it was strange indeed, passing strange, that the gentleman did not discover during those four fearful years of blood and carnage through which the true friends of humanity, liberty, the Constitution and the Union had to pass to deliver them from impending destruction who it was assailing them then.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I decline. Why did it not occur to the gentleman, when mighty armies of brave men, commanded by skillful generals, were hovering in a menacing attitude around this devoted city, spurning our country's flag, mocking our patriotic professions, insulting loyal citizens, ignoring private rights, and perpetrating public outrages, that the Constitution, the Union, and liberty were in danger then? Why does the gentleman wait until the war is over, the Constitution is no longer in peril, and those who stood fast and firm near it and by it, when its banner was streaming on the breeze of battle, are attempting to devise the most practicable and politic means to restore at the earliest moment to this whole land permanent and healthful tranquility and prosperity? Why does he wait for such a moment to announce the startling discovery that our Constitution is threatened and liberty is in peril?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman desire me to answer his question?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; one interruption encouraged invites another. Is it not strange, I repeat, that the same gentlemen who are so easily alarmed now about the perils that compass about the Constitution of the country and the liberties of the people while peace is benignly smiling upon us, saw no terror or threat in the glitter of bayonets or the frown of batteries when our beloved land was swarming with millions of open enemies and the earth was trembling under the martial tread of serried hosts and the loud roar of angry artillery? Then when there was war, was no peace, they could raise the cry of "peace, peace;" and when peace at last has come they aver it has not come, but that we are still in the midst of a bloody war, a war upon the Constitution we fought to save, a war upon the liberties we bled to preserve. "Treat your southern brethren kindly, win them by affection," is the cry of the Democracy. "Rather," said one of them, "that Jeff. Davis and his coadjutors had succeeded than that the President of the United States should be impeached." Such language is worthy only of a representative of South Carolina or some other rebel whose hands are red with loyal blood. No wonder that in a party boasting of such types of patriotism there should be many, very many, enthusiastic followers, who saw nothing reprehensible in the conduct of the open, avowed, defiant, and beligerent enemies of the Republic, but who do find much to deplore and denounce in the adhesion now to principle of those who stood like a wall of adamant around our flag when the mad waves of secession threatened to deluge with blood the eternal rock upon which our fathers and their fathers had planted it. Our dead I suppose are to sleep in forgotten graves, while the rebel slain must be apotheosized, and we who fought with and survive the brave boys in blue—

"Who fighting fell, and falling fought," are to be stigmatized with opprobrious epithets, while the traitors who thirsted for our blood are to be meekly and sweetly called "our brethren."

Mr. MNGEN. I rise to a question of order. My point of order is, that the gentleman is not discussing the bill before the House, as the rules require him to do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not seen that the gentleman from Illinois has wandered at all from the legitimate limits of debate. He is debating the question of reconstruction. If, however, the gentleman can point to any specific remarks which have been in violation of the rule the Chair will pass upon them.

Mr. MUNGEN. The gentleman has not alluded at all to the question of reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that this question of reconstruction grows out of the war in which the country has recently been engaged, and the gentleman from Illinois, in the commencement of his speech, is laying a foundation for the discussion of the question by a reference to the commencement of the war and the circumstances surrounding it.

Mr. LOGAN. What I am anxious to learn, Mr. Speaker, is, upon what foundation rests this flippant and gratuitous charge repeatedly made against the Republican party on this floor to the effect that we are trampling liberty under foot and destroying the rights and privileges of a portion of the American people? Wherein have we violated the Constitution? Was it in crushing the rebellion? I have no doubt every copperhead in the North would say yes. We did carry the emblem of our national glory and greatness from the rivers and the lakes of the West to the bays and the gulfs of the South, where it waves to-day, and will wave forever; but in doing so we innocently thought, hoped, and believed then, and still honestly think, hope, and believe that we were erecting around the Constitution impregnable bulwarks, and laying for liberty a deeper and a broader foundation in the gratitude, confidence, and affections of our people. We never dreamt that for every rebel we killed in the South we were to make an eternal enemy in the North; and we do think it amounts to a riddle beyond the comprehension of mortal wits how it is that very many of the brave men who fought us, and whom we had to literally overwhelm before we could conquer, yet now that they are conquered are much more ready to ask forgiveness and forget the past and be friends, as we all ought to be again, than are their allies, who, however deep their sympathies with them may have been while the war was raging, took special pains to let the danger pass before they gave it an airing. God forbid that the day shall ever dawn upon this Republic when the patriots whose patriotism won them crutches and wooden limbs shall have apologies and explanations to make for their public conduct, to patriots who boast of and abuse the privilege of eulogizing as their brethren the men whose sabers drank loyal blood and whose bullets shot away loyal limbs. The truth is, the great wrong that discomfited Democracy feels deepest is that the people at home neither feel nor think that there ought to be northern rebels enough in this House to let the southern rebels in.

The next greatest wrong that they have to complain of is, that the men who had the pluck to stand by those who in the field had to fight our country's battles presumptuously aspire to make our laws. I think thus far they have vindicated their claims to the world's respect alike in the field and in the Halls of legislation. What is the basis upon which they fought? Simply that rebellion was a crime. They triumphed. Now upon what basis have they legislated? Simply that rebellion was a crime, and they will triumph again. The people will never require us to fight on one principle and legislate on another; to shed our blood on the field and then come here to make apologies for it to men who wanted us whipped. I hold now, and always expect to hold, that no man has a right to cross the threshold of this House and claim a seat on this floor who did not dare during the war to openly stand by and claim the protection of the flag that floats over this Capitol. The Government that is organized so loosely and administered so feebly that traitors of yesterday can be among the rulers of to-morrow can neither long survive nor long deserve to survive. And this Government can have no enemies in the South half as much to be dreaded as that whining northern friend who would clothe with power in this Government to-morrow the man whose blade was drawn to stab the Constitution and the Union but yesterday. When the South can be loyally represented on this floor upon the basis proposed by Congress the problem of reconstruction will cease to vex the discussions of this Hall.

The prime, sole, and supreme object of the Republican party is to reestablish this Government upon a sure foundation of loyalty, against which the frothy waves of treason may fret forever in vain. We have survived one rebellion, and the sage suggestions of past experience warns us that it will be wiser to prevent another rebellion than to too confidently expect to survive it. Rebellion, secession, and treason are like all other crimes and iniquities, and will crop out in every direction upon the smallest perceivable pretext. Put forward, then, the loyal and true, and hold at a respectful and indifferent distance the disloyal and untrue until we can see some voluntary evidence that they have finally awoke to the consciousness that they are criminals and ought to be grateful that they have not been ignominiously branded by the judgment of a competent tribunal as such. The whole secret, however, of the wailing and gnashing of teeth that we hear among the Democracy is not because we have insisted that rebels shall be held under restraint and loyal men promoted, that our flag shall be respected at home as well as abroad, but it is simply the reason a rebel Irishman gave to a loyal Irishman who captured him on the field. Said the Hibernian in blue to his rebel countryman, "Why, Jimmy, my boy, what are you doing on that side?" "That side, indade," answered Jimmy, "and is this not the Dimmercratic side?" [Laughter.] The Irishman thought that the rebel side must necessarily be the Democratic side, and I guess that my friend, the gentleman from Brooklyn, has a similar idea in his head yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not attempt to answer the question which the gentleman has addressed to me, because I believe he does not wish an answer. If he does I should be glad to give it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] for a reply?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think that I have said anything that he can answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. If the gentleman wishes me to answer I am ready to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines, as the Chair understands, to be interrupted.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us examine a little further into this question. I perhaps may not have stated all the reasons that actuated these gentlemen in denouncing this side of the House, and thereby denouncing every loyal man in the country, every man who has shown his loyalty by his efforts to restore this Government on a proper basis. The recent rebellion while it was in progress was led by men who belonged to the same party to which the gentleman from Brooklyn now belongs, and the same party to which I belonged until I became so thoroughly ashamed of it that I left it, and is it not a little remarkable that the same disloyal stench which drove me out seems to have attracted my friend from Brooklyn into it? [Laughter.]

The reason why these gentlemen desire today to bring into disrepute the action of members of this House is because their action is calculated to prevent a portion of the people of the southern country, who are in full sympathy with them, from voting and holding office. Who are they? Outspoken rebels, who rose in arms against the Government; the men who conspired to destroy this glorious Republic. Because these men are disfranchised and prevented from exercising the rights of American citizens gentlemen on the other side object to our proposed plan of reconstruction. Sir, they would have the southern States reconstructed according to the plan of Andrew Johnson, the gentleman who is so immaculate that if we should attempt to impeach him it will, according to the gentleman from Brooklyn, amount to a national calamity. What was the plan of Andrew Johnson? Why, sir, that plan proposed to declare that those States that had engaged in rebellion had never lost any of their rights in the Government; that neither they nor their citizens had forfeited any of their privileges under the Constitution of the United States. In other words, that treason was not a crime; that rebels were patriots. It proposed to invite the rebels to hold elections and send to this Hall per se secessionists and traitors. In short, to construct a new party in reconstructing the Government in which the secession rebels of the South might unite with the copperhead rebels of the North, capture the citadel of power here, make treason honorable and loyalty odious. There is nothing that to regain its lost power the Democratic party would not willingly do. If it could acquire to-morrow more power by crushing under its iron heel the South than it could by succoring it it would hurl at its southern brethren thick and fast—

"Curses of hate and hisses of scorn."

Their history well establishes the fact that—

"Their friendship is a lurking snare,
Their honor but an idle breath,
Their smile the smile that traitors wear,
Their love is hate, their life is death."

Their sympathy with Andrew Johnson's plan of reconstruction and their hostility to the Republican plan of reconstruction is not attributable to the merits or demerits of either plan as a policy for the country, but solely as a party policy.

Now, sir, I maintain that the only true plan upon which these southern States ought to have been reconstructed is by virtue of an organization of military governments, and the principle objection to which I find the bill now pending before this House obnoxious, albeit I shall vote for it, is, that it fails to state sufficiently explicit that the governments of these States were entirely overthrown and destroyed by the treason and rebellion of the people, and that no legal civil governments have existed there since. I would recognize no Governors or other officers pretending to act there now in an official capacity, but would remove them instantaneously. I would insist that when the fiery billows of war rolled over the South that they bore away into the broad ocean of chaos their laws and constitutions as the floods of their own mighty father of waters sweep the drift-wood they gather into the Mexican Gulf, and that according to the laws of war they were subject only to military rule at the hands of their conquerors, and so ought to remain until traitors shall learn how to blush for their crimes, and modestly decline office instead of attempting, as they now do daily, to thrust themselves forward to grasp the reins of a Government that they hate in their hearts. I would put the rebels on probation, and make their return to power depend upon the merits of their penitence.

But let us return to the gentleman's grave charges of outrage and wrong supposed to have been committed by this Congress. To be charitable, we will have to give the gentleman and his party credit for a memory as full of treachery as their southern brethren were of treason. They seem to have forgotten everything they ought to remember, and remember some things

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Logan.

HO. OF REPS.

they certainly ought not only to forget themselves, but want everybody else to forget. They seem to have forgotten the scenes and events that mark the historical epoch through which we have so recently passed, and they seem to have totally forgotten that these pet southern brethren of theirs, when they did occupy seats on this floor gave us practical illustrations of dignity in debate that made of this Hall a "bear garden," and much more attractive to lovers of gladiatorial sports and patrons of the "fancy" than they could have been to the wise, prudent, sedate, and good citizen. When bowie-knives bristled from their breasts, revolvers filled all their pockets, and clubs were substituted among them for canes; when they spoke to a northern legislator in these Halls with a scowl on their brows, threats on their lips, and fingers on triggers. It is true, we have blotted out for them eternally and forever the charming institution under the peculiar influences of which they imbibed these dogmatical and insolent airs; but if, when it was in full blast, they could not remember that the style of manners that might do to drive a gang of slaves would not answer to persuade a congressional peer, it is not at all probable that time enough has yet elapsed for the fact to appear in their manners that they fully and properly realize the fact in all of its moral and political sublimity, that they are not somebody's master yet, and may again subject us to their old style of argument, so peculiarly southern. They seem to have forgotten the price the peace we enjoy to-day has cost this nation, and the crimson currency in which it was paid; the broken hearts with which it filled bruised and troubled bosoms at home; the mangled bodies with which it filled hospitals everywhere, and the lifeless forms of manly beauty with which it filled hundreds of thousands of nameless graves on the far-off battle-planes of the South. They seem to have forgotten the bitter scalding tears that rolled like floods of lava down the fair faces of the loyal mothers, wives, and sisters of this land when the names ineffably dear to them were found announced in the long lists of the killed that were published as a sequel to the first flash of the lightning that reported a battle had been fought; and I dare say they have forgotten that there ever was such a prison as Andersonville, and the long, long catalogue of horrors that brave men had to suffer there for being true to themselves, their Constitution, their flag, their homes, families, and country. Well for such gentlemen would it be if they could occasionally meet, as they wander daily over this broad country, a few of the many wan specters of suffering and woe who were captured by the saintly southern brethren of northern Democrats on fields of strife, thrust into prisons unfit for dogs, and starved till a hale constitution was a wreck, and then left to suffer the worst penalties of privation incident to weather and climate. I could give my friend from Brooklyn illustrations of individual suffering at Andersonville that would make the hair stand on his head, the blood freeze in his veins, and curses spring involuntarily to his lips. I remember one poor boy from my immediate vicinity especially. His name is Dougherty. He went into Andersonville prison without a scar on his young body or a cloud on his fair brow, but under the humanitarianism of southern chivalry he came out without a foot to walk on. They were literally frozen off in prison.

There are thousands of such instances that might be paraded if I had the time or inclination to do it to justify the stern, uncompromising disinclination I feel to call by the gentle term of brother these rebels of the South. When I find in their conduct conclusive proof of contrition, and find them openly opposed to becoming the instruments and tools of northern Democrats, who, while the war was raging, accepted the protection of the stars and stripes, and now have the graceless effrontery to brag that they were false to it, I may, and probably will, then be glad to welcome them back into the Union. But when I do that I wish to be able to go home and face the widows and orphans that swarm the broad prairies of the West, whose weeds of mourning meet us there on the highways and the by-ways, and answer any reasonable question they may have to ask. I recognize the responsibility of a Representative here to his constituency, and I feel that a woman or a child that cannot vote may have as sacred a right to ask me a question as a man that can, and I am simply anxious to prepare myself to meet all such comers. In the silent vigils of the noiseless night many a time and oft have I fancied I could hear, coming on the soft-whispering breezes of the South, from the lowly pillows of loyal soldiers sleeping sweetly where they fell gallantly, the affectionate message: "Be of good cheer: stand fast and firm at duty's sacred post. It was standing there we lost the crown of life to win a crown of glory, and we appeal to you now, from our bright home here in Heaven, to save our offspring from the dire necessity of having to perish as we perished to save from destruction the altars and temples of liberty." And how are we to do this—flattering rebels, tolerating treason, and petting political profligates? I do not recognize the right of the rebel States to insist that no issue not made with them during the war can be legitimately considered now. If they had established a nationality and had been recognized and treated with by the nations of the earth, then such a proposition might per possibility have had some claims to consideration, but otherwise certainly none.

The position I wish to assume so distinctly that it will and cannot be misunderstood is simply this: that treason is a crime, that traitors are criminals, that the law is supreme, that when it is violated expiation must follow; and I hold that mercy to the wicked is cruelty to the just. Here is presented an issue, I admit, with the President. He does not proceed upon the proposition that treason is a crime, that rebels are criminals, and that legal penalties are enforceable. He is so eagerly anxious to forgive that he seems to forget that no forgiveness has ever been proposed yet save as a sequel to penitence. Having failed utterly to establish anything resembling a nationality, the southern States can properly claim the protection of no laws international upon that subject. My consent can never be commanded to ignore the claims that I feel the gallant dead who fell fighting under our flag have upon my devotion to their fame while I live. Let the poet's tribute to the soldier's memory be eternally illustrated in the practical gratitude of the American people when he said:

"On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
While glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead."

And how others feel I cannot tell; but I am free to confess that I feel that it is the memory of those who fought and fell under our flag, who charged rebel batteries, carried rebel heights, vanquished rebel legions, and finally crushed the rebellion, that has a claim upon our respect, care, and veneration far above office-seekers and political partisans.

The gentleman from New York says that he and his friends are bound to have the next President, and that we are bound to impeach him. We have not yet impeached any President, and if in the past we would not it is hardly presumable that in the future we will.

A MEMBER. You would if you could.

Mr. LOGAN. I shall not say what I would do, but until the wishes of the people command here a proper respect I do not think the gentleman need to feel a very serious alarm about what we will do.

The gentleman has nominated General Grant for the presidency, and if General Grant has any enemies I dare say the gentleman's nomination must have made them profoundly happy. General Grant rarely has anything to say, and when he does speak it is generally directly to the point, and from that fact the inference is fair that he will be found more than equal to any occasion that may call on him to take care of the true interests of his fame and fortunes whenever and wherever they may be directly or indirectly threatened. But were I General Grant and really aspiring to the presidency I would give the gentleman notice that if he wanted an office from me his claims to consideration would not depend upon how much, but how little, he had to say in my behalf. [Laughter.] Presidents rarely owe their success to their enemies. General Grant may learn a wholesome lesson from the South about the consequences of falling into bad company hunting for friends.

General Grant is certainly a great and good man. He deserves and enjoys the affection and confidence of this nation. His personal popularity is universal. His military fame has spread—

"From earth's remotest bound to ocean's loneliest shore."

It rests upon the adamant pedestal of success and rises above mortal criticism, and if it can survive the admiration and friendship of home-bound sympathizers with the precious southern brethren, at whose ignominious expense he won his laurels, then, indeed, may his true and real friends rejoice in the conclusion that it is beyond a lingering shadow of doubt more than indestructible. Paradoxes do not amount to phenomena, but nevertheless they rarely pass away unnoticed, and the paradoxical proposition of finding in the self-same member of this House the friend alike of General Grant and Jeff. Davis cannot do so. It is at least worth a passing comment. There is not one single passing shadow of resemblance between the histories, achievements, principles, sentiments, or purposes of the arch-traitor and the loyal general. The one is small, in all things small; the other is great in virtues and talents that rank greatest. The name of the one will go down to posterity a byword of scorn and reproach, while the name of the other will live to be given at the baptismal font to thousands of infant patriots yet to be born; and to me it is a riddle utterly incomprehensible that one and the same man can be at one and the same time alike the friend of Jeff. the traitor and Grant the patriot.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How about Horace Greeley?

Mr. LOGAN. Greeley, indeed! That he is Jeff.'s friend you may prove, but where is the evidence he is Grant's?

I trust that the apparent egotism of an allusion now that is somewhat necessary to myself will be pardoned. I am branded by political and sectional partisans with such epithets as "bloodthirsty," "unforgiving," "unrelenting," &c., &c. How this has been ascertained is inexplicable to me. Who has sought my forgiveness that I have refused to forgive? Forgiveness is taught in the Lord's prayer, but we are not therein instructed to thrust forgiveness upon the unrepentant and the defiant. Forgiveness is not so cheap a virtue that it may be prodigally wasted unasked upon the idle and indifferent. The forgiveness that anticipates repentance will multiply crimes faster than it will reform criminals. When the rebels of the South begin properly to repent and find moral courage enough to make before the world a manly acknowledgment of it, then and not until then will I take into consideration the question of their forgiveness at all. I have no premium to offer in the shape of forgiveness to the insolence of an obstinacy that deigns not to ask for that forgiveness. I would open a gulf between treason and loyalty wide enough to make the dwellers on its opposite shores strangers, and deep enough to swallow legions in arms. I would fill it with waves of fire through which no unrepentant living thing could swim, and over which no soaring philanthropy could fly and survive. Sickly sentimentalism is a great crime-breeder. Impunity for one crime provokes the perpetration of many. Men are but grown-up children, and when you spare the rod you will spoil the child, whether the child be a young child or an old child. I am not one of those who would hesitate to try, convict, condemn, and execute a traitor for treason.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, if it is not a very long one.

Mr. NIBLACK. I would ask the gentleman whether in the summer of 1861, after the war broke out, he did not vote as a member of this House against the expulsion of General John B. Clarke, of Missouri, who had joined the rebellion?

Mr. LOGAN. The Journals of this House show all my votes, and the gentleman might have found all the information I can give him there. I am not in the habit of voting in this House to make unsupported rumors history. A charge may have been filed here against General Clarke, and when the testimony to sustain it was adduced it may have utterly failed, as in his case, according to my recollection, it did. The disposition, however, to make a verdict thus conscientiously rendered by me in defense of an absent and unconvicted member of their own party redound now to my prejudice furnishes another beautiful illustration of Democratic magnanimity and justice. When I cast that vote I voted with the Democratic party; now it is thrown into my teeth by a member of that party as a reproach. It may have been a reckless thing in me then to doubt the natural strong probability that a Democrat was a rebel, and for it perhaps I deserve to be publicly twitted and sharply rebuked; but I will endeavor to see to it for the future that I shall merit never another such a just reprimand for such a graceless reason from such an ungrateful source. [Laughter.]

The unrelenting war waged against me by the Democracy is liable to be misunderstood if looked at superficially. It is not because, as has been suspected by some, I was a Democrat and am one no longer. Dying out as it has been, slowly but painfully, for the last eight years with the dry rot, that party have become too much accustomed to see men of sense withdraw their allegiance from it to make my instance a source of serious irritation. The true reason which explains the malevolence with which they pursue me will be found in the fact that while the recent war was raging the honorable distinction was awarded to me of having put to the sword my full share of their party who fell fighting in front of my command under the spotted flag of treason to support their sentiments and principles. [Loud applause from the floor of the House.]

My attention having been specially called to Horace Greeley, I am free to say I totally disapprove of his sympathy for Jeff. and his peculiar manner of manifesting that sympathy. Had I captured Jefferson Davis and his disposal have been committed to my hands, I would have organized an able court-martial and have given him a fair trial, just sentence, and prompt execution.

Some people are morbidly sensitive about Jeff. Davis. They seem to think that when the name of Cassius honors corruption, chastisement ought therefore to hide its head. They belong to that sickly class of temporizers who would make the enormity of a crime and the rank of the criminal good pleas in bar against their conviction. If Jefferson Davis and his cabinet are criminals, as they are, they ought to be tried; if tried, convicted; if convicted, executed; like all other felons convicted of capital crimes. If they were tried and convicted, as they ought to be, and were I the Chief Magistrate of this Republic no appeal for clemency in their cases could ever reach me; I would let him and them swing till they would pass the point of plotting treason, and smaller traitors might profit by the example of their ignominious fate. Until a traitor or two is tried, convicted, and executed the people of the United States may confidently expect an annual crop of armed traitors to spring from the tenderness with which traitors are treated in this land. So mild has been our mercy that Toombs, the fugitive of yesterday, is back again the swaggerer of to-day. Emboldened by impunity he grows defiant, and seems determined to test the measure of his importance in a last desperate effort to draw toward him the attention of the Government and down upon his crimes the vengeance of the law.

But what has he to fear in a Government where rebels are pardoned before they are tried and where no traitor has ever graced the gallows? John Brown was tried, convicted, and executed; but that was for treason, not against our national Government, but the State of Virginia. When a northern man trespasses upon southern soil and commits treason he has the crime to expiate on the scaffold, but when thousands of southern men attempt to destroy our national Government, notwithstanding the diabolical attempt drenches our whole land with blood and fills it with the piercing wail of widows and orphans and costs thousands of millions of treasure, nevertheless nobody can be tried for it. John Brown did not dip deep enough into treason to make it respectable. Had he managed to kill fifty thousand men before they captured him, according to the new theory, he would have stood on too lofty a pedestal to have been taken down a criminal. But for the life of me I cannot see how the same Government that assisted Virginia to convict John Brown can refuse to try Jeff. Davis. If John Brown was held responsible to the outraged law, why is not likewise Jefferson Davis?

John Brown's surviving kindred can take to their souls one flattering unction at least, to wit, that he did not die in vain. I have again and again seen thousands of Union soldiers marching into battle singing—

"John Brown's body lies moldering in the grave, While his soul goes marching on."

And they never failed to win the fight. There is one man on this continent at the head of a Government that has exhibited nerve enough to rule. When usurpers and traitors are captured and convicted in Mexico we hear at one and the same time of their stern sentence and prompt execution. President Juarez, however, is saluted for his signal exhibition of decision and firmness with howls of horror from the same mercy-begging lips that are eternally whining about the mercy due to Jeff. Why do men professing to love liberty manifest an interest so deep and strange in the fate of the vaulting ambition of royalty when it presumes to invade this republican continent and overleap itself. Has monarchical Governments friends here whose sympathies are too keen to be restrained when tribulation overtakes a toppling throne, and do they presumptuously propose to educate the popular mind of men born free on American soil to catch readily at excuses to denounce republicanism and condole with mourning nobility over executed emperors? I deplore, Mr. Speaker, such exhibitions of party violence as have been again and again recently exhibited on this floor. It serves to remind me mournfully of the debates we had on this floor just before the war. Rebels then used very much such language as their friends employ here now; but it is to be deprecated for better and higher reasons still, and one of them is the consequences which legitimately flow from it to the South. If the Democracy of the North had not taken the South under its wing, those States might and probably would have been in the Union to-day. Well may the South exclaim "save us from our friends."

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that we will pass such a bill as may be understood, properly construed, and energetically executed, and that when it is that it will leave the southern State governments in the hands of men loyal and true and forever prevent disloyal men from employing power and place to foment treason. It is not when they come, but how they come, that is the all-important query with me. I would be glad to welcome them back to-morrow if I were satisfied they were reorganized right, but it is my intention to vote as long as I have a vote here to keep them out until they can come in on the broad basis of loyalty to the Government. And when they can do that I am willing to receive their representatives to the Halls of our national Legislature, and will assist to protect them against anything anywhere prejudicial to any of their legal rights or interests as States. I have seen quite enough of carnage and private and national distress, and long to see the day come again when we shall be as peaceful, prosperous, and happy as we were before that crawling serpent secession sought to strangle us in our national cradle. That day may soon come again if the South will rise up sternly resolved that they will follow Naaman through the Jordan of repentance until the leprosy of treason and Democracy shall be washed out of their political systems. How much they have been benefited by the sympathies of the Democracy they ought by this time to be able to estimate and appreciate. The hour they discover they possess the good sense and courage to repudiate openly and emphatically treason and embrace warmly and sincerely loyalty, they will see dawn upon them the bright morning of their regeneration and deliverance.

The Right of Petition.

REMARKS OF HON. P. VAN TRUMP,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 13, 1867.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition from the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, praying Congress to appropriate the sum of $2,500,000 for the reconstruction of the levees on the Mississippi river, in the State of Arkansas, which had been swept away by the floods. Mr. INGERSOLL objected to its reception upon the ground that there was no such State as Arkansas, since its government was overthrown by the violence of revolution, and that consequently there could be no such body as the Legislature of Arkansas.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Mr. Speaker, if one could be at all astonished in this day of political wonders, nothing could startle the mind more than the fact that objection should be made to the reception of a petition upon a legitimate subject of legislation, and couched in respectful terms, in a Congress of the Representatives of the American people. But nil admirari is a peculiar and appropriate maxim in times of revolution. Such extraordinary principles have been avowed, such unheard-of measures have been adopted by the dominant, I might well say, rampant political party which holds uncontrolled dominion in the Congress of the United States, thus far sanctioned and upheld by the people through the ballot-box, that the mind has become paralyzed, all sensitiveness has become dulled and stunned by the very excess of usurpation and outrage. There seems to be no end to wrong and oppression. The Republican party seems to have become absolutely intoxicated with political power. A spirit of hatred, of revenge, of blind and maddened rage has usurped the province of calm reason, of wise statesmanship, and of Christian charity. The Republican mind is running in a groove upon an inclined plane, and seems to be utterly powerless either to extricate itself from the groove or check its downward career to dissolution and destruction. If no other interests were involved than that of its own existence, if the great principles of the Constitution, the public prosperity, and the peace of the country were not involved and dragged along with it, and threatened to be mingled in one common and inevitable ruin, the calamity might be supported with some degree of equanimity, and no overpowering regrets might be felt at the results of such a headlong career. Whatever is to be the result of this whirlwind of passion and party rage, in whatever way it is to influence the future destiny of Government and people, I hope that result will come quickly, and that the intolerable suspense which now broods over the country may at last be terminated. Better, sir, far better will it be to know our destiny at once; infinitely preferable will it be to have even a fixed and regulated despotism than this vibration between hope and fear, this doubtful struggle between liberty regulated by law and the spasmodic exercise of lawless power through the revengeful action of an intolerant and merciless party spirit.

Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House upon the motion of the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is one of the most extraordinary character which could be presented to the consideration of the Representatives of the American people; though I might well hesitate to pronounce anything extraordinary by way of distinctive pre-eminence among the many startling subjects of legislation which have engaged the attention of Congress for the past few years. What is the proposition? It is nothing less, sir, than a motion to deny to free-born American citizens the sacred right of petition secured to them, if anything yet remains secure, by the express provisions of the Constitution of their country. I know, sir, that in these modern days of advancement it is considered quite unfashionable, if not vulgar and low-bred, to speak of the Constitution in these Halls; I know that the member upon this floor who shall have the extremely bad taste to "offend ears polite" with any ill-timed allusion to the guarantees of that instrument, bought by the best blood of the Revolution and breathed into being by the spirit of compromise and concession, will be met with the supercilious sneers of some, or the less sarcastic smiles of others of our Republican friends on the other side of the House; but, sir, this little band of men who sit around me, and who are sent here by as proud constituencies of freemen as were ever represented in the halls of legislation, are alike indifferent to your derision or reproach. We had a most signal example of the veneration in which the Constitution is held by gentlemen in this House, exhibited on this floor here to-day, amid the merriment and plaudits of delighted members. When the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] reported to the House the proceedings of the conference committee on the military reconstruction bill, in remarking upon the want of pluck of Senators he observed "that some fragments of the old, shattered Constitution had stuck in their kidneys and troubled them at night." I admire the candor, if I cannot commend the principles, of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. He makes no concealment of his views of the situation. He makes no false pretenses of reverence for a Constitution he does not recognize, and which he says no longer exists. We see rise from his seat none of those magnificent balloons of constitutional eloquence which distinguish some of our Republican friends when the divine inspiration is upon them. He speaks of the Constitution as a thing in the past; and all that remains of it, as old, shattered fragments of no other effect or influence except to trouble weak-kneed Senators with the nightmare.

Sir, in my humble opinion, their troubles have only begun; in after years, when the voice of the people shall have condemned them, the ghost of a violated Constitution, of duty contemned and disregarded, of trusts sacrificed and trampled under foot, will rise up before them, and, like the ghost of Banquo, will not "down" at their bidding, but will hiss into their ears the "deep damnation of their taking off." No, Mr. Speaker, we care not for jibes and jeers. The Republican party is not our audience; we speak to the country, and not to our sneering opponents. We appeal to the people, and not to those who are stricken with judicial blindness, and who are determined neither to listen to admonition nor reflect upon the consequences of their career. Sir, you propose by this motion to strike down the right of petition. Will honorable gentlemen consider what they are about to do? Have they forgotten the history of this question from the time of the English revolution, in 1688, when it was irrevocably established as a right in behalf of the people of England against both Crown and Parliament, down to the present time, in the midst of a revolution of quite another character? Have they forgotten its history in this House? Sir, so careful were the people of this, among their other omitted rights, that we find they were not satisfied with the Constitution as originally framed by the Convention, and adopted by the several States until they had this great right of petition ingrafted upon it by amendment. The Constitution, thus amended, declares that Congress shall pass no law abridging the right of the people "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." This very question, too, was one of the leading causes enumerated in the Declaration of Independence for colonial resistance to the British Crown. And yet now, upon this very floor, in a Congress which exists alone under and by virtue of that Constitution, the proposition is gravely made to reject a petition sent up by American citizens, couched in proper and respectful language, and upon a subject not in the least objectionable either in spirit or principle! Verily, verily, Mr. Speaker, we have fallen upon remarkable times.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that this is a constitutional right. Now, how have our constitutional writers and statesmen looked upon this question? Thomas Erskine May, in his able treatise on the Privileges and Usages of Parliament, speaking of the right of petition, says:

"The various communications between the several branches of the Legislature, which have been described in the last three chapters, lead to the consideration of petitions, by which the people are brought into communication with the Parliament. The right of petitioning the Crown and Parliament for redress of grievances is acknowledged as a fundamental principle of the constitution, and has been uninterruptedly exercised from very early times. Before the constitution of Parliament had assumed its present form, and while its judicial and legislative functions were ill-defined, petitions were presented to the Crown and to the great councils of the realm for the redress of those grievances which were beyond the jurisdiction of the common law. There are petitions in the Tower of the date of Edward I. before which time it is conjectured that the parties aggrieved came personally before the council or preferred their complaints in the country before inquests composed of officers of the Crown."

It is quite a significant fact, Mr. Speaker, that in the debates of the First Congress, in 1789, upon the proposed amendments to the Constitution, and in relation to this very subject of the right of petition, some of the leading members questioned its incorporation into the organic law of the land as wholly unnecessary and as an act of supererogation, for the reason, as they claimed, that it existed in all free Governments inherently as of common right and as freely to be enjoyed by everybody as the atmosphere they breathed. Mr. Sedgwick, in reply to a remark that it should be incorporated upon the principle that it was a right which belonged to the people, said that—"If the committee were governed by that general principle, they might have gone into a very lengthy enumeration of rights; they might have declared that a man should have a right to wear his hat if he pleased, that he might get up when he pleased, and go to bed when he thought proper; but he would ask the gentleman whether he thought it necessary to enter into these trifles in a declaration of rights under a Government where none of them were intended to be infringed."—2 Lloyd's Debates, 197.

I suppose our friends on the other side of the House, and especially those coming from New England districts, will hardly sneer at Mr. Justice Story as an authority upon constitutional law. In the second volume of his Commentaries on the Constitution, pages 676, 677, in speaking of the clause securing to the people the right of petition, he says:

"This would seem unnecessary to be expressly provided for in a republican government, since it results from the very nature of its structure and institutions. It is impossible that it could be practically denied, until the spirit of liberty wholly disappeared, and the people had become so servile and debased as to be unfit to exorcise any of the privileges of freemen."

Sir, this is certainly not a very flattering picture of a people who would tamely submit to the deprivation of this right. How long the American people, to whatever political party they may at present belong, are going quietly to submit to these accumulating wrongs, and to these persistent and continued infractions of the Constitution, time and circumstances can only determine.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat the question: do gentlemen who now propose to deny to white American citizens the right of petition by sustaining the motion to reject this memorial forget the history of this question in this House, at least so far as the northern States are concerned? Have they forgotten the remarkable controversy in this Hall growing out of the position of John Quincy Adams, who was the great progenitor of their party in relation, at least, to some of its earlier and less objectionable principles, upon the right of even negro slaves to petition the Congress of the United States? And that, too, at a time when there was no general or wide-spread fanaticism either upon the subject of the negro generally or of negro slavery in particular; at a time, sir, long anterior to the apotheosis of the negro as the great idol for white men to prostrate themselves before in worshipful adoration as the highest of political divinities? Has all this been forgotten, sir, or is it only disregarded?

Mr. Speaker, upon how flimsy and untenable a ground is put the objection to the reception of this petition! It is said by honorable gentlemen that this petition ought not to be received, because, as they assert, there is no such body as the Legislature of the State of Arkansas. What cogent reasoning, what logical and irresistible argument! Do learned and honorable gentlemen suppose this question is to be argued and disposed of here like a question of title before one of the judicial tribunals of the country? It is wholly indifferent by what name these memorialists call themselves, or what character they assume, official or private, so long as neither name nor character imply an indignity or disrespect to this House. It is wholly indifferent whether they are negroes and call themselves white men, or are white men and call themselves negroes; whether they are Christians and call themselves heathen, or are heathen and call themselves Christian; whether, as a fact, they are civilized or savage, bond or free, so long as they are amenable to the laws of the country in which they are domiciled they are entitled to the great right of petition before the law-making power which governs and controls them. Such has been this right, as recognized in England for nearly two centuries. Sir, I consider it as one of the most remarkable characteristics of the remarkable times in which we live that the denial of this right of petition, of prayer, of supplication, acknowledged everywhere in every constitutional Government upon the face of the globe, has been reserved to be exhibited in the great parliamentary body of a nation claiming to be the freest on earth, sitting under a written Constitution which expressly guaranties it to every human being over which it claims authority.

HO. OF REPS.

The Right of Petition—Mr. Van Trump.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

But it is claimed that Arkansas is not a State within the Union, and therefore this petition ought to be rejected. Sir, I have had neither time nor opportunity to prepare my views upon this great and now all-absorbing question. I shall, however, on some other occasion claim to submit them, and I have no doubt such occasion will occur hereafter, for no man who understands or appreciates the temper of the political majority of this Congress can for a single moment believe that the military bill now pending upon your table is intended to be a finality of the wrongs and oppressions against the people of the South. Sir, I change the facts to be that, in relation to this idea of the extinction of States by secession, the whole monstrous theory is an after-thought of Radical republicanism since the death of President Lincoln, a lopted for the purposes of revenge upon his successor and the southern people, and seized upon for party aggrandizement. We heard of no such suicidal theory during the war. On the contrary, sir, who does not know that from President Lincoln down to the most insignificant exponent of the principles of the party the clear and distinct position was assumed that all the States which had passed ordinances of secession were still in the Union, and would remain so unless they should be able, by the final arbitrament of the sword, to forcibly separate themselves, for the reason that they had no constitutional right to secede? They put it upon the true ground, a question of force and not of right. This position was constantly asserted by every department of the Government, and by every convention and every member of the party during the whole progress of the war. It is too late now, sir, for any gentleman of this House to rise in his seat and say the southern States are not in the Union. The party stands too boldly committed against any such ground as that to be able now, with any show of decency, to shift their position to the opposite extreme. So far as the State of Arkansas is concerned the action of President Lincoln was too distinct and unequivocal to remain in doubt, or to be now questioned by any member of the party who sustained him in the administration of the Government during the war. No gentleman on this floor will have, or ought to have, any doubt as to the effect of the following letter from the President of the United States upon this subject:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
WASHINGTON, January 20, 1864.

MAJOR GENERAL STEELE: Sundry citizens of the State of Arkansas petition me that an election may be held in that State, at which to elect a Governor; that it be assumed at that election, and thenceforward, that the constitution and laws of the State, as before the rebellion, are in full force, except that the constitution is so modified as to declare that there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; that the General Assembly may make such provisions for the freed people as shall recognize and declare their permanent freedom, and provide for their education, and which may yet be construed as a temporary arrangement, suitable to their present condition as a laboring, landless, and homeless class; that said election shall be held on the 28th March, 1864, at all the usual places of the State, for all such voters as may attend for that purpose; that the voters attending at each place at eight o'clock in the morning of said day may choose judges and clerks of election for that purpose; that all persons qualified by said constitution and laws, and taking the oath presented in the President's proclamation of December 8, 1863, either before or at the election, and none others, may be voters; that each set of judges and clerks may make returns directly to you on or before the — day of — next; that in all other respects said election may be conducted according to said modified constitution and laws; that on receipt of said returns, when five thousand four hundred and six votes shall have been cast, you can receive said votes, and ascertain who shall thereby appear to have been elected; that on the — day of — next, all persons so appearing to have been elected, who shall appear before you at Little Rock and take the oath, to be by you severally administered, to support the Constitution of the United States and the modified constitution of the State of Arkansas, shall be declared by you qualified and empowered to immediately enter upon the duties of the offices to which they shall have been respectively elected.

You will please order an election to take place on the 28th of March, 1864, and return to be made in fifteen days thereafter.

A. LINCOLN.

Such, Mr. Speaker, were the views of Abraham Lincoln, as President of the United States, acquiesced in by his entire party, in relation to the status of the rebel States during the war, even at a time when the continent resounded with the roar of hostile cannon and the tramp of mighty armies. I will not enter into an argument now to show that these views were correct. I simply present them to the consideration of honorable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, to remind them that their present position, at a time when there is not a rebel's musket gleaming in the sun from South Carolina to Texas, and when a conquered peace reigns throughout the land from Maine to Georgia, cannot be reconciled with their position in 1864. Sir, I need not reproduce here other clear official recognitions of the fact that the southern States were never potentially out of the Union, and which have already been cited by my honorable colleague, [Mr. MORGAN.] Enough to say that it is quite too late now for the so-called Republican party to assume that they are out of the Union as States. Mr. Lincoln always persistently claimed that unless they had the constitutional right to secede they never could withdraw except by the successful force and power of arms, in the common process of revolution; and as to that position the Democratic party held no dissimilar opinion.

Sir, I will notice one other significant but false recognition by the Republican party of the fact that the southern States are still legitimate sovereignties within the Union. In looking over the certificate of States ratifying the late amendments to the Constitution of the United States, by the Secretary of State, with the broad seal of the Union attached, and to which the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] so much objects, I find the name of a so-called State of the Union voting upon said amendment, to which, I suppose, the honorable gentleman will not object. I mean, sir, the so-called State of West Virginia. West Virginia, by act of Congress, was attempted to be erected into a State in July, 1862, one of the most doubtful and desponding periods of the war. In order to impart to it the semblance of constitutional existence the huge legislative mendacity was resorted to of reciting that it was done with the consent of the sovereign legislative authority of the State of Virginia. West Virginia, indeed! What withering, irrepressible scorn must any honest mind feel for the miserable, inconsistent, and ridiculous assumption which claims West Virginia to be a State constitutionally within the Union, and that Arkansas is a mere waif upon the sea of national life, an unorganized colonial dependency outside of the Union. West Virginia, sir! she has no constitutional home, no rightful, legal abiding place in the great family of States; she is a bastard Commonwealth, a mere political foundling, without a drop of constitutional blood in her veins; she is an illegitimate star in our political constellation; she was conceived in the sin and born in the iniquity of modern radical republicanism; and the whole rightful constitutional theory of our confederate system, the whole original framework of our Government as designed by our fathers is disturbed and dislocated by this horrid burlesque of a State. And yet, sir, its erection, however revolutionary and unconstitutional, when you look to the animus and mode of its accomplishment, as against those who perpetrated the outrage, is a clear and unequivocal recognition of the fact that Old Virginia was and is a State within the Union, unshorn of any of its original sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, these memorialists, as citizens of the United States and of the State of Arkansas, not only have the clear and unequivocal constitutional right to petition the Congress of the United States; but there are other reasons, outside of the naked question of right, why their claim to be heard before the Representatives of the people in this mode should be favorably and equitably considered. And I limit my proposition to the claim of being heard only, because I do not intend now to commit myself upon the merits of their case as being entitled to the relief they seek at our hands. I ask gentlemen on the other side of the House not to forget that they always claimed, during the war, Arkansas to be one of the seceded States holding a large Union sentiment within her borders. The history of her secession will not controvert this proposition. On the 16th day of January, 1861, the Legislature of Arkansas passed an act calling a convention. That law was submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, and 27,412 votes were cast for it and 15,826 against it. That convention met on the 4th day of March, 1861, the day of the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln as President of the United States. An ordinance of secession was put to vote in convention on the 18th day of March, 1861, at a time when Mr. Lincoln, from the spirit of his inaugural address and other manifestations, was considered to be quite conservative in his views in relation to the very critical condition of the country, and the ordinance was defeated by a vote of 39 to 35. The fatal meeting of the northern Governors took place immediately thereafter, and a new policy was inaugurated in the North. It was not, however, until hostilities had commenced between the two sections, and the stern realities of war actually existed between them, that the Arkansas convention, on the 6th day of May following, passed the ordinance of secession.

Mr. Speaker, when I propounded the question on last evening to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as to whether the presentation to the Legislature of Arkansas of the law of Congress to amend the Constitution of the United States was not a most solemn recognition that Arkansas was a State in the Union his reply was ingenious, but not satisfactory. He claimed that that act of Congress was never rightfully or constitutionally presented to the Legislature of Arkansas, because the Secretary of State of the United States had no authority from Congress to so prevent it. Will the gentleman say that Mr. Seward was directed by Congress not to so present it? I think he will hazard no such assertion. I have not had the time, Mr. Speaker, to look into the debates upon the passage of this law to amend the Federal Constitution; but I here venture the remark, that in all those debates, fully participated in by the gentleman himself, there cannot be found a single word or the slightest intimation that it was to be presented to only a certain number of prescribed States for ratification or rejection. If that was the State of facts as to the passage of this law, I know the gentleman is too good a lawyer to controvert the proposition that the judicial construction to be put upon such state of case would be that it was to apply to all the States, and not be restricted to a portion only, not named in the act itself.

The honorable gentleman seemed to be inspired with the spirit of prophecy as to what will be the decision of the supreme judicial tribunal of the land upon the question whether that law was rightfully and constitutionally presented to the States then lately in rebellion by the Secretary of State for their ratification or rejection. Sir, I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, nor am I at all of kin to any of the astrological race; but I have no fears as to what that decision will be, after the late determination of the Georgia and Mississippi cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, if I rightfully apprehend the true ground of those decisions. The point of those decisions, as I understand it, is that a State has no legal capacity to sue the United States; or perhaps it may be more correctly stated that the Supreme Court has no original jurisdiction when a State undertakes to sue the United States. Now, sir, if this is the true statement of the question involved in those cases, it follows that the most essential principle first to be disposed of by the court was to determine whether Georgia and Mississippi were States or not. The court, therefore, must have assumed that they were States in the Union, or the question of jurisdiction would not have been raised or passed upon. It is also not unworthy of remark that the Attorney General of the United States, who argued those cases, and who is known to be one of the most able and distinguished lawyers in the country, made no question as to the constitutional status of Georgia or Mississippi. I am, therefore, satisfied with the indications of the great judicial tribunal of the nation if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is. But the honorable gentleman has, in my humble opinion, put himself in a dilemma he did not at all anticipate. Suppose it to be true that the Secretary of State had no authority to present this law of Congress to the southern States for ratification or rejection; and suppose, if you please, that it was clearly the original purpose of Congress that the southern States should have, under the law, no power or right of ratification or rejection, and that this legislative purpose was clearly expressed in the law itself; what then? Is the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania or is Congress going to pass a law and impose a constitution upon a whole people in no wise entitled to suffrage either as to its enactment or amendment? In other words, can a constitution or any amendment thereto be made to exist and exert itself over an entire people who have been denied any participation either in its original enactment or its subsequent amendment?

Sir, such a state of case is a new problem in the theory of constitutional government. I think it would be extremely difficult for my honorable friend to find, in the whole range of the history of free Government, any precedent for so grotesque and anomalous a proceeding. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, Congress did intend that this law should be passed upon by the legislative authorities of the southern States. We all know with what intense anxiety the whole northern mind, Republican and Democratic, looked to the action of the southern States upon this question. If this is true, sir, and it cannot be successfully controverted, then we have this most unprecedented political or legislative spectacle presented to our observation: the Congress of the United States most solemnly declaring that the conquered southern people, subdivided, as it is claimed, into nothing more than some sort of municipal or quasi political communities, are good and valid enough as States, invested with the sovereign power of legislation, to ratify a Constitution which was proposed to be amended under the provisions of a law passed by a federative Congress in which they were denied representation, and dictated to them by their conquerors; and that same federative Congress now propose to hold and declare that they are no States at all, when the great right of petition is interposed in their behalf, if the precedent established last year in the case of the petition of the Governor of North Carolina shall be followed.

Sir, if this great wrong shall be perpetrated, if the blindness of party zeal shall prevail, and all law and justice shall be disregarded, the only consolation which we in the minority shall feel or realize will be the fact that your action will go to the country for its affirmation or condemnation along with the many other violations of the laws and Constitution, to be passed upon by the final arbitrament of public opinion. We are not unaware of the fact that you still feel secure in your strength, and are still confident in the powers of party organization; but we shall bide our time; we shall patiently wait until reason shall resume her empire over the popular mind; and when that time comes, as come it must, we know that the fate of the Republican party will be a crushing public odium, and a loss of power never to be regained so long as its long catalogue of wrongs and outrages shall exist in the remembrance of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, I feel no other interest in the question now before the House than what is naturally felt by every lover of liberty and law. I feel such interest, not as a partisan, but as an American citizen; and I have raised my voice in behalf of the constitutional privilege which it involves, not with the vain hope of possessing the slightest influence in its determination, but in the simple discharge of a duty which I owe to my constituents and to the country. I know very well, sir, how futile it is to oppose the power of a dominant party which deems nothing unlawful which it is able to accomplish, and esteems nothing sacred or inviolable which it wishes to destroy.

REMARKS OF HON. G. DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

July 11, 1867,

On the bill (S. No. 131) to give effect to an act entitled "An act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," passed March 2, 1867.

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] in opening the debate on this bill, admitted distinctly that unless the United States had the powers of a conqueror over the southern States Congress had no authority to pass the present bill or the former military bills to which this is amendatory. Whether the subjugation of the rebellion in the southern States was a conquest and gave the United States Government the powers of a conqueror was a question which I examined on the passage of the original bill now proposed to be amended. I shall therefore not now enter lengthily upon the discussion of that question; but I mean to take the honorable Senator's position, and upon the concession that the United States had conquered the southern States which were in rebellion, and in consequence of this conquest were entitled to all the rights which the victor by that code is entitled to, I yet contend that the Congress of the United States have no power to pass this bill; and I propose to occupy a short time in support of that position, and then to read some authority in maintenance of it.

I will not attempt to show that the President has not obstructed, or attempted to interpose any obstruction to the due execution of the reconstruction acts. It devolves upon those who make that charge to establish it, but they have shrunk from even making the attempt. Nor will I enter upon a vindication of the Attorney General's construction of those acts: it has been assailed but on one point, and that doubtfully, the effect of the oath which is required to be taken. Both opinions of the Attorney General are elaborate, well considered, and able, and I believe, according to all the rules for construing laws, are strictly correct, including the point upon which he is so timidly attacked. His immunity from all other objection is its general triumphant vindication. Radical leaders and oracles looked at those acts through the medium of minds wholly perverted by extreme party objects and policy, and had jumped to the conclusion that they were sufficient to enable those who would be charged with their immediate execution to give the fullest effect to all the purposes of the Radical leaders in connection with the people of the southern States; and until the Attorney General held up those acts to the mirror of true legal construction according to their language, the Radical party nor leaders had no comprehension how far they would fall short of what they were intended to effect. The great object had been that the reconstruction laws should give to the instruments of the Radical party the absolute and uncontrollable power to determine who of all the southern people should be registered and who should vote and who should be excluded both from the registry and the poll-book. The opinions of the Attorney General revealed, to the amazement and consternation of the Radical party, that this was far from having been done as had been intended. They were satisfied with the manifestations of the satraps, and particularly with Sheridan and Sickles, and with their insubordinate spirit toward the Commander-in-Chief, the President. It was obvious that neither their absolute official subordination to him in their offices and in the execution of these and all other laws, nor their sworn fidelity to the Constitution, nor their devotion to their country, nor their character and honor as soldiers, would restrain these military neophytes from acting in the delicate and important commands of which they were so unworthy the parts of the most unscrupulous political partisans. They were fit tools to stock, to drop out, to cut, shuffle, and deal, by their own selected tools, the registers, the ballots of the southern people, so as to count all their elections in favor of the Radical cause. It was not to remove obstructions to the due execution of the reconstruction acts, but to supply their defects, to subserve the purposes of the Radical cause, by giving to the faithful military commanders of the five districts additional powers that would enable them to control the elections as absolutely as though they cast all the votes, that Congress convened in this session; and this measure comes fully up to all the needs of the party in this business.

Mr. President, our Government is divided into three apartments, the legislative, executive, and judicial. The powers vested by the Constitution in these departments are separate, distinct, and independent. One department of the Government cannot properly exercise any power which by the Constitution is vested in another department. No power is vested in Congress but the legislative power created by the Constitution; but in the President the executive power of the Government is vested, with the addition of making him, by express words, Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the States when called into the actual service of the United States. Now, sir, I assume the position, which, indeed, I have never heard controverted heretofore, that the entire military power of our Government is vested in the President—not the power to make war, nor to raise armies, nor to provide fleets, nor to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and Navy: they, by the Constitution, are expressly made legislative powers. But the government and control of our armies and fleets, the direction of all their operations, the entire administration of all our military affairs, is given by the Constitution solely and exclusively to the President in the language constituting him Commander-in-Chief; and he has every power and function imparted by that language within the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution. It has no other words which purport to vest any power to administer military affairs, and Congress has neither part nor lot in their administration. The President may in person lead our armies, and when they are led by others those leaders are subject to his single and absolute orders. When those armies conquer and occupy the territory of a foreign Power, not Congress, but the President, can officially know and act upon that fact. The organization of a military government in the conquered country may be necessary and proper, but the President, and not Congress, both decides that question and proceeds by himself, or his subordinate military officers, to establish, organize, and administer the military government. When the conquered country is ceded by treaty to the United States, as in case of California and New Mexico, and becomes sufficiently tranquil to admit civil government, then Congress may interpose and organize a civil government, which will supersede and displace the military government erected by the President. These are the principles of the Constitution, and they are recognized by the highest authority, the Federalist, Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, and decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I will read from the 74th number of the Federalist, written by Hamilton:

"The President of the United States is to be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States. The propriety of this provision is so evident, and it is at the same time so consonant to the precedents of the State constitutions in general, that little need be said to explain or enforce it. Even those of them which have in other respects coupled the Chief Magistrate with a council have for the most part concentrated the military authority in him alone. Of all the cares or concerns of government, the direction of war most peculiarly demands those qualities which distinguish the exercise of power by a single hand. The direction of war implies the direction of the common strength; and the power of directing and employing the common strength forms an usual and essential part in the definition of the executive authority."

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, section 1484, quotes the provision of the Constitution in these words:

"The first clause of the second section is: 'The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service of the United States.'"

The commentator then proceeds:

"The command and application of the public force to execute the laws, to maintain peace, and to resist foreign invasion are powers so obviously of an executive nature, and require the exercise of qualities so peculiarly adapted to this department, that a well-organized Government can scarcely exist when they are taken away from it. Of all the cares and concerns of government the direction of war most peculiarly demands those qualities which distinguish the exercise of power by a single hand. Unity of plan, promptitude, activity, and decision are indispensable to success; and these can scarcely exist, except when a single magistrate is intrusted exclusively with the power. Even the coupling of the authority of an executive council with him in the exercise of such powers enfeebles the system, divides the responsibility, and not unfrequently defeats every energetic measure. Finitude, indecision, obstinacy, and pride of opinion must mingle in all such councils, and infuse a torpor and sluggishness, destructive of all military operations. Indeed, there would seem to be little reason to enforce the propriety of giving this power to the executive department, (whatever may be its actual organization,) since it is in exact coincidence with the provisions of our State constitutions, and therefore seems to be universally deemed safe, if not vital, to the system."

I will next read from the case relied upon by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Cross vs. Harrison, reported in 16 Howard, 164. What I read will sufficiently explain the questions that arose in that case, and were decided by the court, and which decision I now rely upon. I read from page 190:

"California, or the port of San Francisco, had been conquered by the arms of the United States as early as 1846. Shortly afterward the United States had military possession of all of Upper California. Early in 1847 the President, as constitutional Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, authorized the military and naval commander of our forces in California to exercise the belligerent rights of a conqueror, and to form a civil government for the conquered country, and to impose duties on imports and tonnage as military contributions for the support of the Government and of the Army which had the conquest in possession. We will add, by way of note to this opinion, references to all of the correspondence of the Government upon this subject; now only referring to the letter of the Secretary of War to General Kearney, of the 10th of May, 1847, which was accompanied with a tariff of duties on imports and tonnage, which had been prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury with forms of entry and permits for landing goods; all of which was reported by the Secretary to the President on the 30th of March, 1847. (Senate Document No. 1, first session Thirtieth Congress, 1847, pages 567, 583.) No one can doubt that these orders of the President, and the action of our Army and Navy commander in California in conformity with them, were according to the law of arms and the right of conquest, or that they were operative until the ratification and exchange of a treaty of peace. Such would be the case upon general principles in respect to war and peace between nations. In this instance it is recognized by the treaty itself. Nothing is stipulated in that treaty to be binding upon the parties to it, or from the date of the signature of the treaty, but that commissioners should be appointed by the General-in-Chief of the forces of the United States, with such as might be appointed by the Mexican Government, to make a provisional suspension of hostilities, that in the places occupied by our arms, constitutional order might be reestablished as regards the political, administrative, and judicial branches in those places, so far as that might be permitted by the circumstances of military occupation."

Now, sir, what did the orders of the President referred to in this opinion do? What was the character and nature of those orders? California had been conquered by the arms of the United States. In perfect conformity to the rights of the conqueror, this decision recites that the President of the United States ordered the highest commanders of the Army and Navy of the United States operating in that country to form a military government with civil powers, and among those civil powers was the establishment of a system of impost duties and their collection. This decision says that these orders of the President, and the action of those officers under the orders, were in strict conformity to national law, and that this military government, with the adjunct of civil powers in that foreign conquered country, thus created by the direction and orders of the President of the United States to his subordinates, was in strict conformity to the laws of conquest and of nations. That is true. In another portion of this opinion, speaking of the conduct of Colonel Mason, who was the highest military commander there, and who acted under these orders of the President, the court say:

"His position was unlike anything that had preceded it in the history of our country. The view taken of it by himself has been given in the statement in the beginning of this opinion. It was not without its difficulties, both as regards the principle upon which he should act and the actual state of affairs in California. He knew that the Mexican inhabitants of it had been remitted by the treaty of peace to those municipal laws and usages which prevailed among them before the territory had been ceded to the United States; but that a state of things and population had grown up during the war, and after the treaty of peace, which made some other authority necessary to maintain the rights of the ceded inhabitants and of immigrants from misrule and violation. He may not have comprehended fully the principle applicable to what he might rightly do in such a case, but he felt rightly and acted accordingly. He determined, in the absence of all instruction, to maintain the existing government."

"The territory had been ceded as a conquest and was to be preserved and governed as such until the sovereignty to which it had passed had legislated for it. The sovereignty was the United States, under the Constitution, by which power had been given to Congress to dispose and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with the power also to admit new States into this Union, with only such limitations as are expressed in the section in which this power is given. The government of which Colonel Mason was the executive had its origin in the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered territory. It had been instituted during the war by the command of the President of the United States. It was the government when the Territory was ceded as a conquest, and it did not cease as a matter of course, or as a necessary consequence of a restoration of peace. The President might have dissolved it by withdrawing the Army and Navy officers who administered it, but he did not do so. Congress could have put an end to it, but that was not done. The right inference from the inaction of both is that it was meant to be continued until it had been legislatively changed."

I read from this decision for the purpose of establishing two positions:

1. When a foreign country is conquered by the arms of the United States, immediately upon the conquest and the acquisition of the possession by our Army the President, as Commander-in-Chief, may order, under the rights of conquest, the organization of such a military government, with civil powers, as may be necessary for the country and its inhabitants.

2. That this military government continues until the President ends it by withdrawing the military commanders who are charged with its administration; or until Congress, after the title to the country is acquired, has taken up the subject and has provided a civil government to supersede the military government. In support of these positions, see also American Insurance Company against Carter, 1 Peters, 542; United States vs. Gratiot, 14 Peters, 526.

And, sir, the President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy in our country in time of peace in the execution of the laws of the Union, suppressing insurrections, repelling invasions, and protecting the States against domestic violence. Wherever the military forces of the country may be, or whatever kind of service engaged in, the President has its exclusive and absolute control and direction in all its operations.

In the suppression of insurrection and rebellion the President moves and directs the armies and navies according to his own judgment and will, and may head them in person, or command them by his subordinate military and naval officers. If the insurgents, by force of arms, expel the laws and authorities of the United States from a State, or several States, or a smaller district of country, and the President orders the United States military forces to move upon and suppress those insurgents, and their captivity or expulsion ensue, and the work is complete and perfect, and the violent and disorganized condition of things is put down and rectified, and no obstacles to the resumption of the former and normal state of things remain, the deposed government authorities and relations spring up spontaneously in the State or States, as do the government and authorities of a city in which they have been overthrown and held in a state of suspension for days by a dominating mob. But things may not be in a condition for a prompt restoration of the loyal government after the suppression of the usurped one; and order, tranquillity, and the protection of the inhabitants may require the longer occupation of the country by the military forces, and something beside, and what? A temporary government. But the condition of things is too troublous for the existence and administration of a civil government, and a military government supported and enforced by the power of the Army alone is possible. What authority is to decide when and where such a military government is necessary? What but the Commander-in-Chief of the military power? What authority is to organize this military government? The same Commander-in-Chief, part of whose command is to constitute and uphold that government. The idea of Congress organizing a military government for the Army in a country that can be held by it alone, and on the theater of its operations, is not only inappropriate but preposterous, and is against all principle and all practice. Men of the Army would constitute the personnel of this government, and what power has Congress to order the military commander to make such detail; and suppose he was to refuse to make it, what then?

But when made, and the military government is organized, who is to control and administer it? Who is to supervise its operations and correct them when wrong, Congress or the President? Whence does Congress derive such a power? There are provisions in the bills on this subject pending in both Houses, the obvious purposes of which are to divest the President of a portion of this power and vest it in the General of the Army and the five military satraps commanding in the southern States, some of whom show a very willing disposition to throw off their subordination to the President, their Commander-in-Chief, and to become the supple tools of Congress. No fitter subjects for a court-martial and to be cashiered than they. Does not the Constitution read: "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America;" and "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed?" Does not the Constitution also declare: "The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States?" He is the constitutional superior, head, and director of both the civil and military administration of the Government, and all persons employed in those services are bound to submit implicitly to his orders. Within those pales Congress cannot impinge upon him without infraction of the Constitution and arrogant usurpations of authority. But Congress has been so successful in its bold aggressions in that direction, and the people so approving or so apathetic, that it feels encouraged to continue its reckless career. It now knows no check or responsibility and no limits to its action within its own audacious will.

Before the adoption of the Constitution each State was a distinct and independent political sovereignty. They had leagued together and fought for and won liberty, independence, and popular government, but were likely to lose all from the inefficiency of their Articles of Confederation; and therefore the people of the several States sent their delegates to a Convention to frame a government strong enough to preserve those great ends, but no stronger.

The wise and virtuous men who held this momentous conference had before them the numerous examples, running through all history, of many peoples achieving liberty and self-government, striving to secure them by imperfectly-organized institutions, maintaining them for a brief period in a troubled existence with unsatisfactory results, and eventually losing them from innate defects of their forms of government, the treachery of those who administered them, and the degeneracy and corruption of the people. The great task was to form a government that would for indefinite ages save our country, its independence and liberties, from the sad fate of all others. The Convention adopted and acted upon a series of fundamental ideas. It decided upon a system of government neither wholly national nor State, but partly both, and made a division of political sovereignty and powers, the States to delegate a portion of that whole which each one then possessed, to be organized into a general government for the United States; and all sovereignty and powers not thus delegated to the common government to be reserved to the States respectively, or the people.

2. The common government to be created by a written constitution, in which should be enumerated all the powers vested in it.

3. The division of those powers among three coordinate departments, each to have a different character of power and to execute it independently of the others, and thus form mutual checks to each other to prevent any aggregation of power not conferred upon them by the Constitution.

4. The supremacy of the Constitution, and laws of the United States in pursuance of it, over the constitution and laws of the States, and the creation of the Supreme Court to decide all questions of conflict between them whenever they might arise, directly or indirectly, in cases before that court.

5. The powers to make war and peace, to raise and support armies, to enforce the execution of the laws, to suppress insurrections, to repel invasions, to protect each State against domestic violence, &c.

The General Government is built in part upon the States, and the Constitution makes them a necessary part of the machinery which it creates. It provides that the Legislatures of the States shall choose the Senators in Congress; that each State shall appoint, in such manner as its Legislature may direct, the number of presidential electors to which it may be entitled; and the States only can amend the Constitution of the United States. Here are functions to be performed by the States without which the General Government could not have been organized, and without their continued performance by the States that Government would come to an end. There is no other or substitute authority to perform those functions, nor can the General Government, or any, or all its departments or officers compel the States to perform them. Nor can Congress compel the President, nor the President the courts, nor the courts Congress, respectively, to perform their duties; but Congress may impeach the President or the courts; but it has no jurisdiction whatever over the States or their Legislatures, nor is there any provision of the Constitution from which it can be even conjectured to arise. The Government of the United States can constitutionally act upon a State only in three conditions and ways:

1. It can admit new States into the Union, but it can admit a State into the Union only once, because being once in she is there until the Union and our Government are subverted by revolution. The government of a State and the laws and authority of the United States in it may be overthrown by insurrection and rebellion, or by the invasion and conquest of a foreign army; but when the rebellion is put down, or the invaders are expelled, by the operation of the principle of post limine, as recognized by the law of nations, the State is restored to her former condition.

2. The United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government.

3. And on the application of the Legislature (or of the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

Under no other circumstances, in no other mode, and for no other purpose can the Government of the United States act upon a State; though in many forms it may act upon every individual in any or all the States. Every person resisting the execution of the laws, or engaged in insurrection against the United States, whether with or without the pretended authority of a State, may be resisted, put down, tried, and punished for his crime. The Constitution and laws authorize all that; but a State by no principle of Constitution or law can commit a crime or offense, or is subject to any forfeiture, penalty, or punishment; and there are no forms or modes of proceeding or law by which a State can be punished or tried or indicted or charged. Like the Presidency or the Supreme Court or the two Houses of Congress, the States, as part of the constitutional machinery of our complex and blended system of Government, have a legal existence in perpetuity; and it would be as philosophical, true, and constitutional to declare and attempt to make practical the forfeiture and abolition of the Presidency, of the Supreme Court, or of the two Houses of Congress because of the treason of the men who happened to fill them, as of the States and their governments. The incumbents of those offices who commit crimes, whether against the United States or a State, are subject to be tried, ejected from their places, and punished; but the offices are guiltless, and as part of the structure of the Government remain intact and ready to receive other incumbents when they are properly presented. This is necessity, common sense, and constitutional and universal law to avoid confusion and anarchy.

So when the insurgents in the southern States expelled or overthrew the laws and authorities of the United States, and passed their ordinances of secession, and practically severed their connection with the United States as parts of them, their acts were all void and without any legal effect. They remained de jure States of and in the Union, in abeyance, all in complete organization, their offices ready to be filled and their governments to be administered as before the revolt; the States, their governments, and people being, by the suppression of the insurrection, restored to their former condition. But if the States, or any of them, were not immediately ready for rehabilitation in their State governments, and order and the protection of persons and property required it, the President, while holding military possession of the country as Commander-in-Chief, had the power, and it was his duty, to organize ad interim a military government for those ends. That is the only government which, in any state of case, could properly prelude the government of the States formed by its own people, and the President of the United States, as military Commander-in-Chief, only could organize that military government. Such an act would be wholly without the pale of congressional power, that body not having a vestige of military administration. But if the theory of the conquest of the States in which the rebellion occurred, so vehemently asserted, were true, the only government which Congress could organize for those States would be a civil territorial government; and if, from the condition of the country, it would be impracticable to establish and administer that kind of a government in it, the only and necessary resort would be for the President, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to set up and administer a military government; and when the country was so tranquilized as to allow civil government, Congress would then organize for the country territorial governments, as it did for New Mexico after its conquest. These positions result from the Constitution, and are fully sustained by the Supreme Court in the opinion from which I have so lengthily read—Cross vs. Harrison.

And when Congress should come to establish for the southern States territorial governments, they would be very different systems of polity to the horrible, deformed military despotism which it has set up in them. There would not be an overthrow of the Constitution and all civil law and civil courts and a substitution of martial law, the arbitrary will of corrupt and partisan petty military commanders and military commissions for the trial of citizens. There would be no suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, no military arrests, imprisonments, or trials. In their leading features these territorial governments would be upon the model of the Constitution of the United States, a division of their powers into legislative, executive, and judicial, and their investment in different bodies of magistracy taken from their own people. The rights of person and property, of trial by jury in civil courts, according to the laws of the land, and all the other great rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution to the American people, the inhabitants of the southern States would have secured to them under territorial governments. But it was the scheme of the Radicals of Congress to strip those people of all their constitutional rights and liberties, and crush them under the weight of a military despotism created by themselves without any authority, and to continue upon them its galling oppression, not only for their enslavement, but to coerce them to assist in forging their own chains. Mr. President, the creation of this military government in the ten southern States is a stupendous and most fearful usurpation of power, and its revolting, despotic machinery and instruments have dragged down their people to a more complete and degrading slavery than exists anywhere beside in Christendom; that slavery impends over all the people of the United States, and will certainly engulf them unless they shake off their lethargy and strike while they can for the overthrow of both it and its authors.

REMARKS OF HON. JEHU BAKER,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 20, 1867.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a few remarks upon the recent messages of the President. The one he sent to the Senate on the 15th instant is an extraordinary document; scarcely less so than the veto message with which we were favored yesterday.

HO. OF REPS.

Veto Message—Mr. Lawrence.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

In the former message he raises the question "whether the refusal of Congress to guaranty the payment of the debts of these [the rebel] States, after having displaced or abolished their State governments, would not be viewed as a violation of good faith and a repudiation by the national Legislature of liabilities which these States had justly and legally incurred." And he tells us this question "is worthy the consideration of Congress and the country."

This, sir, is truly extraordinary language to come from the Executive of the nation; and if it carried with it any measure of that intellectual weight which would be appropriate to the high official from which it proceeds it might well startle the nation. He is of opinion that such a question of liability exists, that it is "worthy the consideration of Congress and the country;" and his language implies—if it has any consistent meaning whatever—that his own mind is under the influence of the notion that the legal logic of the existing situation is, that the United States has become liable for the preëxisting debts of the rebel States to which he alludes, amounting, as he supposes, to about one hundred million dollars.

Sir, Mr. Johnson has but to follow up the logical sequence of his ideas here expressed or implied and to take one more step in the same direction in order to bring him to an open and explicit recommendation that these debts of the rebel States be assumed and paid by the General Government. He thinks the question of liability is an open and not a foreclosed one, and that it is "worthy the consideration of Congress and the country" whether the refusal of Congress to guaranty the payment of these debts would not be a "violation of good faith" on the part of the nation; and the ground of his opinion is, that Congress has "displaced or abolished" what he terms the "State governments" of the rebel States—meaning the wretched, disloyal, unauthorized governments which he, without any warrant from the Constitution and in the exercise of usurped powers, hastened to establish over these States in the absence of Congress.

Not in the political history of the world is there to be found a position more utterly untenable and absurd, or more pernicious to the liberties of the people had it been allowed to prevail, than that assumed by Mr. Johnson after the surrender of the rebels, and obstinately adhered to by him to this very hour.

In his proclamations for the reëstablishment of State governments in the rebel States he correctly declared that the rebellion in its revolutionary progress had deprived the people of those States of "all civil government;" he correctly declared it was the duty of the President "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed;" and he referred to the right source of power when he cited the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, providing that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

His first amazing and unaccountable blunder was that he mistook himself for the United States, and read the guarantying clause of the Constitution as if it literally said "the President [not the United States] shall guaranty," &c. His next and kindred capital blunder was his assumption that it was not only his duty "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," but that he had power to prescribe or set up fundamental institutions or laws for the disorganized States of the Union.

Arrogating to himself these gigantic law-making powers, which by their very nature in no wise pertain to the Executive as such, which the Constitution nowhere confers upon him, but carefully withholds from him by reserving them to the legislative disposing power of the "United States," he presumed to take into his own hands and to subject to the poor, fallible judgment of a single individual the immense work of restoring civil order and guarantying republican governments in the disorganized States of the Union.

What though the question arose as to what is a republican government? He alone would determine it! What though the question arose as to whether the loyal people of the South should enjoy the blessings of liberty and equal laws or be crushed down beneath the iron heel of the defeated rebels? He alone would determine it! What though the question arose as to whether these States should be organized upon loyal principles and a loyal basis or revamped out of the hostile debris of the defeated rebel class? He alone would determine it! After the rebellion had stricken down more than a half million of loyal citizens and imposed a debt of $3,000,000,000 upon the labor of the country, what though the question arose as to what great guarantees were needed by the nation in order to guard the interests and the blood of its people and to make its own life secure in the future? He alone would determine what they should be! Mean time, according to the presidential idea, the representative bodies of the nation—the honorable Senate of the United States and this honorable House—should have sat supinely by, abdicating their powers, abandoning their sacred duties, and tamely registering his imperious decrees! Had Congress submitted to this it would have been guilty of a betrayal of the people unequaled in a free country, and covered itself with an infamy which history would have blushed to record.

Setting at naught these monstrous assumptions on the part of the Executive, Congress has proceeded in the discharge of its duty to the nation and to posterity. In the face and teeth of the President it has provided the great and vitally-needed guarantees of liberty, of material interest, and future national safety, which are embodied in the constitutional amendment pending before the country. It has enacted statutes of reconstruction, which have restored order and given protection to the friends as well as the enemies of the Union in the South—statutes which will lead to the creation of governments in those States based upon broad principles of liberty, friendly to the Government of the United States, and fitted safely to resume the cast-off relation of representation and political power in the Union. And, as a matter of course, it has provided for the complete subordination and "displacement" of those little arrangements of the President which he, without any more authority than he has over the moon, had built up out of the defeated rebel element. Infatuated with the one fixed idea that for all purposes of reconstruction the representatives of the people should stand aside; that for all these great purposes the text of the Constitution should be read "Andrew Johnson" in place of the "United States," he obstinately sticks to the assertion that those little, unwarranted, disloyal affairs of his, are sound, proper, constitutional State governments. Vibrated by this absurd assumption, from which his reasonings proceed and on which his conclusions are based, the entire superstructure he builds is a huge sophism and folly.

Veto Message.

SPEECH OF HON. W. LAWRENCE,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

July 20, 1867,

On the President's veto message.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I propose as briefly as I can to consider some features of the veto message, to show that its positions are not well taken, and that the only remedy for the evils that afflict the country is the impeachment and removal of the President, for which there is abundant cause. I will not discuss all the causes already known to the public, much less those locked up in the evidence taken before the Judiciary Committee, which, when revealed, will speak for itself in a manner not to be mistaken.

And first, as to the veto message.

By the two acts of Congress of the 2d and 23d March last provision is made for the reorganization of civil State governments in ten of the rebel States. The bill now vetoed is supplementary to those acts, and is designed to carry out their purposes.

The President states two features of this bill to which he objects. He says:

"It is declared that the intent of these acts was: First, that the existing governments in the ten 'rebel States' were not legal State governments; and second, 'that thereafter said governments, if continued, were to be continued subject in all respects to the military commanders of the respective districts and to the paramount authority of Congress.'"

Now, sir, I affirm "that the existing governments in the ten rebel States are not legal State governments," and that Congress in continuing them temporarily as provisional governments "has the right, and it is their duty, to make them by law 'subject in all respects to the military commanders and to the paramount authority of Congress.'"

In seven of the ten rebel States the existing State governments are illegal, because they are creations resulting from executive usurpation in flagrant violation of the Constitution, and the crime of the President is all the more glaring and palpable because of his persistent recognition of those illegal creations and the denial of the rightful power of Congress to control the work of reorganization, and still more by the corrupt exercise of power and omission of duties by the President in support of this usurpation and denial. The remaining three of the ten State governments are illegal because not authorized or ratified by Congress.

In proof of all this I appeal to historical facts and to the Constitution. During the years 1860 and 1861 eleven of the States adopted ordinances or acts of secession purporting to withdraw them from the Union. The seceding States were organized into a confederacy called the confederate States of America, with Jefferson Davis as president, with a Congress, and all the forms of government, in many respects similar to that of the United States. The preëxisting loyal State governments were superseded by State organization acknowledging allegiance to the confederacy and requiring of all State officers an oath to support the constitution of the rebel State and the confederate States. Thus a rebellion against the Government of the Union was organized, which, after more than four years of war, was suppressed by the capture of Jefferson Davis May 10 and the surrender of the last rebel army, May 26, 1865, when flagrant war ceased.

Prior to this the rebel State organizations having been practically overthrown in all or large portions of Tennessee and Arkansas, the loyal people in each by voluntary conventions, held in pursuance of no law, organized loyal State governments in the mere exercise of the right of petition to Congress for recognition as lawful State governments. (House Mis. Doc. 55, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress.) But the power of reorganization did not revert to the people, because it was "delegated to the United States." (Art. 10 Amendments to Const.; 1 Blackstone Com., 162; Coke Litt., 13; Angel on Corp., sec. 766; Glover on Municipal Corp., 403.) When the State governments were destroyed their powers ceased and the right of reorganization vested in Congress. (Const., art. 4, sec. 4.)

A joint resolution of Congress restoring Tennessee to her relations in the Union was passed and approved July 24, 1866. This is the only one of the rebel States restored.

In the western counties of the original State of Virginia a voluntary convention, held at Wheeling in 1861, in pursuance of no statute, organized a new State government, purporting to be for the whole of the State, but which was put in operation over only a portion of it.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Veto Message—Mr. Lawrence.

HO. OF REPS.

This government subsequently consented to the erection of the new State of West Virginia, which has been and is recognized by and represented in Congress, and thus made valid. The original Wheeling government, after the erection of West Virginia, was transferred to Alexandria, where its jurisdiction was limited and nominal until after the surrender of Lee, in April, 1865, when it was transferred to Richmond, and has ever since exercised jurisdiction over all of Virginia, not including West Virginia; but Congress has steadily refused to recognize it as a valid State government, and it remains without any Senator or Representative in Congress.

On the 11th of March, 1864, General Banks, in command of the Union forces at New Orleans, issued his military order No. 85, (House Report 16, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress,) under which a convention was called representing only a small part of Louisiana. A constitution was adopted, submitted to and approved by a majority of the people in the parishes represented in convention, and a State government put in operation which has continued its functions, but being a mere military creation for war purposes it has never been recognized as a State government, and so has remained without any Senator or Representative in Congress.*

Andrew Johnson became President in April, 1865.

In the remaining seven of the rebel States, to wit, North Carolina, Mississippi, Georgia, Texas, Alabama, South Carolina, and Florida, the military power which suppressed the rebellion broke up and destroyed the respective State governments therein and drove from power and place the officers who had administered them. Repeated military orders of the President completed this work.†

In this condition of affairs all men of all parties agreed that State governments should be reorganized, but it was soon found that there were wide differences of opinion as to the time when reorganization was practicable, the terms

*The Judiciary Committee of the Senate at the second session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress made a unanimous report refusing to admit Senators, in which it is said:

"The persons in possession of the local authorities in Louisiana having rebelled against the authority of the United States, and her inhabitants having been declared to be in a state of insurrection in pursuance of a law passed by the two Houses of Congress, your committee deem it improper for this body to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana till by some joint action of both Houses there shall be some recognition of an existing State government acting in harmony with the Government of the United States and recognizing its authority."—Senate Report 127, second session Thirty-Eighth Congress.

This must be so, or in case of conflicting governments the Senate might recognize one government, the House another, and the President still another.

†On the 12th of April, 1865, President Lincoln directed Maj. Gen. Weitzel to withdraw any permission for the insurgent Legislature of Virginia to meet.

Mississippi.

1865, May 10.—Governor Clark called an extra session of the Legislature for the 15th to order a State convention.

May 21.—Major General Canby telegraphed as follows to Major General Warren, commanding the department: "By direction of the President, you will not recognize any officer of the confederate or State government within the limits of your command as authorized to exercise in any manner whatever the functions of their late offices. You will prevent, by force if necessary, any attempt of any of the Legislatures of the States in insurrection to assemble for legislative purposes, and will imprison any members or other persons who may attempt to exercise these functions in opposition to your orders."

Georgia.

1865, May 3.—Governor Joseph E. Brown issued a proclamation calling an extra meeting of the Legislature for the 22d.

May 11.—Major General Gillmore issued an order annulling this proclamation and directing the persons interested not to heed it.

South Carolina.

1865, May 2.—Governor Magrath issued a proclamation that the confederate stores within the State should be turned over to State officers, to be distributed among the people.

May 8.—Governor Magrath summoned the State officers to Columbia to resume their duties.

May 11.—Major General Gillmore issued an order on which it should be done, and the authority rightfully entitled to control it.

The districts of country composing these geographical States were left with a population owing allegiance to the General Government, but without any civil State government.* The President, in pursuance of the national laws, appointed assessors and collectors of internal revenue, collectors of customs, postmasters, and other national officers.†

Now, in this condition of affairs, if the President assumed and exercised great powers which could only be rightfully exercised by Congress; if he denied to Congress powers that belonged to them; or if he denied to the people of seven States sovereign powers inherent in them, and undertook to set up a policy for these States, disfranchising nearly half their population, all in gross violation of the Constitution and of his duties; and if he prostituted all his powers and others usurped by him to accomplish these purposes and to place the government of the country in the hands of rebels and traitors, then is he guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors deserving impeachment. The evidence already before the country abundantly proves him guilty of all this.

The subject has been too recently and fully discussed to admit of doubt that Congress, by the joint action‡ of the two Houses, in the exercise of its legislative power, or by a concurrent admission of Senators and Representatives, has the exclusive power to provide for the reorganization of civil government in these States, and to determine the time and terms upon which restoration shall be made and what governments are republican in form. If the people by voluntary conventions organize governments they may be ratified by Congress and thus made valid.

All this is asserted in the Constitution,|| has been determined by the Supreme Court,§ has annulling the Governor's acts, and notifying the persons interested not to heed his proclamations.

Florida.

1865, April 8.—Abraham K. Allison, president of the rebel Senate of Florida, announced the death of John Milton, rebel Governor, and appointed June 7 for election of a successor.

May 14.—Major General Gillmore issued an order annulling this proclamation, and commanding the people to give it no heed whatever. (McPherson's Manual for 1866-67, pp. 19, 20, 22, 24.)

*In seven solemn proclamations the President seven times over declared that "the rebellion which has been waged by a portion of the people of the United States against the properly constituted authorities of the Government thereof in the most violent and revolting form, but whose organized and armed forces have now been almost entirely overcome, has, in its revolutionary progress, deprived the people of [these seven States] of all civil government."

†Proclamation of 29th of May, 1865.

‡Senate Report 127, second session Thirty-Eighth Congress; Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard Report, 1; Sherman's speech in Senate, Feb. 26, 1866; 2 Bishop Criminal Law, sec. 1224, note; Federalist No. 21, 43.

§Article four, section four, declares:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

This is found in connection with clauses relating to the admission of new States, the creation of new State governments, and in relation to domestic violence, and, on the maxim novus et socius, relates to the power of Congress to organize new State governments when old ones are destroyed by rebellion.

§In Luther vs. Borden (7 Howard Report, 1) Chief Justice Taney says:

"Under the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for as the United States guaranties to each State a republican government Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority; and its decision is binding on every other department of the Government."

"Undoubtedly a military government established as the permanent government of a State would not be a republican government, and it would be the duty of Congress to overthrow it."—Fleming vs. Page, 9 Howard, 615; Cross vs. Harrison, 16 Howard, 194; Federalist, 69, 85; Halleck International Law, 785.

been settled by Congress,* has been admitted again and again by the President,† and has never been denied until it became "his policy" to do so.‡ If it were conceded that the President during the war might in the absence of a restraining statute appoint military governors and establish military governments yet these could only exist as such and during a state of war, for Chief Justice Taney declared that "it would be the duty of Congress to overthrow" such government in exercising the power to establish civil government.

The military power cannot, without the sanction of Congress, establish permanent civil government for times of peace.||

When flagrant war ceased an "extraordinary occasion" had arisen which made it the duty of the President to "convene both Houses" of Congress. Refusing to perform this duty, which he knew to be necessary for this and other purposes,§ he issued seven solemn proclamations, assuming to appoint seven civilian provisional governors, holding no military commission and without "the advice and consent of the Senate," as follows:

On the 29th of May, 1865, one appointing

*Concurrent resolution of March 2, 1866, (Globe, vol. 67, p. 1143,) as follows:

"That in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such States entitled to such representation."

The exclusive power of Congress had been repeatedly asserted by the Senate (Sherman's speech in Senate, February 26, 1866) before Mr. Johnson became President, and by the bill passed by Congress and referred to in President Lincoln's proclamation of July 8, 1864, and since by the report of the joint Committee on Reconstruction, June 18, 1866, and February 13, 1866, (House Mis. Doc. 55, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress; House Report 30, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress,) the minority of the committee, consisting of the President's friends, practically conceding that his acts were unauthorized; and by the joint resolution of July 24, 1866, admitting Tennessee; and by the acts of Congress of March 2 and 23, 1867; and by the bill now vetoed.

†In Senate executive document 26 (first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, page 60) is the following, written by order of the President:

[Telegram.]

WASHINGTON, July 24, 1865.

W. L. SHARKEY,

Provisional Governor of Mississippi, Jackson:

Your telegram of the 21st has been received. The President sees no reason to interfere with General Slocum's proceedings. The government of the State will be provisional only until the civil authorities shall be restored with the approval of Congress. Meanwhile military authority cannot be withdrawn. WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Same document, page 205, is the following:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, September 12, 1865.

SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 29th ultimo, with the accompanying proclamation, has been received and submitted to the President. The steps to which it refers toward reorganizing the government of Florida seem to be in the main judicious, and good results from them may be hoped for. The presumption to which the proclamation refers, however, in favor of insurgents who may wish to vote, and who may have applied for but not received their pardons, is not entirely approved. All applications for pardons will be duly considered, and will be disposed of as soon as may be practicable. It must, however, be distinctly understood that the restoration to which your proclamation refers will be subject to the decision of Congress.

I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

See Globe, vol. 69, p. 210; first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, vol. 1. If the "approval of Congress" was necessary to give validity to the President's acts, the prior authority of Congress in the form of law was necessary to authorize it.

40TH CONG.....1ST SESS.

William W. Holden provisional governor of the State of North Carolina.

On the 13th of June, 1865, one appointing William L. Sharkey provisional governor of the State of Mississippi.

On the 17th of June, 1865, one appointing James Johnson provisional governor of the State of Georgia.

On the 17th of June, 1865, one appointing Alexander J. Hamilton provisional governor of the State of Texas.

On the 21st of June, 1865, one appointing Lewis E. Parsons provisional governor of the State of Alabama.

On the 30th of June, 1865, one appointing Benjamin F. Perry provisional governor of the State of South Carolina.

On the 18th of July, 1865, one appointing William Marvin provisional governor of the State of Florida.

These proclamations respectively declared it to be the duty of each Governor in his State—

"At the earliest practicable period to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for convening a convention, composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no others, for the purpose of altering or amending the constitution thereof; and with authority to exercise within the limits of said State, all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people of the State of North Carolina to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and its people to protection by the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence: Provided, That in any election that may be hereafter held for choosing delegates to any State convention, as aforesaid, no person shall be qualified as an elector, or shall be eligible as a member of such convention, unless he shall have previously taken the oath of amnesty, as set forth in the President's proclamation of May 29, A. D. 1865, and is a voter qualified as prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State in force immediately before the 20th day of May, 1861, the date of the so-called ordinance of secession; and the said convention when convened, or the Legislature that may be thereafter assembled, will prescribe the qualification of electors and the eligibility of persons to hold office under the constitution and laws of the State, a power the people of the several States composing the Federal Union have rightfully exercised from the origin of the Government to the present time."

And the President did direct—

"That the military commander of the department, and all officers and persons in the military and naval service, aid and assist the said provisional governor in carrying into effect this proclamation, and they are enjoined to abstain from in any way hindering, impeding, or discouraging the loyal people from the organization of a State government, as herein authorized."

The oath of amnesty was as follows:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves: So help me God."

By these proclamations the President usurped the power to create an office unknown to the Constitution or laws, to fill that office with incumbents holding by the tenure of his pleasure,* without the "advice and consent of the Senate," with a salary fixed by no law but his will,† and to be paid out of the public Treasury in violation of law.‡ He assumed the power to clothe these officers with authority to cause elections to be held for members of conventions, to create State governments by amending State constitutions in a mode different from that prescribed therein|| and without the sanction of Congress; he prescribed the qualifications* of electors and of members of the conventions, requiring of each an oath not required by the former constitutions or laws of the States; by his edicts enfranchising every rebel in these States who would take the oath he prescribed, and excluding the loyal freedmen, constituting nearly half the population of these States,‡ from all right to participate in elec-same shall have been read three times in each House of the General Assembly and agreed to by three fifths of the whole number of members of each House respectively; nor shall any alteration take place until the bill so agreed to shall have been published six months previous to a new election of members to the General Assembly."

* This is practically a conceded usurpation by the President's annual message of December 4, 1865, when in discussing "the propriety of attempting to make" "electors by the proclamation of the Executive," he says "such an act would have been assumption of power by the President which nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States would have warranted."

† A large majority of the white voters either engaged in rebellion or gave aid and comfort thereto in these States.—Senate Ex. Doc. 3, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, p. 2; House Ex. Doc. 81, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress.

"It was a maxim of ancient jurisprudence that a slave had not any country of his own: he acquired with his liberty an admission into the political society of which his patron was a member."—Gibbons v. Rome, ch. 2, p. 46.

* Andrew Johnson, in his Nashville speech of June 9, 1864, is thus reported:

"But in calling a convention to restore the State who shall restore and reestablish it? Shall the man who gave his influence and his means to destroy the Government? Is he to participate in the great work of reorganization? Shall he who brought this misery upon the State be permitted to control its destinies? If this be so, then all this precious blood of our brave soldiers and officers so freely poured out will have been wantonly spilled, all the glorious victories won by our noble armies will go for naught, and all the battle-fields which have been sown with dead heroes during the rebellion will have been made memorable in vain."

"Why all this carnage and devastation? It was that treason might be put down and traitors punished. Therefore I say that traitors should take a back seat in the work of restoration. If there be but five thousand men in Tennessee loyal to the Constitution, loyal to freedom, loyal to justice, these true and faithful men should control the work of reorganization and reformation absolutely. I say that the traitor has ceased to be a citizen, and in joining the rebellion has become a public enemy. He forfeited his right to vote with loyal men when he renounced his citizenship and sought to destroy our Government. We say to the most honest and industrious foreigner who comes from England or Germany to dwell among us and to add to the wealth of the country, 'Before you can be a citizen you must stay here for five years.' If we are so cautious about foreigners, who voluntarily renounce their homes to live with us, what should we say to the traitor, who, although born and reared among us, has raised a pariahs hand against the Government which always protected him? My judgment is that he should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship. A fellow who takes the oath merely to save his property and denies the validity of the oath is a perjured man, and not to be trusted. Before these repenting rebels can be trusted let them bring forth the fruits of repentance. He who helped to make all these widows and orphans, who draped the streets of Nashville in mourning, should suffer for his great crime. The work is in our own hands. We can destroy this rebellion. With Grant thundering on the Potomac before Richmond, and Sherman and Thomas on their march toward Atlanta, the day will ere long be ours. Will any madly persist in rebellion? Suppose that an equal number be slain in every battle, it is plain that the result must be the utter extermination of the rebels. Ah! these rebel leaders have a strong personal reason for holding out to save their necks from the halter; and these leaders must feel the power of the Government. Treason must be made odious, and traitors must be punished and impoverished. Their great plantations must be seized and divided into small farms, and sold to honest, industrious men. The day for protecting the lands and negroes of these authors of the rebellion is past. It is high time it was. I have been most deeply pained at some things which have come under my observation. We get men in command, who, under the influence of flattery, fawning, and caressing, grant protection to the rich traitor, while the poor Union man stands out in the cold, often unable to get a receipt or a voucher for his losses. [Cries of 'That's so!' from all parts of the crowd.] In his remarks at an interview with citizens of Indiana, April 21, 1865, he said:

"I hold it as an solemn obligation in any one of these deliberate disfranchisement was consummated by constitutions created by these conventions,* as if the wrongs inflicted by centuries of slavery upon an unoffending race were not already enough without adding the domination of rebels. And these constitutions were forced upon the States without any vote of the people to ratify them.†

The President, conceding the justice of demanding terms of restoration,‡ prescribed such as he dictated,§ ignoring the rights of Congress, and in obedience to his will governments were organized, Governors, Legislatures, and all the officers of States chosen, and Senators and Representatives were elected to Congress not in conformity with law,¶ generally rebels who could not take the test oath.¶

States where the rebel armies have been beaten back or expelled—I care not how small the number of Union men, if enough to man the ship of State—I hold it, I say, a high duty to protect and secure to them a republican form of government. This is no new opinion. It is expressed in conformity with my understanding of the genius and theory of our Government. Then in adjusting and putting the Government upon its legs again I think the progress of this work must pass into the hands of its friends. If a State is to be nursed until it again gets strength it must be nursed by its friends, not smothered by its enemies.

‡ The President, in his first message to Congress, a paper in which by the Constitution it was made his duty to give Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall consider just and sufficient, declared that "it is not too much to ask in the name of the whole people that" "the evidence of the sincerity in the future maintenance of the Union shall be put beyond any doubt by the ratification of the proposed amendment to the Constitution." "Indeed, it is not too much to require of the States which are now resuming their places in the family of the Union that they give pledge of perpetual loyalty and peace." "The amendment to the Constitution being accepted, it would remain for the States whose powers have been so long suspended to resume their places in the two branches of the national legislature and thereby complete the work of restoration."

On the 3d of April, 1866, the President recognized North Carolina as a State by issuing to that State agricultural college land scrip for nearly two hundred and seventy thousand acres of land under the act of July 2, 1862. See joint resolution of Congress of March 30, 1867; laws of 1867, p. 283, the preamble of which is as follows:

"Whereas on the 3d day of April, 1866, by the authority and direction of the President of the United States, agricultural college scrip, covering

And in the veto message now before us the President says of these illegal governments that "Executive recognition, as is well known, has been frequent and unwavering."

When Napoleon III transformed France into an empire he submitted the whole subject to a vote of the people; but Andrew Johnson in his work submitted to neither Constitution, laws, votes, nor popular will, but defied them all.

It was said in England at one time "the Privy Council came at last to make laws by proclamation, and the Star Chamber ruined those that would not obey. At last they fell together." (2 Lord Hardwick's State Papers, 473; 4 Hatsell's Prec., 65n; 2 Chase Trial, 460.) Andrew Johnson assumed more than the powers of the Privy Council and became his own Star Chamber.

A President whose conduct "is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a free people," and deserves impeachment.

In thus devising a scheme of disfranchisement the President seems to have been guided by a purpose to speedily secure power to the rebel States rather than a sense of duty,* if he did not act contrary to his own convictions expressed at an earlier date,† and which he nearly two hundred and seventy thousand acres, was issued and delivered to the State of North Carolina, under the act of Congress of July 5, 1862, providing for agricultural colleges; and whereas by the same authority the General Land Office is now preparing to issue scrip in like manner to the States of Virginia, Georgia, and Mississippi; and whereas said action of the President takes for granted that said States are restored to their proper constitutional relation to the Union, and are to be recognized in all respects as entitled to the rights of the other States of the Union, which question Congress alone can rightfully determine: therefore, be it resolved, &c."

* August 15 President Johnson sent this telegram:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., August 15, 1865.

Governor W. L. SHARKEY, Jackson, Mississippi:

I am gratified to see that you have organized your convention without difficulty. I hope that without delay your convention will amend your State constitution, abolishing slavery and denying to all future Legislatures the power to legislate that there is property in man; also that they will adopt the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery. If you could extend the elective franchise to all persons of color who can read the Constitution of the United States in English and write their names, and to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than two hundred and fifty dollars, and pay taxes thereon, you would completely disarm the adversary and set an example the other States will follow. This you can do with perfect safety, and you thus place the southern States, in reference to free persons of color, upon the same basis with the free States. I hope and trust your convention will do this, and, as a consequence, the Radicals, who are wild upon negro franchise, will be completely foiled in their attempt to keep the southern States from renewing their relations to the Union by not accepting their Senators and Representatives.

ANDREW JOHNSON,
President of the United States.

† Andrew Johnson is reported as saying in a speech at Nashville, October 24, 1864:

"I, Andrew Johnson, hereby proclaim liberty, full, broad, unconditional liberty, to every man in Tennessee. I will be your Moses and lead you through the Red sea of struggle and servitude to a future of liberty and peace. Rebellion and slavery shall no more pollute our State. Loyal men, whether white or black, shall govern the State."

In his speech at Admiral Lee's residence in Washington, after he became Vice President, Mr. Johnson is reported as saying that to save the Union he "was willing to cut Africa loose from Asia and sink the whole black race ten thousand fathoms deep." At this point an auditor said, "Let the negro stay where he is, Governor, and give him the ballot, and the Union will be safe forever." Mr. Johnson replied, "And I am ready for that, too."

In his interview with George L. Stearns, October 3, 1865, he said:

"Our Government is a grand and lofty structure. In searching for its foundation we find it rests on the broad basis of popular rights. The elective franchise is not a natural right, but a political right. I am opposed to giving the States too much power, and also to a great consolidation of power in the central Government."

"If I interfered with the vote in the rebel States, to dictate that no negro shall vote, I might do the same for my own purposes in Pennsylvania. Our only safety lies in allowing each State to control the right of voting by its own laws, and we have the power to control the rebel States if they go wrong."

Veto Message—Mr. Lawrence.

40TH CONG.... 1ST SESS.

abandoned* when he conceived the design, as he did, of putting the Government in the hands of rebels and those who during the war had sympathized with them.

This scheme of reconstruction denying the power of Congress became and is known as "the President's policy," while that which asserts the power of the law-making department is known as the "policy of Congress." The President's policy is approved by every rebel because it has given them every office and entire political control in every one of the rebel States. No adequate protection is given by them to the life, liberty, or property of freedmen or loyal white men. By these rebel State organizations the freedmen are disfranchised, and though loyal white men are nominally permitted to vote their votes are unavailing to secure protection. And Congress having in the "reconstruction acts" declared these presidential State organizations "illegal," either the President is guilty of usurpation, or Congress has unjustly accused him; either the President deserves impeachment for his "illegal" conduct, or Congress has erred in declaring his work illegal.

This usurpation by the President is clearly impeachable, and the mode by which he sought to accomplish it and force it upon the country not only aggravates the crime, but in view of his motives constitutes additional grounds of impeachment.

To achieve his purposes he was guilty of many unnecessary and unauthorized usurpations and acts of oppression.

He held the liberty of the press subject to his sovereign will and control, suppressing the publication of such newspapers as he disapproved, and permitting them to resume publication, contrary to the advice of General Grant, by exacting a pledge to "support" "the policy of his administration,"† when he was advised his order "was improper and mischievous in tendency."

He held large portions of the rebel population in abject servility, not as a measure of

If they rebel we have the Army and can control them by it, and, if necessary, by legislation also. If the General Government controls the right to vote in the States it may establish such rules as will restrict the vote to a small number of persons, and thus create a central despotism.

"My position here is different from what it would be if I was in Tennessee. There I should try to introduce negro suffrage gradually. First, those who had served in the Army; those who could read and write; and perhaps a property qualification for others, say two hundred or two hundred and fifty dollars. It would not do to let the negro have universal suffrage now; it would breed a war of races.

There was a time in the southern States when the slaves of large owners looked down upon non-slave-owners because they did not own slaves. The larger the number of slaves the masters owned the prouder they were; and this has produced hostility between the mass of the whites and the negroes. The outrages are mostly from non-slaveholding whites against the negro, and from the negro upon the non-slaveholding whites.

"The negro will vote with the late master, whom he does not hate, rather than with the non-slaveholding white, whom he does hate. Universal suffrage would create another war, not against us, but a war of races.

"Another thing: this Government is the freest and best on earth, and I feel sure is destined to last; but to secure this we must elevate and purify the ballot."

† The Richmond Examiner published leading editorials January 26, February 5 and 6, 1866, as follows:

"It would be immeasurably the worst consequence of our defeat in the war that the South should lose its moral and intellectual distinctions as a people and cease to assert its well-known superiority in civilization, in political scholarship and in all the standards of individual character over the people of the North. That superiority has been recognized by every foreign observer and by the intelligent everywhere: it is the South that in the past penned four fifths of the political literature of America, and furnished the list of names best known in Europe either for commanding statesmanship or for personal virtue. That superiority the war has not conquered or lowered, and the South will do right to claim and cherish it."

In the same paper is printed an account of a ball at the Ballard House, given by officers of the Union Army. The writer ridicules and insults Federal sol-safety to the Government, but that he might bribe them to the support of his policy by the exercise of the pardoning power.

He has restored to rebels property of the value of many millions of dollars, in violation of law and in disregard of the rights of loyal citizens.

He has without authority, without consideration, and in violation of law transferred to corporations controlled by rebels railroads constructed in part by the Government at a cost of many millions, as he has also other property used for insurrectionary purposes.

He has without authority and in violation of law sold railroad rolling stock and other property of the United States of the value of many millions of dollars on a long credit with insufficient security for less than its value to corporations controlled by rebels, and when payments fell due he has corruptly and without authority suspended indefinitely the performance of their obligations.

He has prostituted the power of appointment to and removals from office to the maintenance of his policy, regardless of and to the great prejudice of the public interests, corrupting by it as far as possible all who were base enough to abandon principles, and exerting it in a spirit of proscription and to an extent unknown in any former administration.

diers, and after giving an account of the preliminaries of the ball he proceeds:

"The evening arrives, the Ballard is resplendent; there are the haughty dancers, the massive, gorgeous epaulets, the polished boots, the shining face, and the ubiquitous brass; there are women, too, and southern women, we blush to say it, leaning on the arms which guided the weapon or perhaps drew the saber in the deadly conflict. The dance goes on. Supper is announced. The band strikes up, and the gay throng passes into the supper-room; we count forty-five ladies in all; but, thank God! we see but few of the Richmond ladies. But stop! whence that joyous-looking, bright-eyed southern girl? Do our eyes deceive us? Can it be? We look again; we doubt; we look again, but it is so. We cast our eyes over the room, but in that crowd we can see only one other lady of Richmond. We know the supper is over; the sound of music breaks forth, and the forty-five ladies are soon again whirling in the dance. The music is delightful: the room glitters with brass buttons and epaulets; but where is the joy for the southern heart? Shall we fawn and truckle, play the hypocrite and smile when our hearts are full of woe? Where are the memories of the battle-field?"

Other articles were published, when General Grant issued the following:

HEADQUARTERS ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, February 17, 1866.

You will please send to these headquarters, as soon as practicable, and from time to time thereafter, such copies of newspapers published in your department as contain sentiments of disloyalty and hostility to the Government in any of its branches, and state whether such paper is habitual in its utterances of such sentiments. The persistent publication of articles calculated to keep up hostility of feeling between the people of different sections of the country cannot be tolerated. This information is called for with a view to their suppression, which will be done from these headquarters only.

By command of Lieutenant General Grant:

T. S. BOWERS,

Assistant Adjutant General.

The Richmond Examiner was suppressed. Mr. Pollard, the editor, came to Washington, sought the President, begged that the order be revoked, and was referred to General Grant. Upon calling to see the latter, Pollard was requested to put his application in writing. The following is a copy of General Grant's reply, indorsed on the back of the application:

Reply to Application of H. Rives Pollard, praying a revocation of the Order suppressing the Richmond Examiner.

The course of the Examiner, in every number which I have seen, has been such as to foster and increase the ill-feeling toward the Government of the United States by the discontented portion of the southern people. I believe it to be for the best interests of the whole people, North and South, to suppress such utterances wherever the power exists to do so. The power certainly does exist when martial law prevails, and will be exercised. Reluctant as I was to pursue this course I have felt it my duty to pursue it in this instance; and as much as I dislike to interfere with the interests of individuals, I would deem it improper and mischievous in tendency to revoke the order for the suppression of the Richmond Examiner at this time.

U. S. GRANT,

Lieutenant General.

In February, 1866, Pollard published a card, in which he says:

"As I am not unwilling that the public should know what pledges I have really given to the author-

He aimed a blow at the Constitution and the liberties of the country by refusing to submit appointments to office to the Senate for their advice and consent, and by retaining men in office regardless of that body.

He made an order removing all penalties from a large number of persons marked as deserters on the rolls of the War Department for the purpose of securing the election of a favorite candidate for Congress in West Virginia, regardless of duty and without evidence.

He assumed a power to dispense with the acts of Congress, and appointed rebels to office in violation of law.

He refused to execute the laws for the punishment of traitors or for the confiscation of their property or that used for insurrectionary purposes.

By his proclamation of April 2, 1866, and other acts, he assumed to himself the right to determine when war had ceased, without consulting the law-making power, by whose authority alone war can be made and peace declared in case of rebellion. The assumption of a power to declare peace, to say when or how long the laws of war shall continue, is simply a power to terminate war at the pleasure of the President, and might be made fatal to national existence.

While these usurpations were being practiced the President maintained the operation of martial law in the rebel States,* suspending from the right to hold office under the so-called State authority whomsoever he chose.† While maintaining the right to try civil offenders by military commissions‡ and punish at his pleasities at Washington, I append a copy of the letter which I addressed to President Johnson, and upon which his action was based:

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1866.

To the President:

If the publication of the Richmond Examiner is permitted to be resumed I promise that it shall support the Union, the Constitution, and the laws, and the policy of your administration.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

H. RIVES POLLARD.

"This is the sum-total of the pledges given by me. I knew nothing of General Grant's order for the release of the office until I read it in the papers. I saw that officer but once, when he refused emphatically to revoke the order for the seizure of the office. It was evident that I had nothing to hope from him, for he said to me expressly that, if he had the authority, he would that day suppress the New York News, the Cincinnati Enquirer, and the Chicago Times, adding that the 'Copperhead papers of the North,' as he designated them, were doing quite as much harm as the papers in the South. Deriving no satisfaction from him I was forced to appeal to the President, giving him the pledge contained in the letter above. It was written during my last interview with the President and in his own office.

"To his kind and considerate hearing, and to his sense of justice, I feel that I owe the restoration of my paper. Without attempting to enter upon the details of my interview, I may say with propriety that enough transpired to convince me that the President is the true friend of the South, and that it is the duty of our people, as it shall be our pleasure in the future, to extend to him a cordial and generous support."

Upon this pledge to support "Johnson's policy" Pollard was permitted by the President to resume the publication of his paper.

ure, his conduct encouraged the rebels to murder in cold blood unoffending citizens in the exercise of their peaceful rights.*

Professing to regard Louisiana as a regularly organized State, he in violation of the Constitution† authorized the attorney general of that State, a notorious rebel, to call on the national military authorities to aid in the work of suppressing a lawful and loyal assemblage of the people,‡ and though there was "an absolute massacre," "a murder without necessity,"|| by a rebel mob in New Orleans, no one of the guilty perpetrators has ever been brought to justice or punishment.

While thus giving encouragement to rebels to suppress a loyal and lawful assemblage he refused¶ military aid when demanded by the Governor of Tennessee‡ to preserve the peace and execute the laws. Assuming the right to require illegal conventions to be held in seven States at his pleasure, he denied the right of a legal convention to be held in Louisiana.

While many thousands of loyal citizens, including freedmen, were murdered without cause by rebels during his work of reorganization the President failed to cause the guilty perpetrators to be arrested, tried, or punished, and forcibly dissolved a military commission in Virginia sitting for the trial of an acknowledged murderer whom the civil authorities failed to punish, and he is to-day at large and unmolested.**

He has brought reproach upon himself and degraded the dignity of his office by indecent harangues to the people and denounced Congress as "a body called or which assumes to be the Congress of the United States, while in fact it is a Congress of only a part of the States."††

And finally, under his administration, Jefferson Davis—the greatest criminal of the age except Andrew Johnson himself—is at large, never to receive the punishment due to his crimes.

¶ Telegram July 17, 1866.

‡ NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, July 17, 1866.

Lieutenant General GRANT, Washington:

Some of the members of the House of Representatives of the Tennessee General Assembly conduct themselves in a very refractory manner, absenting themselves to prevent a quorum, thus obstructing business. The Governor cannot manage them with the means at his disposal, and has applied to me for military assistance. Shall I furnish it?

GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Major General Commanding.

The following answer was immediately given:

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1866.

General Grant will instruct General Thomas that the facts stated in his telegram do not warrant interference of military authority. The administration of the peace in Nashville belongs properly to the State authorities, and the duty of the United States forces is not to interfere in any way in the controversy between the political authorities and the State, and General Thomas will strictly abstain from any interference between them.

E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

I have said enough to prove that the existing State governments in ten of the rebel States were illegally created by executive usurpation and that the President is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors deserving impeachment.

The "President's policy" finds no sanction in that of his predecessor. Mr. Lincoln never did "during his administration submit to his Cabinet any plan for the reorganization of the rebel States." Neither he nor his Cabinet ever had any plan matured. The time had not arrived when it was practicable. He did indeed appoint military governors who "ranked as brigadier generals in the United States service,"* and were proper military officers† confirmed by the Senate as such. "There was a difference both of time and circumstance" between what was done by the two Presidents.

"Military governors were appointed during the war, and provisional governors after that." The former were clothed with military power and charged with military duties; the latter were civil officers not appointed "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," and were charged with civil duties.

The "restored governments" of Virginia, of Tennessee, and of Arkansas was the volun-

* Order of September 29, 1862.

† House Mis. Doc. 55, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress; House Report 16, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, p. 37.

President Lincoln appointed the following military governors:

Andrew Johnson, Tennessee, March 3, 1862; nominated to the Senate March 4, 1862, and confirmed same day.

Edward Stanley, North Carolina, May 19, 1862; resigned January 15, 1863.

John S. Phelps, Arkansas, July 19, 1862; nominated to the Senate January 19, 1863; appointment revoked July 9, 1863.

George F. Shepley, Louisiana, June 3, 1862; nominated to the Senate January 9, 1863, and March 9, 1863; confirmed March 11, 1863; resignation accepted June 16, 1865.

A. J. Hamilton, Texas, November 14, 1862; nominated to the Senate January 7, 1864; confirmed April 1, 1864; resignation accepted June, 1865.

On the 6th of June, 1862, a resolution was introduced into the Senate having reference to the appointment more especially, it would seem, of Governor Stanley, whose duties were rather civil than military, in which is declared the office "a post unknown to the Constitution and laws of the Union." (Globe, vol. 59, pp. 2447, 2536.)

When the Army appropriation bill was under discussion in the Senate in January, 1863, Mr. TRUMBULL offered an amendment prohibiting the payment of money from the Treasury "as salary for or on account of services" to two classes of persons, when the "office or employment is not authorized by some existing law." To wit:

1. "Any person acting or assuming to act as an officer, civil, military, or naval."

2. "Or in any other capacity in the service of the Government."

Mr. FESSENDEN objected to this discussing both classes. As to persons other than officers he said:

"In time of war there may be many persons in the employ of Government whose employment is not recognized by any existing law, and in the nature of things cannot be." "It is for that purpose that we provide a contingent fund for the use of the Secretary of War."

He then discussed that part of the amendment relating to officers or persons assuming to act as such, and said:

"It applies to another class of men. For instance, there have been some civil appointments made in the nature of civil offices, and they have undoubtedly been paid out of the contingent fund."

"Take the case of Governor Stanley, of North Carolina. That is not a military appointment."

"I suppose it is not the intention of the Senator in offering the amendment to limit the Secretary of War with reference to the discretion he has over the contingent fund."

"and it would be proper"

"if the amendment should be adopted so to express it. If it applies to the contingent fund, I suggest to the Senator that he could not possibly give it that extent without creating very serious embarrassment."

"Mr. TRUMBULL. I will modify it in that respect so as not to apply to the employment of persons, but confine it to officers."

"Mr. WILSON. Then that objection is to be avoided."

And referring to the case of Mr. Stanley, he added: "We have some other officers that have not been appointed according to law."

"I think we should arrest all these appointments. That is my judgment about it, and I am willing to tary work of the people.* The work of reorganization in Louisiana,† inaugurated by a major general of the Army, was a legitimate means of suppressing rebellion, but could not authorize permanent civil government unless ratified by Congress.

President Lincoln's proclamations of December 8, 1863, and July 8, 1864, were made during flagrant war as war measures to induce the people to return to loyalty and not assuming to create valid permanent civil governments. He never did, like President Johnson, declare any State "restored in conformity with the" Constitution. President Lincoln merely invited the voluntary action of the people; but he declared "that whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally rests exclusively with the respective Houses and not to any extent with the Executive." In the proclamation of July 8, 1864, he said he was "unprepared" "to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration," and Congress has found it necessary to change the plan provided in the reconstruction laws as circumstances pointed out the necessity.

No precedent can sanctify the flagrant usurpations of Andrew Johnson.

If the House of Representatives has not the power or shrinks from the duty of preferring articles of impeachment for the repeated crimes and misdemeanors of which the President has been guilty, then is the Constitution a failure or the Representatives of the people will voluntarily imperil civil liberty forever by a precedent which may give immunity to unlimited executive usurpation hereafter.

A successful impeachment in a proper case for a justifiable cause would be the crowning triumph of republican government, demonstrating that revolution is not, as in monarchies, the remedy for usurpations, and teaching all future Presidents that they are amenable to the Senate and the nation for every attempt to violate the laws or subvert the Constitution.

I proceed to notice some of the fallacies of the veto message. The President argues that the existing State governments in the rebel States are legal, because—

"During that period, whilst these States were in actual rebellion, and after that rebellion was brought veto for this amendment if it is so framed that it will only affect this class of cases."—Globe 1862-63, vol. 61, p. 555.

The amendment was so framed as to prohibit the appointment of provisional governors (charged with civil duties like those appointed by President Johnson) or the payment of their salaries out of the contingent fund or otherwise, and there it stands to-day a part of the act of February 9, 1863. (See Globe 1861-62, vol. 60, pp. 3691, 3138.)

On 20th September, 1862, it was "Ordered, That the military governors appointed by the War Department for States and Territories shall be uniformed and rank as brigadier generals in the United States service."

The appointment of brigadier generals requires the "advice and consent of the Senate."

The duties devolved on these officers (unless Stanley be an exception) were purely military, and unlike the provisional governors appointed by President Johnson.

* The appointment of Andrew Johnson as military Governor of Tennessee, made after he was confirmed as a brigadier general, did not contemplate reorganization of State governments under the authority of the President, but only by the people, to be ratified by Congress. It was as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 3, 1862.

SIR: You are hereby appointed military Governor of the State of Tennessee, with authority to exercise and perform within the limits of that State all and singular the powers, duties, and functions pertaining to the office of military Governor, (including the power to establish all necessary offices and tribunals, and suspend the writ of habeas corpus.) during the pleasure of the President, or until the loyal inhabitants of that State shall organize a civil government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON.

to a close, they have been again and again recognized as States of the Union. Representation has been apportioned to them as States. They have been divided into judicial districts for the holding of district and circuit courts of the United States as States of the Union only can be districted."

If this proves anything it proves too much: it proves that the rebel State governments during the rebellion were lawful as fully as it proves the existing creations of the President are lawful. It will give validity to organized rebellions as lawful States.

The war was waged on our part to suppress the rebellion and destroy the rebel State and confederate governments organized in aid of it.

If the rebel State governments were lawful, by what authority did the President at the close of hostilities drive their Governors and Legislatures from power and place and deny them the right to act as such?

The fact that representatives were apportioned to the States and that they were divided into judicial districts did not recognize the existence of any State government at all. The apportionment was to the geographical State, to take effect in futuro, when there might be lawful State governments; and judicial districts recognize only geographical boundaries—not the corporate State or State government. National courts may be held, revenue officers and postmasters perform their duties in any State, though its people would refuse to elect State officers or maintain a State government.

The Constitution provides that—

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law."

But this refers only to the geographical State.

Again, the President, referring to the rebel States, says:

"They have been called upon by Congress to act through their Legislatures upon at least two amendments to the Constitution of the United States. As States they have ratified one amendment, which required the vote of twenty-seven States of the thirty-six then composing the Union. When the requisite twenty-seven votes were given in favor of that amendment—seven of which votes were given by seven of these ten States—it was proclaimed to be a part of the Constitution of the United States, and slavery was declared no longer to exist in the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction. If these seven States were not legal States of the Union it follows as the inevitable consequence that in some of the States slavery yet exists."

It is not true that Congress called on these States to ratify any constitutional amendment. The Secretary of State sent the amendment to those States, but their ratification was not necessary, since three fourths of the States having legal State governments can ratify an amendment. And if Congress had directly required the amendment to be submitted to those States their validity would not be thereby established, nor would the ratification by any such illegal State government have any force, unless Congress should thereafter recognize and give validity to the State government, and thus give effect to what had been previously done. By a well known rule of law, if Congress should ratify a State government the ratification would relate back and give validity to certain acts done by that State.

Nor is it true, as alleged, that the Supreme Court has recognized these States. On the contrary, on the 15th of April, 1867, the Supreme Court refused to entertain a bill filed by the so-called State of Mississippi, holding in effect that the status of the rebel States was a political question to be determined by Congress, so much so that the court refused permission to amend the bill so as to proceed against the military officers. No suit has been entertained where any one of these States has been a party.

But the President says that cases pending in the Supreme Court on appeal and error

"when the rebellion began have not been dismissed upon any idea of the cessation of jurisdiction."

Again he says, new cases since the rebellion have come to the Supreme Court from these States. And, says the President:

"Finally, in the allotment of their circuits, made by the judges at the December term, 1865, every one of these States is put on the same footing of equality with all the other States of the Union. Virginia and North Carolina, being a part of the fourth circuit, are allotted to the Chief Justice."

I answer that the existence of a lawful or of any State government is not necessary to enable the Supreme Court to exercise its jurisdiction in suits between individuals, and if so, no decision has yet been made on plea or motion on that question. The cases pending are from the national circuit courts—no decision has been made in any case removed from a State court. The judicial circuits exist, and judges are allotted to them, their functions not depending on the existence of a State government. If the Supreme Court had recognized these States as de facto political corporations their legal validity would not thereby have been affirmed.

But the Supreme Court in the Mississippi case referred to affirmed in substance that it "is the duty of the President" "to see that the laws are faithfully executed; and among those laws" "the acts of March 2 and March 28, 1867, commonly called the reconstruction acts," which declare these State governments "illegal." That was on an application for leave to file a bill in the name of the State of Mississippi, praying the Court to enjoin the President from executing those laws. Chief Justice Chase said:

"Suppose the bill filed and the injunction prayed for be allowed. If the President refuse obedience, it is needless to observe that the Court is without power to enforce its process. If, on the other hand, the President complies with the order of the Court, and refuses to execute the act of Congress, is it not clear that a collision may occur between the executive and legislative departments of the Government? May not the House of Representatives impeach the President for such refusal? And in that case could this Court interpose in behalf of the President, thus endangering by compliance with its mandate, and restrain by injunction the Senate of the United States from sitting as a court of impeachment? Would the strange spectacle be offered to the public wonder of an attempt by this Court to arrest proceedings in that court? These questions answer themselves."

And this decides a question on the law of impeachment of great practical moment at this time.

But I will not pursue these fallacies of the President further.

A few words as to the President's objection that these States are made "subject in all respects to the military commanders," and I will not trespass longer on the patience of the House. He says:

"The veto of the original of the 2d of March was based on two distinct grounds: the interference of Congress in matters strictly appertaining to the reserved powers of the States, and the establishment of military tribunals for the trial of citizens in time of peace."

I affirm that these military reconstruction acts are justified by the Constitution. It is a universal rule under the Constitution that where Congress is clothed with a power they may employ any and all reasonable means in their discretion to carry it into effect. (4 Wheaton, 316; 3 Howard, 609; 5 Elliott's Deb., 492; 1 Wheaton, 325.)

Congress is clothed with the power to guaranty republican governments to the rebel States. The military reconstruction acts point out the means deemed necessary to effect the object. Congress is the sole judge of their wisdom, expediency, and necessity. From their decision there is no appeal. The means employed are not those which might be adopted among a loyal people, but the remedy must be equal to the occasion which calls for its exercise. Experience has shown that nothing less than these reconstruction acts will accomplish the purpose. They simply propose to accomplish in pursuance of law what the President attempted without law. These acts set aside illegal State governments: Andrew Johnson by military orders and by force set aside the illegal rebel State organizations.

They provide for conventions to form lawful State governments and prescribe the qualifications of voters: the President without law assumed to do this by his own proclamations. The military commanders are authorized to remove local civil officers, but Andrew Johnson did the same. He wiped out of existence by a few brief military orders all the officers of seven rebel State organizations and afterwards removed others at his pleasure. He governed by military power when the defeated rebels were humbled and ready to "accept the situation;" and now, when under his policy they are arrogant and give no protection to the life, liberty, or property of loyal citizens, Congress authorizes the exercise of military power in view of a greater necessity.

Though flagrant war has ceased that condition of society yet exists in ten of the rebel States recognized by writers on international law as a state of war—non flagrant bello, sed nondum cessante bello. This justifies the exercise of military power until peace in fact as well as in name has "returned to bless the land."*

*The President is therefore guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in this—

I. That he did, in the year 1865, unconstitutionally and in violation of duty, corruptly neglect and refuse to convene the two Houses of Congress, with intent to prevent the Congress from enacting laws regulating the government of the States declared in rebellion and preparatory to or providing for the reorganization of civil State governments in said States, and with intent to assume and exercise the power to authorize, regulate, and control the work of such reorganization himself, and to deny the right of and exclude the exercise of such power by Congress.

II. That he did, in the year 1865 and 1866, by sundry proclamations, telegrams, letters, and orders, unconstitutionally, in violation of duty, and corruptly, assume, usurp and exercise the power to create the office of provisional governor, an office unknown to the Constitution or laws, and to appoint to said office provisional governors in seven of said insurrectionary States; to require them to cause elections to be held for members of conventions to make or amend constitutions of State governments and to organize civil governments in said States; and in like manner he did prescribe the qualifications of electors and members of said conventions by means whereof such members were elected and such conventions held and State governments organized in said States; and he did in like manner employ the military power of the Government to aid in executing his said purposes with intent to subvert the power of Congress to exercise its powers himself, to decide whether and when such governments so created were republican in form and to recognize them as such, to disfranchise the freedmen of said States, and cause to be organized and recognized civil State governments which should permanently disfranchise and deny civil and political rights to said freedmen, and with intent to secure to rebels and traitors the permanent ascendancy and control of said States and the power thereof in the Government of the United States.

III. He did, in like manner and with like intents, repeatedly, after such illegal State governments were organized, declare them and recognize them as "entirely rested to all their functions as States in conformity with the organic law of the land," and did refuse to submit the question of their validity and recognition to Congress, but denied their right and power over that subject, and did corruptly exercise the veto power to accomplish his said purposes.

IV. That, for the purpose of accomplishing his purposes aforesaid, he did, unconstitutionally and corruptly, exercise the powers in him vested as President and others not delegated to him as hereinbefore shown, and did deny that the Congress of the United States was such Congress, and otherwise sought to bring Congress and its members into odium and contempt with the people.

The President is also guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in this, that—

I. He did, in April and May, 1866, unconstitutionally and without authority of law, usurp and assume to exercise the power of declaring the insurrection and rebellion existing in the rebel States at an end and that a state of war had ceased, with intent to subvert the Constitution and the authority of Congress, to withdraw from the loyal citizens of said States the protection of the United States, and to secure the permanent establishment of so-called State governments in said States set up in pursuance of authority previously usurped by the President in violation of the Constitution.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reduction of the Currency—Mr. Butler.

HO. OF REPS.

Reduction of the Currency.

SPEECH OF HON. BENJ. F. BUTLER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

November 26 and 27, 1867.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration House bill No. 39, relating to the reduction of the currency—

Mr. BUTLER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Having been so pointedly and directly called upon by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to reply in some small degree as I may to his criticisms upon what he has been pleased to term my financial scheme I may have to ask the House, as I have neither a speech written nor printed, and must speak, therefore, with great slowness, because one cannot speak glibly on the grave subjects of finance unless he speaks from a written or printed paper—I may therefore be obliged to ask the House, contrary to my wont, to give me a little more time to say as much in reply as the gentleman from Maine has upon his chosen ground of attack. I am sure the courtesy of my brother members, knowing I have never spoken long, will yield me that favor.

The gentleman from Maine seeks in the first place to meet this great question of the finances of the nation, more important than any question we have settled except the question of slavery, by an argument to the prejudice of the House, knowing full well that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Pendleton] may have some theories on this question and political opinions in general which are distasteful to this House. He has sought to prejudice the argument at this point by coupling the views expressed by me with those expressed by the gentleman from Ohio. Now, why should he do that if he has a good case? My argument, sir, will be neither better nor worse, my views are neither more nor less correct, because they are agreed to by a gentleman from the West with whom on other questions I disagree. It is because the gentleman from Maine attempts to meet this question, I respectfully submit to the House, not by argument, but by prejudice.

The views entertained by Mr. Pendleton and the views which I have put forth differ in this: so far as I understand him—and if I do him wrong it is because I have not seen any authoritative exposition of his position—he would issue legal-tender notes to an amount sufficient to take up all the national interest-bearing bonds that may become due; he would by the fiat of the Government issue promises to pay without interest, to be used as currency in excess, it may be, of the wants of the country, to cancel the interest-bearing debt. The only proposition which I hold in common with Mr. Pendleton is that by the law of the land and by the legal interpretation of the words of the contract five-twenty bonds are payable, not in coin, but in lawful money of the United States.

Mr. PRUYN here said: Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts I beg leave to say that I do not understand the views of Mr. Pendleton to be as broad as has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I understand Mr. Pendleton to hold that by the terms of the law which authorized the issues of the five-twenties the principal may be paid by the Government in paper, as they were paid for to the Government by the purchasers, but that if a sound system of finances be established, and the Government expenses be properly reduced in accordance with the views just urged by the gentleman from Maine, the whole of the Government debt will soon be placed upon a thoroughly sound footing, and the question now under discussion will be of comparatively little importance.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no authority to speak for Mr. Pendleton. I never exchanged a word with him by letter or personally in my life. I know nothing of his views except what I see in the public papers, and I say the only thing in common between us is, that I hold, as I suppose he does, that, by the letter, by the spirit, and by the justice of the contract, the five-twenties are payable in the lawful money of the United States.

Now, there are three grounds upon which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] insists that this is not so. He says first, by the letter of the law the five-twenties are payable in coin. Let us carefully examine that proposition. And in order to understand precisely how the law applies, take it with you that up to the time of the issuing of the five-twenties no loan of the United States had ever been issued payable in anything else than coin. The gentleman says no loan had ever been issued in which anything was said as to what was the currency in which it was payable. Why? Because up to that time there was never any currency known to the Government of the United States other than coin. Therefore the seven-thirties of 1861 and the 1881 sixes of 1861, with all the debt prior to the war, were, in letter and in spirit, payable in coin. Because Congress in issuing them was dealing with a condition of things and a currency then existing, and therefore the 1881 sixes are payable, according to the fair spirit of the contract, in coin. Therefore I enunciate, as my first proposition, and one that I shall endeavor to enforce on the House and the country, that every dollar of indebtedness of the United States which is contracted by the acts of Congress making it payable in coin shall be paid in coin although it takes the last dollar to pay it; but every debt contracted not payable in coin shall be paid in the lawful money of the United States, such as you paid your soldiers with and such as you furnish to your citizens; such as alone is now used as money of the Government, and upon which alone you impress the image and superscription of the Government as a guarantee that it shall hereafter be made good.

Now, then, when the argument is pressed upon me that in the loan bills passed previously to the five-twenty loan nothing was said as to the currency in which the bonds should be paid, I reply that there was but one currency at the time they were passed in which they could be contracted or payable. But that state of things changed on the 25th of February, 1862. The Congress of the United States had to provide means for carrying on the war; accordingly it passed a law, the first section of which provided for $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes, the language of which, as to their validity and effect, is in these words:

"And such notes, herein authorized, shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind, due to the United States, except duties on imports, and for all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever."

Except what?

"except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interests as aforesaid."

These are the provisions of the first section of the act thus creating "a lawful money," payable and receivable for every debt, public or private, known to the law or known in the United States, except what? Except interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Now, what does the second section provide? It authorized $500,000,000 of bonds registered or coupon, payable at the option of the United States in five years, and in twenty years at all events. Payable how? Let me read again, so that I may not be mistaken:

"to an amount not exceeding $500,000,000, payable in twenty years from date, and bearing a rate of six per cent., payable semi-annually."

Not a word is here said as to the money in which these bonds shall be paid, either as to principal or interest. And why? Because the very section preceding had provided that the interest of all notes or bonds of the United States should be paid in coin, and had further enacted another lawful money which should be receivable in payment of all indebtedness of the United States whatsoever, except duties on imports, and interest on the public debt. Is not the principal of the debt, an indebtedness other than interest?

There is the plain letter of the law. I need not discuss this point further. If there is any lawyer who, reading this law without taking into consideration anything except what stands on the statute-book, will tell me that this law enacts that the principal of the five-twenties is payable in coin, then "for him have I offended," and either he is or I am so stupid as not to be worthy of an argument.

But the gentleman does not leave his proposition upon this only. The next ground he puts it on is, what this or that Congressman said or omitted to say in his speech as to the currency in which this loan should be paid. And the first evidence of the contract he puts forward is that the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS]—not now in his seat—did not say, at the time the act was passed, that the principal was payable in currency. Well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania sets forth in a letter recently written by him as a reason why he did not say it was payable in currency, that he did not think anybody but a fool would think it was not. That is not my language; it is his; that is the ground he puts it on; and when he comes in he and the gentleman from Maine can fight the battle out. I am quite certain that the old man sarcastic will take care of himself when he does get here without any aid from me; and therefore I pass from further consideration of this topic.

But it is said that various speeches were made on the one side and the other, which are cited to interpret this contract. I had supposed that there is no better settled rule of interpretation of either public or municipal law, or of the law of nations, than that nobody is bound by any portion of the negotiations or any portion of the declarations made either in regard to a treaty or a law prior to the enactment of the law or conclusion of the treaty, because the enactment settles the terms of the whole obligation, and you cannot go to the speech of this member or that member, in case of legislation, to find out what the legislation means, nor can you go to the protocols and negotiations prior to a treaty to find out what the treaty means. You must take it upon the letter, and I have never yet found any man bold enough—until my friend from Maine exhibited a degree of courage much superior to any bravery required to face Minie bullets in the field—bold enough to insist that the letter of the law did not authorize payment of the principal of the five-twenty bonds in lawful money of the United States.

The next class of arguments that the gentleman from Maine puts forward on this question is the proposals in the advertisements of those he terms the authorized agents of the United States who disposed of the loan. Allow me here to say that for contracting a national debt I know no other authorized agent of the nation but the Congress of the United States; I know no broker, whether he is in the Treasury office or out of it, that has a right to fix the terms of the national debt for the United States. No man is authorized to pay a dollar of money unless appropriated by the Congress of the United States, and therefore no man can contract a dollar's debt unless authorized directly and distinctly by an act of the Congress of the United States. I agree that Mr. Jay Cooke advertised, after some sort, when endeavoring to sell it, that the principal of this loan was payable in coin; but in the same newspaper you find another of his advertisements, intended also to sell the loan, that "a national debt is a national blessing." Are we bound by contract to that? If, as the gentleman claims, we are bound by advertisements in the one case, we are bound as well in the other; and does my friend insist that Mr. Jay Cooke has bound the country to the proposition that a national debt is a national blessing to anybody except bankers? With that amendment I might agree to the declaration. When I called the attention of the country to this some little time ago, Mr. Jay Cooke, for whom I have very high respect, wrote me that I was mistaken; that what he did advertise was that a national debt rightly managed was a national blessing. I am at issue with him upon that. I insist that a national debt managed any how, by anybody—the Angel Gabriel or Jay Cooke or any other body—is not a national blessing. [Laughter.] No management of a national debt can make it a national blessing. And yet, if we are bound by brokers' advertisements, we are bound to the doctrine that it is a national blessing which we must enjoy and bequeath to our posterity forever!

HO. OF REPS.

Reduction of the Currency—Mr. Butler.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

The next evidence which the gentleman from Maine presents in support of his contract to pay the five-twenties in gold is the declarations of Secretaries of the Treasury. Now, no Secretary of the Treasury had a right to make any declarations on this subject which can be binding on the country. The gentleman does not claim that he had; he only says that Congress stood by and saw the Secretary make declarations and did not interfere. Once for all, I protest against Congress being bound by what Secretaries do or do not do that Congress does not interfere with. If you once admit that doctrine you will involve Congress in difficulties which it will take a long time and great wisdom to unravel.

But no one of the Secretaries ever has said that the contract is that the principal of this loan is payable in coin; and if there has been disingenuousness on this subject it has not been on our part, but on the part of the Secretaries in their attempts to interpret this law so as to sell the loan. The first thing said about the probability that this debt would be paid in gold was in the answer of Secretary Chase to a letter sent him from abroad—Frankfort, I believe. It was said in that letter—I do not give the words, but the substance—"It is not understood here in Frankfort that these bonds are payable in gold. If it should be so understood they would bring a much higher price." Why was it not so understood? Because a foreign lawyer reading the act would never think of such a thing for a moment. The bonds were selling—for what? For forty cents on the dollar, and that at a time when the confederate loan was at a premium in Europe.

Now, I will not think so meanly of this country as to believe it could be supposed these bonds were payable in gold, and then were at this discount even in Europe, which was against us. And I will not think so meanly of this nation as to believe that there could have been any question in the minds of the people of Europe as to our being able to pay more than thirty per cent. of our debt in gold if such had been our plain contract and obligation. No, sir; the bankers in Europe of that day were simply betting as to whether we should pay our paper money in gold; they were betting on that proposition when they were buying our bonds at from sixty to seventy per cent. discount. They knew that every other Government that had issued paper money had depreciated it, and the question was whether we, who set out here so differently from other Governments, would in the end depreciate our paper money.

This letter was sent over here as a stock-jobbing proposition to Mr. Chase. How did he answer it? Through his Assistant Secretary. The answer all will remember. "The Government of the United States has always paid all its obligations in gold, and it is to be presumed that it always will." It was an evasive answer—an answer tending to mislead; whether intended so to do I do not know or say.

What was the next act and declaration of a Secretary of the Treasury? Mr. FESSENDEN is cited. I have a bone to pick with Mr. FESSENDEN upon this subject. I am very glad he has been brought in here, for I should have felt some delicacy in saying a word about him, as he is a member of the other House, had not his friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] brought him upon this floor in his capacity of Secretary of the Treasury. I can therefore deal with the Secretary of the Treasury as roughly as I please, without infringing upon the courtesy due to a Senator of the United States. Mr. FESSENDEN, as Secretary of the Treasury, was called upon to say whether the three-year loan Treasury notes, issued in 1861, when there was nothing but gold to pay with, and for which gold was paid by the people to the Government, was payable in coin or in currency. He decided that these gold-bought and gold-contracted notes were payable in currency; and the whole of that issue, put forth at a time when there was nothing but gold as currency, for which the faith of the country was pledged, under the decision of Mr. FESSENDEN, had to be received by the people (who paid for it in gold) in paper, or they were compelled to convert it into such bonds as the Government chose to give them.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] allow me to read one sentence?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. The decision in regard to the payment of the first series of seven-thirty notes was made on the 18th of May, 1862, by Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, in these words:

"The three-year seven-thirty Treasury notes are part of the temporary loan, and will be paid in Treasury notes, unless the holders prefer to exchange them," &c.

That was three months before Mr. FESSENDEN went into the Treasury. He found the question res adjudicata. The gentleman is all wrong in charging this upon Mr. FESSENDEN. There is not the remotest foundation for his assertion.

Mr. BUTLER. The House will judge whether I was wrong, without the dictum of my friend from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] I did not say that Salmon P. Chase was not guilty of the same thing; I only said that WILLIAM P. FESSENDEN was guilty of it; that is the distinction. [Laughter.] If Salmon P. Chase had broken the faith of this Government—if he had said that, although the Government had received gold in the hour of its necessity, immediately after the first battle of Bull Run, the darkest day the Government ever saw, and had pledged gold in return—for then we paid gold to meet all our obligations—if Salmon P. Chase, on the 18th of May, 1864, when called upon to say whether we should pay gold for the gold we had received, broke the faith of the Government, if he was one of those repudiators and scoundrels and knaves we hear of so glibly when we attempt to discuss this question of finance, why did not and why should not Secretary FESSENDEN overrule him when he became Secretary of the Treasury? If so great a wrong was res adjudicata, it was res very badly adjudicata, and should have been forthwith set right.

My friend does not pretend that Mr. FESSENDEN altered this; and when we, who believe in maintaining the faith of the nation, but not in oppressing the people with taxation, are attacked on all hands by hard words and strong inferences, and when, to get us down, we are yoked up with everybody who happens to have had political sentiments, I would ask who was the first repudiator? The gentleman chooses to cite Mr. Chase as the promisor of this bad note. Be it so; I am dealing only with the indorser, WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN. He indorsed it and acted upon it. By his decision the seven-thirty notes of 1861, issued when there was no other currency, were caused to be paid in greenbacks, and the gold-paying public creditor was obliged, for his gold paid to the Government, either to take his pay in greenbacks or convert his Government notes into bonds; and that whole loan was thus redeemed. And on what ground was this so great a wrong on the public creditors perpetrated? It was said by the Secretary that this three-year seven-thirty gold loan was a temporary loan only. Oh, then, it is right to cheat the temporary creditors of the Government, the hand-to-month men, who loan their hard coin for a few days to save the Government; but the long-bond creditors of the Government you must not cheat; you must let them cheat you. Is not that the proposition? Is there any escape from it? Is not that the Maine doctrine of finance, if you please? [Laughter.] My friend here from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] following in the footsteps of the Secretary of the Treasury from Maine, holds it to be in the last degree wrong if we do not pay principal and interest of our debt in gold. He invokes us, in the name of national honor, national faith, and everything else that is sacred, to save the long-bond creditor, who bought our bonds for currency, while the short creditor, who paid for his notes in coin, has lost his gold by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury from Maine. We have had many things good from Maine—among others a "Maine law"—and now we have got Maine finance. I repudiate the last, and I am afraid my State has repudiated the other. [Laughter.]

The next authority adduced by the gentleman in support of his contract to pay gold for the five-twenties bonds is Secretary McCulloch. Well, if this House proposes to be bound by the financial theories of Secretary McCulloch I should hardly wish to argue this question further. But even Secretary McCulloch does not undertake to say that there is a contract to pay gold for these bonds. When asked by a foreign banker, "What is the contract as to the payment of the principal of the five-twenties?" what does the Secretary reply? Does he say that the contract is to pay in gold? Oh, no; he says that all the Government obligations that have fallen due have been paid in gold, (he forgot that temporary loan,) and that it is the policy of the Government to pay all its obligations in gold. I agree with him; such is the policy of the Government. But that is not the question. The question is, what has the Government contracted to do, and what is it able to do? I wish that we could pay this enormous debt in gold, or in anything else, so that we could relieve the people from taxation. You will find running all through this letter of Secretary McCulloch an evasion of this question. What is the contract by law?

When the $900,000,000 loan, commonly known as the ten-forty loan, was issued, what did the Secretary of the Treasury do? Of the six per cent. five-twenty loan, (which the gentleman from Maine contends was payable in gold,) he says only some $25,000,000 of the $500,000,000 authorized had been issued; yet he makes the Secretary of the Treasury guilty of the absurdity of attempting to put on the market $900,000,000 of the five per cent. ten-forty loan as a competing loan, expecting to get that taken up, when he could not get his five-twenty six per cent. gold-payable loan in principal and interest taken up. Why did he do this? If both loans were payable in gold, he must have been entirely demented. But no; the ten-forty five per cent. loan was payable, principal and interest, in gold by its terms; and this same Secretary of the Treasury, through his brokers, advertised this ten-forty loan as the only one the principal and interest of which were payable in gold. And nobody objected in this House. I was not here then; but where was the eloquent voice of my friend from Maine protesting against selling this five per cent. loan upon an advertisement that it was the only loan payable, principal and interest, in gold? Why did he allow the public creditors to think that the only loan payable in gold was the five per cent. loan; that the six per cent. loan was not payable in gold? This only illustrates the fact that, in interpreting public law, we must not deal with mere members of Congress do individually, but we must be bound by the statute.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Government agents advertised that the ten-forty loan was the only loan payable in gold?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir; I do. Certain Government agents, called the New York Tribune, the New York Times, or the New York Evening Post, contained that advertisement, and if the gentleman will go there he will find it.

Mr. BLAINE. Authorized by whom?

Mr. BUTLER. Authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, so headed. It was a little difficult at that time to find out who the negotiators were. That was the advertisement. You can find it. If I had known this question was to arise at this time I would have had the advertisement to present to the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I gave the gentleman notice some days ago that I should speak on this subject.

Mr. BUTLER. True. But while I presumed the gentleman would speak on this subject, it never entered my conception that he would make such a speech as he has. [Laughter.]

If the gentleman will tell me why it is that we are to construe this law differently from any other law I will be obliged to him. If he will inform this House why the people of this country should tax themselves to the amount of many millions, ($400,000,000 is the difference this day and this hour,) whether these five-twenties are payable in gold, as gold stood yesterday, or in greenbacks.

The only answer suggested is, why agitate this now. These loans are not payable now, and therefore we may wait until the twenty years are out, when we all believe greenbacks and gold will be correlative terms. I believe so, too, in twenty years; but in the meantime the interest on these five-twenties is sinking this country, the labor, the manufacture, and the commerce of this country, to a degree that even its vitality and its strength will hardly be able to meet it.

What is the rate of interest on the five-twenties? Six per cent. in gold, payable semi-annually, gold being at 140 to 145, equal to 150 and upward. That makes nine per cent.; they are exempt from State and municipal taxation, which makes from two to three per cent. more. So on these almost two thousand million of interest bonds the people of this country are paying at this day and at this hour, either by remission of taxes or otherwise, in the currency of the country, from eleven to twelve per cent. What is the consequence? They could stagger under this burden of taxes if needed to pay the soldiers; they could deal with this burden of taxes if it even were to be thrown into the sea; but the difficulty is that paying this high rate of interest on these five-twenties of from eleven to twelve per cent. causes capitalists to withdraw from legitimate business and keep their money in these bonds. See how it operates. I have my money in five-twenty bonds at eleven per cent., and I am told that I am to have gold at the end of the twenty years for the principal besides. You cannot tempt me, then, to go into any enterprise which shall not promise me more than eleven to twelve per cent. I must have much more before I will take my money out of Government securities and put it at the risk of business. And it is this high rate of Government interest which is crushing the life out of the industrial pursuits of the people. There can be no mistake about this. Look at the market reports of Cincinnati, one of the great markets of the West. No money can be got there for less than fifteen to eighteen per cent. Why? Because our capitalists get from eleven to twelve per cent. on five-twenties, and they are encouraged to hold on to their bonds and keep their money out of the business of the country; because the gentleman from Maine tells them that the Government will pay the principal in gold, although they paid but forty cents on the dollar for them when they bought them. This is the reason why this five-twenty loan is crushing our people, and why we must get rid of it at all hazards consistent with national honor and national faith, and no man asks that to be broken.

But I am told if we undertake to pay any portion of this debt in greenbacks we shall depreciate greenbacks so that they will be worthless; that there will be an inflation of prices. The gentleman from Maine riots in imagination over the picture of the payment of $200 for a pair of boots if we issue any more legal-tender notes, that is to say, notes not bearing interest.

Speaking of greenbacks, I am reminded of one thing to which I meant to have adverted to on the question: of the nation's being bound by the advertisements by which its bonds were sold. My friend says we did not notify capitalists that we would claim the right to pay these five-twenty bonds in any other way than in coin. Why we put it upon $150,000,000 of United States notes, and thus advertised everybody we did not mean to pay them in gold. This notice was put on the back of every greenback. Let me read from one:

"This note is a legal tender for all debts, public or private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

There is "inclusio unius exclusio alterius" for the gentleman.

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman will allow me, I hold two notes in my hand, one of which contains precisely the words the gentleman has just read. But does the gentleman say that this is the lawful money authorized by the act of February 25, 1862?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I deny it.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, then, let us see. I will compare this indorsement on the note with the law which I have before me. The second section of the law reads thus:

"Shall be receivable in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports, and of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except interest on the public debt and customs."

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. The act of February 25, 1862, was the first legal-tender act. It is true, the notes were made a legal tender for all debts public and private, but they were also convertible into five-twenty bonds. Now, the gentleman places himself on the ground that whatever was by contemporaneous construction lawful money the Government was bound to pay. I assert that the law for the issue of the five-twenties of 1862 was embraced in the same act which authorized the issue of $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes which were themselves convertible into five-twenties. Now, if the gentleman will stick to his own words, then the Government can only pay off these five-twenties by issuing a like amount of these same legal-tender notes, on the back of which are printed these words:

"This is a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, and is exchangeable for United States six per cent. twenty-year bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after five years."

Therefore, if, as the gentleman contends, these bonds are redeemable at the Treasury in the kind of money which was declared a legal tender when they were issued, they must be paid in this kind of notes. In that case the Treasury of the United States would be receiving the five-twenty bonds at one door and issuing the legal tenders at another, and then again issuing the bonds and taking back the legal tenders, and so they would go round and round the circle.

Mr. BUTLER. And you do not think that desirable. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman think it desirable to have a revolving wheel at which one class of men shall stand in a row for the redemption of their bonds, and another for a reissue of the same? Is that the gentleman's idea of finance? The gentleman adheres to the exact letter of the law.

Mr. BUTLER. The difference between my friend and myself is this: I was putting advertisement against advertisement.

Mr. BLAINE. And I law against law.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no law of this exact form, and it is not the exact form of the law or of the advertisement. I was only putting advertisement against advertisement. I will answer the gentleman, if I have time, that I do think it is desirable to have a currency, and if Congress agrees with me we will have a currency before we get through exactly like what the gentleman describes, so that when a man wants money he can give the Treasury his Government bond and get it, and when he gets through using his money he can go back again and get his bond. That is exactly the thing I want, and I hope to get it if I live long enough.

Mr. BLAINE. And issue $2,000,000,000 of legal tenders.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not said I wanted $2,000,000,000 of greenbacks issued. I only want so much as will be absorbed in the needs of the business of the United States.

But this episode takes me a little way out of my course. I was upon the question whether there would be depreciation, whether there would be inflation if more legal tenders were issued to supply the wants of the country for currency, when I turned aside for a moment to speak to the question of advertisements on the back of the greenbacks.

The common idea is that there will be inflation when you issue paper money. It is drawn from the old idea of bank circulation. A bank issued its notes without any basis except the gold basis. That gold basis was sometimes one to four. Let me illustrate: suppose there were four hundred millions of bank paper in circulation on one hundred millions of gold as a basis, then I agree it would be an inflation to issue another one hundred millions, making the relation of the paper dollar to the gold dollar as one to five. But what is a greenback? Have gentlemen considered? A dollar greenback as it stands to-day is one twenty-five hundred millionth part of the debt of the United States, secured by a mortgage upon every dollar of public or private property in the United States. Is it not that, under my theory or anybody else's theory of finance? Now, suppose we issue five hundred millions of greenbacks, and pay up five hundred millions of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, what is a greenback then? Why, it is still one twenty-five hundred millionth part of the national debt of the United States, appreciated, and not depreciated, by the amount of interest which we have saved by buying up five hundred millions of the interest-bearing debt. The way to test it would be this: suppose we could issue the whole amount and pay all interest-bearing debt at once, then the one hundred and fifty millions of customs which we have to pay for interest without getting ahead in payment of our debt at all could be directed to redeeming the greenbacks. There is a limitation on this power of issuing greenbacks, and only one, and that limitation my friend does not seem to understand. It is this: these greenbacks are non-interest-bearing notes, and therefore they can only be issued in such quantities without depreciation in fact, as will be absorbed by the community to the degree that they are required for business purposes. They may be issued to the degree they will be absorbed as currency. I think that the country can bear to-day some two hundred millions more of them, not issued primarily and arbitrarily for the purpose of paying off the interest-bearing debt, but issued for the purpose of providing a currency for the country which should not be so contracted as to bring ruin, as now, upon the business interests of the country. When you have issued two hundred millions more of these greenbacks and paid your interest-bearing debt with them, have you altered their relation to property, to each other, or to gold? Are they appreciated or depreciated? Appreciated, in fact, because you save the interest on the two hundred millions which you have paid off with them; depreciated if you issue more than will be absorbed as currency, because business men do not want non-interest-bearing notes on hand; and if they are not needed as currency they will sell them at a discount for some property that will pay interest.

HO. OF REPS.

Reduction of the Currency—Mr. Butler.

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Now, then, sir, let me state, for the benefit of my friend, my proposition of finance, and the House can contrast it with any other that may be better, and there will be found better I doubt not. There are now some two thousand five hundred millions of debt. Some two thousand millions of it stand in the shape of interest-bearing debt. There are nineteen different kinds of that description of debt bearing different rates of interest and times of payment. There are some five hundred millions, more or less, in various forms of non-interest-bearing debt, gold certificates, legal-tender notes, and others. Now, my proposition is that, in the first place, we should substitute greenbacks for the national bank currency, releasing to the banks the bonds which we hold as security for that national bank currency. It can be done without shock to the business of the country.

[At this point Mr. BUTLER gave way to a motion that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned.]

WEDNESDAY, November 27, 1867.

The House being again in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the same subject—

Mr. BUTLER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose I was endeavoring to put before it the way in which the national bank circulation might be withdrawn from the banks and legal-tender notes substituted without shock to the business of the country. I agree, sir, that any proposition of legislation is vicious which tends in any considerable degree to interfere with the industrial pursuits of the people, but I propose we should enact in some proper form that the Secretary of the Treasury should each month retain in the Treasury all the national bank bills which have been collected by the collectors of the internal revenue, or which have come through other means into the Treasury of the United States, and at the same time should issue to the banks, if they desire to receive them, or to issue in payment of the interest-bearing notes which are payable in currency an equal amount of legal tenders. In a very few months, four or five, the national bank notes would be withdrawn from circulation and their place supplied with greenbacks without any shock to the business of the country; and, pari passu, the bonds of the banks held as security for these notes could be restored to them. This proposition, sir, if carried out would put into circulation some three hundred million dollars more of national legal-tender notes without increasing that circulation, and release the country from the payment of between twenty and thirty million dollars in currency which is now paid to the national banks on these bonds, and the place of their bills would be taken by the non-interest-bearing notes of the United States without any shock to the business of the country.

What objections are urged to this proposition? The first is that it would be a breach of faith with the banks. I would like some gentleman to put his finger upon any act of Congress by which we pledged ourselves for a single day longer than good pleasure and discretion of the Congress of the United States thought best to allow this bank currency to exist. What effect would it have upon the banks? Those dependent wholly upon their circulation, which are not in fact banks of loans and deposits, would wind up, and their managers would seek some other and equally honest employment. Banks that are needed would still be banks of loan and discount, but not of circulation.

It is said that the banks furnish now the best currency this country ever saw, because it is the same in New Orleans, Boston, New York, and Chicago. But what is the currency? It is the notes of the bank. What makes them equal all over this country? It is the indorsement of the United States. So that we have come into this very remarkable position, that when a bank breaks its currency is better than when it was solvent, and sells at a slight premium. Therefore, as the United States is primarily responsible for all the circulation, we ought to supply the currency to the people and receive the profit of doing it.

But it is said that the banks really cost the United States nothing. One of the ablest bankers of them all, Mr. Jay Cooke, has undertaken to tell us that the banks pay in taxes a large amount, and therefore in equity we ought not to disturb them. Sir, if Mr. Jay Cooke or any one else will tell me of any business in this country that is not taxed and does not pay a large amount of taxes, then I will agree that the banks are not favored. Take for example a manufacturer. Take a single case, only two years ago, in the State of Massachusetts, of a manufacturing corporation of $750,000 capital and of $1,500,000 annual product of manufactured goods. It exactly divided profits with the United States. Its stockholders received two dividends of five per cent. each on $750,000, and it paid five per cent. tax on the entire amount of production, $1,500,000; so that they in fact took the United States into partnership, only the United States got all the profits, but the stockholders bore all the loss. Now, if there is any greater or more onerous burden of taxes on the banks than that, I have yet to learn where it is.

Again, it is said that this banking system is a better one than we ever had. For some purposes so it is. And it is said, further, that if we do not encourage it we shall go back to the old State bank system. No, Mr. Chairman, never, never! The day of State banks has gone by. They were always, in my poor judgment, unconstitutional; but they got themselves fastened on to the country, and there was never power enough, until the necessities of the country required a new system of finance, to break off their hold. We have rid the country of them, and the Congress of the United States, ay, and the good judgment of the people, will never permit that system again to be imposed upon the country.

What is the next proposition? Why, it is said we must not interfere with the national banks because they patriotically helped us during the war. Upon that I take issue with each and every advocate of the banks. On the contrary, they helped themselves, not us. It is said they loaned money to the Government. How did they do it? Let me state the way a national bank got itself into existence in New England during the war, when gold was 200, and fifties were at par, in currency, or nearly that. A company of men got together $300,000 in national bank bills, and went to the Register of the Treasury with gold at 200 and bought United States five-twenty bonds at par. They stepped into the office of the Comptroller of the Currency and asked to be established as a national bank, and received from him $270,000 in currency, without interest, upon pledging these bonds of the United States they had just bought with their $300,000 of the same kind of money. Now, let us balance the books, and how does the account stand? Why, the United States Government receives $30,000 in national bank bills more from the banks than it gave them in bills; in other words, it borrowed of the bank $30,000 in currency, for which, in fact, it paid $18,000 a year in gold interest, equal to $36,000 in currency, for the use of this $30,000. Let me repeat. The difference between what the United States received and paid out was only $30,000, and for the use of that the Government pay on the bonds deposited by the company, bought with the same kind of money, $18,000 a year interest in gold, equal to $36,000 in currency.

But the thing did not stop there. The gentlemen were shrewd financiers; their bank was a good one; they went to the Secretary of the Treasury and said, "Let our bank be made a public depository." Very well; it was a good bank; the managers were good men; there was no objection to the bank. It was made a public depository, and thereupon the commissaries, the quartermasters, the medical director and purveyor, and the paymasters were all directed to deposit their public funds in this bank. Very soon the bank found that they had a line of steady deposits belonging to the Government of about a million dollars, and that the $270,000 they had received from the Comptroller of the Currency would substantially carry on their daily business, and as the Government gives three days on all its drafts if the bank was pressed it was easy enough to go on the street if they had good security. They took the million of Government money so deposited with them and loaned it to the Government for the Government's own bonds, and received therefor $60,000 more interest in gold for the loan to the Government of its own money, which in currency was equal to $120,000. So that when we come finally to balance the books the Government is paying $156,000 a year for the loan of $30,000. And this is the system which is to be fastened forever on the country as a means of furnishing a circulating medium!

This, only using round numbers for the purpose of illustration, is an actual and not a feigned occurrence. You will see it was a perfectly safe operation for the banks, though not a very profitable one for the Government, because they held ample security for the Government deposits in its own bonds. But the difficulty is the Government was paying interest all the while on its own deposits; and this state of facts is only rendered possible by this system of supplying the banks with circulation by the Government without interest.

The next reason advanced why we should not interfere with these banks, if I understand it, is that we are told by very high authority this system will become the banking system of the world; having inaugurated it, we are so much in love with it that all the nations will pattern after it. Let the rest of the world try it for a few years when we have done with it, and then, if the rest of the nations adopt it, we can return to it, but not till then.

Sir, am I slandering these institutions? Are they not making money at a rate which is beyond all precedent. Let me state another case, which might be an actual case, and perhaps I could call the name of the man. A very shrewd man takes his $100,000 and goes to the Treasury and obtains bonds; he then gets a banking charter, and receives his bills amounting to $90,000; then he buys with those same bills $90,000 worth of bonds, and comes home and sits in his office, and that is his bank, and his money is all in circulation. Says he: Why should I trouble myself to lend my money to the farmers around me on sixty-day notes when I can lend it at from ten to twelve per cent. on long twenty-year Government bonds, and Mr. BLAINE says I am to be paid in gold for them; that is as good banking as I want to do; the bills never come home; they are going all over the West and South, and I am getting $22,800 interest on my original $100,000; what do I want more; I am comfortable and happy; I think this "banking system is the wisest one the world ever saw, and that it ought to be adopted all the world over."

But let us take the banks' own exhibit of themselves. I hold in my hand the abstract of reports of national banking associations for the 1st of October last. Let us see their condition. They have $419,000,000 of capital stock paid in; they have been in operation on an average of less than four years; they have divided from twelve to twenty per cent., about twelve in New England and from fifteen to twenty per cent. where money is scarcer and the rate of interest rules higher. In addition to these dividends, take their own statement: "surplus fund, $66,000,000; undivided profits, $33,000,000;" showing that they have got, after all these dividends, near twenty-five per cent. surplus of that capital stock laid away. What other business, taxed or untaxed, if any untaxed business can be found in this country, will allow a yearly dividend of from fifteen to twenty-five per cent. and a surplus accumulation in four years of twenty-five per cent. on the capital? And from whom and from where do these profits come? They come ultimately from where all taxation, all profits, all productions must come, the labor of the country and nowhere else; and we are asked here to perpetuate a system which takes these immense profits from the labor of the country and puts them into the hands of capitalists without a pretense of adequate benefit received by the people.

Why, sir, it is an axiom in finance, if there are any axioms in finance, that any business which is safe should have small profits, and business that is hazardous should have large profits; but here the state of things is reversed; the banking business, which, if well conducted, is the safest business on earth, and which heretofore has always been content with small profits, is now the most profitable of all businesses, and has the largest returns without any risks.

Every member of this House can argue these propositions for himself better than I can argue them for him. It is my part only to suggest the topics upon the question of currency. I insist, as my first proposition, that there should be this change in bank circulation, and by that means we would diminish our interest-bearing debt $300,000,000 by redeeming it with the greenbacks we should thus issue.

We have to-day in circulation in various forms in round numbers $759,000,000. A portion of it, I agree, is locked up in banks; fifteen per cent. in the country, and twenty-five per cent. in the city banks as their currency for the redemption of their bills; a procedure the wisdom of which I have yet to be taught, because the United States is the final indorser and payer of all their bills. I do not see how it makes it any safer to lock up fifteen to twenty-five per cent. of the indorser's notes for their redemption; and I desire some of the able bankers in this House to explain to me what good result is hoped for from this smothering of a portion of the national currency, which the banks take care, however, shall be interest-bearing to them.

I will suggest a reason why that requirement was placed in the statute-book. There was a lingering idea in law of the old specie basis, and of getting an equivalent in its place. Legislators seem to have forgotten that we had wandered away from the specie basis; that they were putting in its place but the notes of the United States to redeem notes of the United States. If we can release, therefore, the whole circulation of about seven hundred million dollars, perhaps that will relieve the present contraction in the currency.

We are told that we must preserve the national banks, because if we do not there will be nobody to circulate our money. Let us examine that a moment. If money will not circulate it is because nobody wants money. My anxiety is to provide the people with money that they do want and will circulate, not with money they do not want. I have never yet seen any man who has refused the notes of the United States when the Government has paid them out. When I find such a man, I will agree to charter a bank for the purpose of forcing them upon him, and not until then.

The truth is, that at the present hour the country is suffering from the want of 'those very notes. We have nominally some seven hundred and fifty millions of currency, but actually only about five hundred and fifty millions in circulation. I wish I could stop to explain to the House how this can be, but it can easily be seen by examining the bank returns. We find the fact to be that we have not circulation enough. Compare it with what was the circulation before the war. Mr. Chase reported the circulation of this country before the war, including gold, to be about four hundred and seventy-seven million dollars, and upon examination I can see no reason to find fault with that estimate. Now we have only $550,000,000 in actual circulation, though we are doing more than three times the business calling for the use of cash that we were doing before the war. During the ten years from 1847 to 1857 the deposits and circulation of the banks averaged about thirteen dollars per man. Now, on account of our doing so much more of our business for cash, the deposits and circulation of the banks are about twenty-four dollars per man. And if you take into consideration the currency furnished by the United States, the $300,000,000 of greenbacks, or about that sum, you will find that it is about thirty-four dollars per man, reckoning thirty-six million people in the United States. This shows that we require in our business three times, or certainly two and a half times, as much cash as before the war. Everybody knows this to be fact.

How was it before the war with the eastern manufacturer? He sent to New Orleans and bought his cotton, giving drafts for six or eight months. The merchant in New Orleans came East and bought the manufactured goods, giving his notes for from six months to a year; and all the cash that was wanted was enough to settle up the balances.

And now, when we send out for cotton we must send out greenbacks, because of the change in the mode of doing business; and we have a currency that stands at par there, and for what they want from us they must send the greenbacks. Every one knows that the business of this country is done twice or thrice as much in cash as it was before the war; and therefore I think this country will bear from eight hundred to a thousand million dollars of circulation without redundancy as soon as business revives, and that will make it revive. But my friends say "that may be too much." Perhaps it may be; but it is very easy, it seems to me, for us to have that amount of circulation without redundancy; and as each legal-tender note is, as we have seen, a part of the debt secured by mortgage of the whole property of the United States, without depreciation.

Our debt now is $2,500,000,000, about $2,200,000,000 of it interest-bearing. Suppose we issue our legal-tender greenbacks, as I will call them for convenience, and buy up or redeem our interest-bearing debt that is due to the amount of $1,000,000,000. Then our debt stands, $1,000,000,000 of non-interest-bearing debt and $1,500,000,000 of interest-bearing debt. Now, if that $1,000,000,000 of circulation is too much, i. e., more than is needed for currency, I agree with the gentleman from Maine that it will be depreciated. But what is too much? Too much is more than will be absorbed as currency in the business of the country. That is to say, if because of an over-issue by the Government there is an accumulation of non-interest-bearing notes, greenbacks, in the hands of any man, they are not productive, and he will dispose of them at a discount, if he can do no better, for something that is productive. The only question as to redundancy, therefore, is whether the notes in his hands are worth more for use in his business as currency than they would be to him if invested in a loan to the Government. Now, then, I propose that for $300,000,000 of this non-interest-bearing debt we shall issue an interest-bearing loan at once which shall be that exact loan which my friend from Maine yesterday thought would be so absurd—a loan bearing a low rate of interest and convertible and reconvertible into greenbacks at the pleasure of the holder at any day and any hour.

Let us see how such a loan would operate. A man has more money than he wants to use. He with such a loan can go to a public depository, leave his money and take his bond. Then when he wants his money again he goes to the depository, leaves his bond and takes his money for his bond, principal and interest; that is to say, when the non-interest-bearing notes of the United States are worth less to a business man than this bond he will exchange it for this bond; when the notes as currency are worth more to him to use in business or speculation than the investment he will return the bond and take the currency. Thus, without any banks to push out the circulation just when it is not wanted or draw it back just when it is wanted, as the practice now is, we shall have an automatic financial system, self-regulating, or rather regulated by the great law of supply and demand, the best of all regulators. When money is wanted by the business community up to the amount of notes issued by the United States, it will be at once got; when it is not wanted, it will be returned to the Government, which being a borrower for a long series of years to come will be glad to take it. There can be no redundancy, because every man will know exactly where to place these non-interest-bearing notes when he has got through with them as money. When money is wanted at the West to move your crops in the fall you take it from the Treasury and move the crops; when you get through with the money you take it back to the Treasury and get the bonds, in the same manner as when you have got through with your wagons you put them back in your barns for use next year. Thus the whole monetary system of the country will go on without redundancy and without shock and without inflation.

More than that, sir, as I believe I demonstrated yesterday, it will be impossible to have inflation, because this currency being convertible and reconvertible from time to time, and being always an integral part of the public debt, it will never change its relative value to the property of the people of the United States. Why, sir, what is the measure of the value of your house? If it is worth $10,000 it is ten thousand twenty-five hundred millionth parts of the public debt; and it will remain so until a portion of that debt is paid, when it will be appreciated, or until the public debt is expanded when it will be depreciated. It will remain of exactly the same relative value however much the form of the public debt be changed, but will always be more valuable as the public debt grows more valuable, i. e., as it diminishes.

My hour is nearly exhausted and I am warned that I must spend no more time in elaborating the details of this proposition; but I ask gentlemen to apply to this question their own acute judgments and tell me, if they can, where is the fault in the reasoning; because the only valuable purpose that can be served by this discussion is to elicit what we all desire to arrive at—the best system of finance, to do what? To lessen the burden of taxation and to relieve the loyal, true-hearted, but overburdened people from this so great weight of taxation.

Now, sir, if I am right, and if the country will bear this thousand millions of non-interest-bearing notes as currency—and if it will not, the good judgment of the Ways and Means Committee, and the Committee on Banking and Currency will settle that for us on full examination, so that I certainly may use that sum for illustration in so far as it will bear it—so far will it diminish the interest-bearing debt. You will, therefore, bring the interest-bearing debt down to $1,500,000,000, where it can easily be managed. It is said you must not pay these five-twenties in greenbacks? Why, sir, you will never need to pay them in greenbacks.

What shall you do, then? You should issue a loan on long time, at a low rate of interest, thirty or fifty years, with the proceeds of which to redeem them or to be exchanged for them. For, sir, I am not for this generation paying all this debt. I think we had done our share when we contracted it. [Laughter.] We ought to leave it to our children to do theirs by paying it. I see gentlemen smile. But, sir, in all solemnity, when we contracted this we contracted it with the loss of the best blood of the nation and the loss of the best lives we had; in suffering, in sorrow, in labor, in woe, amid horrors unnumbered, to save this great experiment of Government, republican in form and freedom for all, for them and for our posterity forever, and they owe us some debt of gratitude for that so great boon; and should we who bore all the suffering and agony bear also all the taxation consequent upon this great work?

I say, then, let us change these $1,500,000,000 of interest-bearing debt into a long loan—a taxable loan, taxable by State and municipal authorities. But some friend of mine may say that if we make the loan taxable by States the States will tax the loan out of existence; that there may be some State hostile to the General Government which will tax the loan out of existence. I beg his pardon; such hostile taxation will only tax the loan out of that State, and deprive the citizens of that State of a profitable and desirable investment, which will be taken up by citizens of other States where it is not so taxed.

There are some disadvantages in a taxable loan worthy of examination. Let us consider them. It is said that no Government ever allowed another subordinate government to tax its loans. True, but there never was before any Government, like ours, having a complex government of States and a national Government over all and the people the same in both and each.

It is said that what States get by taxing the loan to carry on their municipal governments the general Government loses. But is this so? The people have to pay the taxes to sustain both State and national Governments. So what the people lose as citizens of the United States because of taxation of the loan they gain as citizens of the State by taxation; for the people at last pay all, lose all, and suffer all. If it be said that there will be inequality of taxation it is answered again that unjust taxation, too burdensome, will only drive the loan out of such State, so that in practice there can be no inequality.

Another objection is that you cannot sell a taxable loan at so high a price. Why not? Because it will depreciate because of taxation. It will depreciate, however, exactly according to the amount levied upon it by taxation. Be it so. Who gets the benefit of that taxation? Why, sir, the people. All that it depreciates because of taxation, being received back from the taxes, will relieve the people from so much taxation. If in some States the loan is taxed more than in others there will not be any inequality, because such excess of taxation will only send that form of investment out of that municipality.

There is another objection to a taxable loan, namely: that it is a form of investment easily to be concealed from taxation. But it cannot any more easily be concealed as an investment than can notes, bonds, or money in all shapes. Let me ask you what is the operation to-day of your five-twenty non-taxable loan. A capitalist has money which he is using in his business, and he sees the assessor coming round. He goes into market and puts his money into Government bonds. The assessor calls, the man has no taxable property, the assessor passes by, and the next day the artful dodger sells his bonds for the money, and goes on speculating. He saves the taxation, and next year he repeats the operation.

These are, I understand, some of the objections to taxable loans. But it has also its advantages. In the first place it puts the wealth of the country, and the labor of the country upon an equal footing as to taxation. It compels the surplus wealth as well as the industry of the country to be taxed.

Another advantage of a taxable loan is that it relieves the public debt from an apparent injustice. And it is of no consequence how small the injustice is, for the people feel an unjust burden, however light, more than a just burden, however heavy.

Still another advantage is claimed for a taxable loan. It has been held by many financiers—I do not claim to be enough of a financier to give an opinion as to the merit of the claim, but each gentleman will settle the question for himself—that it is a great advantage to borrow money abroad, in the various markets of the world, at low rates of interest. Therefore we find our canal and railroad companies and all great enterprises attempting to place their bonds in Europe. If that is good financing, what is the objection to our national loans going abroad, provided we get back the money for them? The principal objection has been found to be that whenever there is war or rumor of war abroad, a financial panic is created there, our bonds come home for realization and interfere with our money relations and unsettle our business. But if our bonds are taxable for State or municipal purposes, they would not of course be taxable abroad, and would then stand from ten to fifteen per cent. higher there—perhaps twenty or twenty-five per cent. higher—no man can tell, until the theory is reduced to practice, how much higher than at home; and the holder abroad, having to consent to so great a sacrifice before he could realize on them, would not be very likely to send them home upon us, which is the greatest danger now to our finances whenever there is the slightest financial trouble in Europe.

Such a taxable loan held abroad would be kept there steadily. If, however, any great trouble should happen in Europe so that the bonds would be sent home at all hazards, they would come at such low rates as to be economically and readily bought up here, and our people could afford to take them even with the burden of tax upon them.

Therefore, I have no doubt that a loan of $1,500,000,000 for thirty or fifty years could be placed to-morrow at five per cent. if taxable, with which to get the money to redeem the five-twenties or in which to exchange them, and thus save millions of taxation. I should prefer, so far as I am advised, until I hear further debate, that such bond should be a taxable one of five per cent., or three and sixty-five hundredths sterling, if untaxable. Either would sell, in my opinion, to-morrow at as high rates in the markets of Europe as does our five-twenty loan now, while they would not interfere with the ability of this country to pay its debts or keep our loan down both at home and abroad. Our loan does not now sell at a discount because anybody doubts the ability of this country to pay every dollar it has contracted.

A MEMBER. Nor its willingness?

Mr. BUTLER. Nor its willingness. Nobody doubts that. I am obliged to my friend for the suggestion. I think I can convince the House that nobody doubts its willingness. What are our gold certificates—$14,000,000 of them—only promises of the United States to pay in gold on demand. And yet they are at a little premium over gold, both at home and abroad, because they are more convenient to handle. If anybody feared the willingness of the United States Government to pay according to its promise or doubted its ability, why should not these gold certificates go below par? It is because all people understand that when we promise to pay in gold by a contract upon which my friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] does not need to make an argument to show it is a gold contract, or my older friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] does not need to explain to us hereafter what is meant by the law—when it is on the face of the certificate, “payable in gold on demand,” then that promise is above par. [This pledge of the Government causes that note to stand better than gold in the markets of the world to-day.]

Nay, more, our ten-forty, five per cent. bonds, having six years only more to run before the Government has the option of paying them, and therefore hardly to be considered as a funded debt, are selling now within one or two per cent. of some of the five-twenty six per cent. loans, payable in gold according to the argument of my friend from Maine. What makes the difference? On five-twenties there is one per cent. interest due more than on the other. Why do they come so near to each other in price? It is because no man can read the statute-book and doubt that the one is payable in gold and the other in lawful money of the United States.

Therefore I repeat, that in the markets of the world there is no doubt, as there is none in any man's mind, of the willingness or the ability of the United States Government to perform its contract. But the doubt is as to what is the contract—whether it is a contract of Jews and sharpers or a contract of the Congress of the United States.

But I am met right here again with the proposition. Why stir this now? Since I began my speech half a dozen gentlemen, some friendly and some unfriendly, have tipped me on the shoulder and said, “Now, Mr. BUTLER, what is the use of making a fuss about this now? Why not let these bonds run twenty years and by that time gold and greenbacks will be the same? Why disturb the matter? What are you getting up this row for?” [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. A sensible question. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, very sensible, and I am going to answer it in a sensible manner; and the answer is this, that these five-twenty bonds are on eleven to twelve per cent. interest, and they will double oftener than once in eight years; and if we let them go on for twenty years the people will have to pay them twice over in interest, and then owe them still. That is the answer. Is there not good sense in that, now? [Laughter.] The reason why I am anxious about this now is that it is our urgent, pressing duty, not to be shunned or avoided, to relieve the people from the burden of this great weight of taxation.

Let me restate it so that nobody will forget it. At the rate of interest we are paying these bonds double once in six years; at six per cent. they double once in eleven years, and with the tax making eight per cent. they will double once in about eight years. Set down the figures and when you find out let me know how the figures read.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BUTLER. When do you say they will double at eight per cent.?

40TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reduction of the Currency—Mr. Butler.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. SPALDING. Once in about twelve years.

Mr. BUTLER. Six per cent. in gold, with the tax off, equal to eight per cent semi-annually at compound interest, and it will not double under twelve years! I do not know anything about figures in Ohio, but figures in Massachusetts do not bring out that result. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. We have had enough of that sort of wit.

Mr. BUTLER. I presume you have had enough, sir.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman yield to me just a moment?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. PRICE. I presume the gentleman from Massachusetts means to be correct.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, I try to be, exactly.

Mr. PRICE. And to place upon record facts in reference to those things about which he talks.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. He said a moment ago that the difference between ten-forties and five-twenties was one per cent. I was satisfied in my own mind that was a mistake and on referring to the document I find that on the 20th of November five-twenties were 108 and ten-forties 102½.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the gentleman read quotations of the lowest five-twenties and the highest ten-forties?

Mr. PRICE. I read those of 1862; I have not read the list.

Mr. BUTLER. Ah! that will not do, if you please, those of 1865 are lower. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. Well, I will give them all if the gentleman wishes it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield further to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, certainly; I yield to everybody in this discussion.

Mr. PRICE. I do not wish to encroach on the gentleman's time.

Mr. BUTLER. It is no encroachment.

Mr. PRICE. The statement made was evidently incorrect, I presume unintentionally so, and I thought it best to put the gentleman right.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, will the gentleman take one or two things into this calculation and then I will stand corrected. He read from the quotation in the newspapers. Will he tell me how long before the coupons of the five-twenties are payable and how much interest is due, whether they are "flat," to use the language of the broker's board, and how long before the coupons of the ten-forties are payable? If he will make the calculation he will find this statement to be correct, and I am ready to meet him anywhere upon it; he will find that between the lowest class of five-twenties and the highest class of ten-forties there is less than two per cent. difference.

Mr. PRICE. Does the gentleman want an answer to that?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. PRICE. I need not say to the gentleman, I presume, nor to any gentleman in this House, that the coupons of the bonds that I have quoted were paid the 1st day of this month, and consequently there is only the balance of this month's interest due on them, and therefore they are "flat." Everybody knows about the ten-forties. The interest was paid on the five-twenties that I have quoted on the 1st of November. Before that they were selling at 113 and a fraction, and as high as 114. With the coupons cut off the 1st day of the month they are selling at 108, according to the quotations of the board on the 26th instant, (yesterday,) and ten-forties from 102½ to 102¾. I give you the largest quotations for ten-forties, and the benefit of the doubt if there is any.

Mr. BUTLER. I am always glad to be corrected, but I must still maintain my position. I may be wrong, but I must insist on the position until I am better advised than I have been yet. Is the discussion of this grave question to be decided by an accidental difference yesterday of one or two cents upon this class of securities?

Isaac Newton once said he occupied himself in his great studies by picking up pebbles on the shore of the great ocean of truth; but I have never heard that he selected the very smallest ones.

I was about saying, when I was interrupted, (if I can get back to the thread of my thought,) that the objection has been made that we shall never return to specie payments under this system. Let us be definite. What do gentlemen mean by "returning to specie payments?" Do they mean returning to the state of finances that existed before the war? That is, when this Government collected its dues in gold, and paid its debts in gold; and when people had a currency based on gold, but which never could be redeemed in gold. If they mean to return to that state of things I respectfully submit that for the present it is impossible.

It is impossible for this reason: we had a specie paying Government from the time the sub-Treasury law went into operation down to the war, that is, the Government collected all its dues in gold, and paid all its debts in gold; and all the money needed for governmental purposes collected and paid out was from about thirty to sixty million dollars from year to year, before 1860 running up at one time, I believe, to seventy-odd million. I am now using amounts bearing almost exactly correct relation to each other by way of illustration, and I hope no gentleman will hunt up an old newspaper to show that I am not right within two or three dollars. During the same period there was from about ninety to two hundred and ten million dollars of specie in the country. In other words, it took for governmental purposes alone about one third of all the specie in the country. We all remember that whenever there was any hitch in governmental operations so that gold accumulated in the sub-Treasury it disordered all our monetary affairs and produced financial crises.

In 1857, when some ten million gold had thus accumulated, it was deemed so disturbing an element in the commerce of the country that Mr. Cobb, then Secretary of the Treasury, paid thirty per cent. advance for the bonds of the United States in order to relieve the money market by putting out the accumulated gold in the Treasury.

It took then one third of all the gold in the country to carry on the Government business, and we could hardly get around at that. We now have from two hundred to two hundred and twenty-five million dollars of gold only, so far as is known, in the country. The Government is using every year for its operations some three hundred and fifty million dollars. If the Government could not get around without disturbing the finances in collecting its dues and paying its debts in gold before the war, using only one third of all the gold in the country, how can it now get on with its operations, requiring $350,000,000 to be taken out of $225,000,000, which is all the gold now in the country, not allowing anybody else to use a dollar? It is therefore entirely impracticable for the Government to carry on its great operations of $350,000,000 upon a gold basis, wholly irrespective of the question of the credit of the Government or its ability to command all the gold in the country. It might indeed carry on its operations partly in gold and partly in paper, but that is not a return to specie payments by the Government. But it is as utterly impossible at the present time for the Government to carry on its operations on a gold basis, in the manner in which it did before the war, as it is to make three hundred and fifty go into two hundred and twenty-five and have a remainder over, which I take it is impossible by any figures out of the State of Ohio. [Laughter.]

In my judgment, all talk about returning to specie payments in July, 1868, or any other period in the immediate future, is illusory and vain. How are we to get back to specie payments? In the first place, by reducing your taxation, stimulating your industry, raising your productiveness, bringing down the expenditure of the Government, specially the first and great expenditure and burden over all others—the taxation for the purpose of paying your doubly exorbitant interest on the public debt as now constituted.

Reduce your interest-paying debt as you may to some one billion five hundred million dollars, and then fund this at five per cent. at highest, even with taxation. This will call for $75,000,000 as interest of the public debt annually; or fund it at three and sixty-five one hundredths per cent. sterling if untaxable, as you may, and that will make only some fifty-five millions as interest, and there will then be some $60,000,000 to $85,000,000 of gold coming in at your custom-houses to help pay the expenses of the Government, after paying up the interest on the debt.

Then enforce faithfully and justly the collection of a judicious taxation on but two articles of luxury, whisky and tobacco, and you may release every other interest from taxation, and the land shall blossom as the rose, and the hum of productive industry give sweet harmony to the delighted ear.

Leaving financial matters as they now stand, you never can go back to specie payments. Get back to specie payments! How is it proposed to be done by the Secretary of the Treasury? Why, in order to do that he asked Congress to aid him—to sell our bonds in Europe; and he came before Congress asking authority to deposit gold in Europe to pay the interest there, so that he might sell more bonds there. When he sells those bonds in Europe, what does he get for them? Seventy cents or thereabouts on the dollar. What is specie payment? Paying one hundred cents. How is he going to be able to pay one hundred cents on what we owe now? By making new debts at seventy cents? I would like somebody skilled in figures to cypher out that problem.

But the matter does not stop there. If the Secretary of the Treasury got even gold for his bonds he would have something to show. But what are those bonds sold for? They are sold abroad to meet the balance of trade. What does that mean? It means to pay the balances owing for broadcloth that we wear, for brandy that we drink, for cigars that we smoke. What would be thought of a financier who should insist he was getting solvent-selling his notes at seventy cents on the dollar in order to buy broadcloth, brandy, and cigars? Who would insist such an one was a good financier? Yet this is the exact system upon which the finances of this country are being carried on to-day.

You may consult upon your tariff bills till you are blind; your Committees of Ways and Means may fix up schemes of protection for home manufactures till they are weary, but they will afford no protection to American industry. Why? The bankers and merchants of Europe never expect Government loans there to be paid. Most of the Governments of Europe have irredeemable loans, the interest of which only is ever to be paid. Now, with the rate of interest two per cent. at Antwerp, two per cent. at London, one and three fourths per cent. at Frankfurt, two and one fourth per cent. at Paris, our bonds are eagerly snapped up; foreign agents come over here to get them. With the discount of thirty per cent. on our bonds bearing six per cent. gold interest, they can always undersell us, and vitiate any tariff that we choose to pass. We are thus dealing with them in manufacturing at home with thirty per cent. against us. Nay, more; suppose there are two manufacturing establishments, one in this country and one in England, the two establishments equally well managed, both manufacturing the same article and making exactly the same profit; the English manufacturer can make a ten per cent. dividend, while our manufacturer is losing money. Why? Because the capital of the English manufacturer costs him but two per cent., while with our high rate of interest, induced by our Government rate on the five-twenties, the American manufacturer's capital costs him twelve per cent.—a difference of ten per cent., which should be a sufficient dividend for any well-conducted business that was not a national bank.

Under such circumstances we cannot compete with the foreign manufacturer. It is useless for my friends from New England and my friends from Pennsylvania to ask for a tariff on their manufactures; it is useless for my friends from the West to ask for a tariff on their wool so long as this great difference in money is against us. Why, my friends from the West thought that if they could only get a tariff on wool, wool would go up, command a fair price, and the farmer should get pay for his labor. They got all the tariff they asked, and I am glad they did. But the more tariff they got, the more wool went down. Am I not right? Was wool ever so cheap as it has been this year, since we have put a duty on it? Why? Because of this difference between this country and abroad in the rate of money, our taxation and the discount on our bonds entirely neutralizing any tariff for the protection of the East or the protection of the West.

But, sir, I feel that I am trespassing far too long upon the patience of the committee. I have given a general and very imperfect and desultory sketch of my financial propositions. I have shown that I do not seek to repudiate a single contract of the United States; that I am only seeking to relieve the people from the immense burden of taxation; that I am seeking to get rid of a banking system more profitable to the capitalist than that which Webster so well described as a system devised to make the rich richer and the poor poorer; that I am only seeking to equalize taxation, so that we of the party of progress, of loyalty, and of the Union, who have conducted this Government through a great war, may not be thrown out of power because of the pressure of its burdens upon the people, which we can prevent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLAINE took the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PRICE. I move that he have ten minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Ten minutes will be enough.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to have the gentleman answer a question.

Mr. BUTLER. I will when I get through. Mr. Chairman, I was attempting to show how we might relieve the people from taxation, hoping thereby to elicit a discussion of this great subject. There are some things we must do. They are the pressing duties of the hour. First, we must stop this contraction of the currency now going on. It has been contracted at least $100,000,000 in the last year. Some men say only $48,000,000, or $4,000,000 a month. But $77,000,000 of compound-interest notes must be reckoned in, and the contraction of the currency will in fact be found to be more than $100,000,000. Secondly, we must have the gold hoarded in the Treasury of the United States sold at public auction at stated periods of time, so all may know when, except of course enough, with the receipts from customs, to meet the interest on the gold-bearing debt. Thirdly, we must repeal the immense number of discretionary powers with which the exigencies of the war caused us to clothe the Secretary of the Treasury. The Treasury of the United States should not be left in the power of any one man. It is of no consequence who that man may be. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury has discretionary powers he may exalt this man's property and decrease that of another; he may issue this loan and take in another. He holds the business of the country in the hollow of his hand. I by no means mean to make any charges of corruption or favoritism against anybody. Following his views of finance, the present Secretary of the Treasury has done his duty. But I say it is a dangerous power, one given in consideration of the exigencies of the war. The war now being over, the Congress of the United States, to whom the Constitution has wisely trusted the finances of the Government, should enact a positive law, not to be swerved from by the Secretary of the Treasury upon any pretense whatever, declaring exactly what shall and what shall not be done with the finances of the country. These three measures are of pressing necessity and imperative for prompt relief. When they are carried out, when the gold is sold and bonds paid with the proceeds so as to relieve greenbacks and send them back into circulation, when this discretionary power which may or may not be exercised improperly is taken away, and when the banks are brought back to their position of banks of loan and discount, then the country will be relieved. Then after full and fair discussion you will see exactly the amount which our country will absorb in non-interest-bearing notes of the United States, and fix that amount. Then consolidate the nineteen different kinds of loans and securities we have now into one long taxable loan of the United States that shall be a consolidated funded security known by all the people, exact in its terms, plain in its contracts, and unoppressive in its rate of interest. Then shall the country resume its onward march of prosperity.

It remains for me, Mr. Chairman, to thank the committee for the great kindness and patience with which they have indulged me in this desultory expression of my views upon this gravest of all questions.

Mr. MILLER. I should like to put this question to the gentleman from Massachusetts: taking for granted that by a legal construction of the statutes allowing the issue of five-twenty bonds the principal was payable in lawful money, which, of course, would include greenbacks, yet if the Secretary of the Treasury, believing that the principal as well as the interest was payable in coin, and he and others who had charge of disposing of them represented to the public that such bonds (principal and interest) were payable in gold, and thus inducing capitalists and others to vest their money in such securities at a time the country was in peril and funds were needed to carry on the war to put down rebellion, would it not be bad faith in Congress now to refuse to sanction the payment in coin?

Mr. BUTLER. The question is fairly put, and deserves a fair and candid answer. The answer I make to it in the first place is this: that the Secretary of the Treasury did not believe these bonds were payable in gold, had no right to give any such assurance, and no man had the right to rely on such terms. Secondly, that we here, as the Government of the United States, are standing as trustees between the people of the United States the debtor, and the bond-holder the creditor, and we have no right to administer that trust upon any equitable considerations not clearly arising out of the terms of the contract, or upon any chivalric notions of honor, but exactly according to the words and spirit of the contract creating the obligation. We have no more right than a guardian would have to pay what he supposes might be an equitable debt of his ward, or an executor to exercise his notions of honor by paying out the funds of his trust against the protest of the creditors of the estate or the legatees.

Mr. MILLER. One question more. Is there any other obligation upon the United States but that of an equitable one? The United States being a sovereign cannot be sued.

Mr. BUTLER. The United States Government is bound by its laws to the same extent as the humblest individual; and it makes no difference as to its obligations that there is no court in which to enforce its contracts except this highest court, the Congress of the United States.
